Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): My question arises out of genuine curiosity. Will the circumstances outlined by the Secretary of State also pertain in Scotland? I should be interested to know why Scotland is not included in the legislation. Whether or not this is the right solution, it seems odd that it does not apply to one part of the United Kingdom. Many people in Scotland—including, for example, the Scottish Campaign Against Irresponsible Driving—are deeply upset about the present level of sentencing in exactly the circumstances which have been outlined.

Mr. Baker: On the hon. Gentleman's first point, the Bill applies only to England and Wales. I have discussed the issue with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, and he believes that there is no need to extend the Bill to Scotland, as there is different legislation for this, as for many other Scottish matters.

It is not for me—as a member of the Executive—to comment on the level of sentencing. As Home Secretary, I do not comment on the length of sentences. I have personal views, but I keep them to myself in such matters.

I remind the House of the basic statistics. At least 40 per cent. of the cars which are criminally taken are damaged when the owner gets them back, but criminal damage is charged in only 6 per cent. of cases. That is the problem which the Bill seeks to solve.

I deal now with dangerous driving and the injuries that it causes. Under the law at present, conviction for reckless driving or for causing death by reckless driving needs proof of who was driving at the material time and what was his state of mind. It will be easier to convict under the Road Traffic Act 1991, but it will still be necessary to identify the driver. That is perhaps not so difficult when the vehicle is registered in his name, but it is a different story when he is one of a number of possible drivers, all certainly involved but none of them owning up to it.

The criminal law demands certainty—and rightly so—before a person is found guilty of having committed a specific criminal act. However, is it relevant to know precisely which of a group of people who are already guilty of knowingly taking or travelling in that vehicle—the point on which we agreed a moment ago—had his foot on the pedal at that moment? The mischief would not have happened had the vehicle not been taken in the first place. Who is to say which of the takers or passengers is sufficiently personally culpable to get extra punishment? The Bill answers that question: they all are.

Over the past few months we have witnessed a succession of very nasty cases of aggravated vehicle taking. In some cases, the law has been able to punish the basic taking itself. It has also, on occasion, been able to provide more serious charges against some of the offenders involved—in some cases it has been possible to charge for manslaughter. Thanks to the efforts of the police, the Crown prosecution service and the courts, it has, on occasion, managed to bring serious charges in some really bad cases, but it has not, and cannot, treat the total mischief with the certainty and severity which it deserves. The Bill will enable it to do so.

Clause 1, which is the heart of the Bill, defines the new offence and sets out what needs to be proved, and what does not need to be proved, before someone can be convicted under it. It is important to recognise at the outset that the Bill does not create a stand-alone criminal offence. Its penalties apply only to those who took the vehicle or got criminally involved with it before it was recovered. The standard of proof for the basic taking of the vehicle remains unchanged.

Under clause 1, it must also be proved beyond doubt that at least one of the four specified aggravating events occurred after the vehicle was first taken and before it was recovered. I emphasise to the House that those "aggravating events" are the four events listed at the bottom of page 1 of the Bill:

"(a) that the vehicle was driven dangerously on a road or other public place;

"(b) that, owing to the driving of the vehicle, an accident occurred by which injury was caused to any person;

"(c) that, owing to the driving of the vehicle, an accident occurred by which damage was caused to any property, other than the vehicle;

"(d) that damage was caused to the vehicle itself."

The Bill will not convict anybody of the crime of criminal damage, or the crime of reckless or dangerous driving, or any crime against the person. It is simply recognising an aggravated form of an existing Theft Act 1968 offence, where a vehicle is taken without the owner's consent, and damage, danger or injury follow which would not have happened if the vehicle had not been taken in the first place.

The House will also understand that clause 1 does not reverse the normal onus of proving who committed an offence. It does not do so because, under the Bill, who may or may not have committed a separate criminal offence is not relevant. The Bill does not want any legal argument about the precise state of mind of those involved. It does not want to know whose foot was on the pedal, whose hand on the wheel or handbrake, or who might have said what to whom. The Bill is looking at the total aggravating consequences of the whole joyriding event, and it states that everyone guilty of taking, or travelling in the car should be liable for more serious punishment.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): The offence differs from the existing regime, in that there is to be a new maximum penalty of five years. Where the offender is under 18—a juvenile—he is presumably still caught by the ceiling of the maximum of two years for all juveniles. In the north of England, which can readily claim to be the taking-and-driving-away capital of Europe, about 90 per cent. of offences are committed by juveniles. How will the Bill improve the way that they are treated?

Mr. Baker: At present, 15 and 16-year-olds may receive a sentence of only one year's custody unless they are guilty of an offence likely to carry a penalty of more than 14 years—usually rape, domestic burglary, murder, arson and such offences. That will not change. To answer my hon. Friend's question directly, at present, the maximum penalty for the existing offence is six months, but very few offenders actually receive six months: instead, they receive about two or three months. Due to the custody rule of one year, the period for 15 and 16-year-olds can rise to one year.

I know what lies behind the anxieties of the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery—that the onus of proving who committed an offence should not be reversed. I daresay that that will be debated not only on Second Reading but in Committee later today. The only excuses to which the Bill will listen will be the two set out in subsection (3) of new clause 12A: that the relevant aggravating offence—the damage to the car or other property or injury to people—occurred before the person committed his basic taking offence, or that he was nowhere near the vehicle at the time.

Those defences depart from the liability principle at the heart of the Bill only to this limited extent. When the accused can show that the damage occurred before he got involved or after he had abandoned the car—perhaps two days later—the Bill lifts his liability. The accused has to be able to show that to the court. In common with other statutory defences of this kind, it is for the defence to show on the balance of probabilities that they apply.

A person convicted under clause 1 could face an unlimited fine and up to five years' imprisonment for the worst cases. Clause 3 also provides for obligatory disqualification in magistrates courts and the Crown court, and for obligatory endorsement and penalty points when, for some exceptional reason, the first penalty is not applied.

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): What evidence does the Home Office have that these young people will be deterred by large increases in fines? Many of them are unable to pay fines of this sort in any case, so how do they constitute a deterrent?

Mr. Baker: Many young people will be deterred from joyriding by this Bill. First, not only the person doing the driving away will be liable to the penalties under the Bill: all the other people in the car will be. That is an extension of the existing offence of taking and driving away. Such people will also be liable to be charged with the aggravating offence. That will have some effect on people piling into a car to go off joyriding.

There is also a possibility of an unlimited fine. My hon. Friend will know that under other legislation passed by the House, parents can be held liable for such fines. That too is a deterrent. We are building into the offence a series of deterrents, including disqualification. We are trying to prevent these young hooligans and criminals from grabbing cars and creating mayhem thereafter.

I remind the House that clause 2 provides that the new offence is to be tried summarily if the only aggravating event was damage and the total value of that damage was below the threshold set in the Magistrates Courts Act 1980 —£2,000—for criminal damage. The offence can be tried either in a magistrates court or a Crown court.

This Bill has been described as tough on joyriders. It is, and I make no apologies for that. It is tough because this so-called joyriding is tough—tough on victims, tough on property, tough on whole communities whose daily life and business have been ruined by hooligans on wheels. The Bill will enable the law to recognise the full consequences of what is involved. It will send the clearest possible message to the people who get involved that society will not tolerate such behaviour.

4.33 pm

Mr. Roy Hattersley (Birmingham, Sparkbrook): No one can or should doubt the seriousness of the problem to which the Bill relates. Car crime is now endemic in Great Britain, and the disease has reached epidemic proportions. The Home Secretary talked of attempting to prevent the plague of car crime from getting out of hand, but it is out of hand already. Last year, there were almost 500,000 recorded offences of theft or unauthorised taking of motor vehicles—an increase of 25 per cent. on the previous year's figure. Many of those offences were due to young men —it is a peculiarly male crime—taking cars, not to sell them for profit, but to drive them illegally in a fashion mortally dangerous to themselves and to others.

The question that we must decide today is whether the Bill will achieve a material reduction in the number of such offences. I have no doubt that, from time to time, the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) and the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) will pop up in the House or on television to tell us that it will indeed have exactly the prescribed effect. In the spirit of Christmas, I must say that I have no doubt at all that, if the Government announced their intention to slaughter the holy innocents on 28 December, the hon. and learned Gentleman and his hon. Friend would pop up again to congratulate the Home Secretary on his perception, sagacity, compassion and commitment to the public good. Other more objective observers have concluded that the Bill will have little or no effect.

The majority of known car crime offenders are teenage boys: 34 per cent. of offenders are aged between 15 and 16 and 39 per cent. between 17 and 20. The need to prevent young men from behaving in a way that is often lethal to themselves and to others, and at the very best causes inconvenience and distress, is not in doubt: the question is whether the Bill will have that effect. Its purpose is the creation of deterrents so severe that young men will think twice before embarking on theft and reckless driving. Unfortunately, the group whom the Bill targets are uniquely unlikely to be deterred even by the threat of a most extreme punishment.

Deterrents act only on rational men and women who consider and calculate the consequences of their actions. The car thief who takes a car to drive with reckless disregard for his own life and the lives of others does not make a careful calculation of what will happen when he is caught. In any event, those who take cars can already be imprisoned for up to six months for the simple act of taking and driving away. If reckless driving—it is now called dangerous driving—is involved, sentences of up to two years' imprisonment are possible. A young man who causes death by dangerous driving can be sentenced to five years' imprisonment and could be convicted of manslaughter and imprisoned for life. It is difficult to follow the argument that the penalties in the Bill will provide a deterrent which is not available at present. That point was made in an intervention by the hon. and learned member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile).

I wish to ask the Minister of State a specific question which I asked his right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office, the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) during her wind-up speech in the prison security debate. Why do the Government think that, by passing an Act which does little more than duplicate sentences already on the statute book, they will achieve a reduction in crime? The only possible reason is the hope that the publicity involved in passing a new Act of Parliament will in itself have some effect. I have my doubts. I do not believe that potential criminals of this type read Hansard or, for that matter, newspaper reports of Parliament with the assiduity that we would all wish. In any case, I am opposed to the idea of legislation as a form of public relations. That can only lead to bad law.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): I am grateful to the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) for giving me the opportunity to answer his question, which I shall do in two ways. First, the right hon. Gentleman asked why we need this change in the law. He echoed the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlisle). It is because of the evidential difficulties of bringing a successful prosecution, under all the different statutory provisions to which the right hon. Gentleman referred, when so-called joyriding takes place. Secondly, we can argue until the proverbial cows come home about whether deterrents work in this or that circumstance, but deterrence is very important, as also is punishment and keeping offenders off the streets.

Mr. Hattersley: Perhaps the Minister of State did not altogether follow my point. Rightly or wrongly—I believe it to be right—my point is that punishment, by which the Minister sets great store, is already available. The Bill is mere duplication. As to the arguments about evidence, the Minister must know that we are concerned only with the very small proportion of young men who commit this particular offence. On some occasions evidence may be more easily obtained and more readily lead to a conviction, but we are very dubious about the procedures that the Bill sets down for obtaining evidence and obtaining conviction.

I should like to echo another point made by the hon. and learned Member for Montgomery. I agree that there are the greatest dangers in completing all the stages of the Bill in a single day—as is the Government's intention and as, no doubt, will be the outcome of today's deliberations—but it seems particularly foolish to rush through the Bill in this way when penalties and punishments are already available to deal with the offence that we are debating. We may, of course, argue about how adequately those penalties and punishments deal with it——

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): If the right hon. Gentleman disagrees with the Government's approach, does he, on behalf of his party, have any specific proposals for dealing with the problem, especially in relation to 15 and 16-year-olds?

Mr. Hattersley: Of course I do. I listed them briefly in our debate on the Gracious Speech and have advocated them on many other occasions. If the hon. Gentleman can bear to remain with us until the end of my speech, he will hear exactly what they are.

Mr. Devlin: I was interested in the right hon. Gentleman's reply, because his proposals have not come to fruition in the amendments. Nothing on the amendment paper would beef up the law in terms of the aggravated offence.

Mr. Hattersley: When the hon. Gentleman has been a Member of the House for a little longer—representing another seat after the general election—he will come to understand that one can amend a Bill only according to what is in it. One cannot deal with its inadequacies in terms of its total omissions. If he, too, will bear with me until the end of my speech, he will hear me list some of those total omissions.

The truth about the Bill is that it is a return to the formula that has characterised the Home Secretary's behaviour throughout the year. A real problem is identified, such as dangerous dogs, prison mutiny and, now, reckless driving. The right hon. Gentleman said several times that this problem had come to light "over the last few months". Indeed, the right hon. Gentleman's epitaph will be "over the last few months" or "over the last few weeks" or "over the last few days", because he lives according to a very short time scale.

The right hon. Gentleman discovered the problem through reading the headlines, and decided to take action on it. There was then much vacillation about what, if any, response was possible and about what that response should be. In the case of dangerous dogs, the Home Secretary said that nothing could be done; then he promised wholesale slaughter; and then he left us with an inefficient and ineffective compromise.

Today is the culmination of a process which began with the promise to the Tory party conference of "robust action". As we now know, that was said before the legislation was prepared. The process continued with the omission of the Bill from the Queen's Speech, because at that time there was no certainty that the legislation could be prepared. The process now ends with a proposal which is probably ineffective and which does nothing whatever to deal with the generality of car thefts.

We are again left with the conclusion that the Home Secretary's principal intention is to make headlines rather than to find solutions. It is reminiscent of the great spring offensive against crime, which was based on a massive advertising campaign and encountered the signal problem that neither the thieves nor the burglars seemed to read the advertisements.

Mr. Anderson: Can my right hon. Friend speculate on the Home Secretary's motive for truncating all stages into one day? Is the Home Secretary saying that allowing the Bill to go to a Special Standing Committee, which might have the benefit of advice from outside legal opinion which might improve the Bill, would have no potential benefit for the quality of the legislation? What is the emergency which demands that the Bill's passage must be completed before Christmas?

Mr. Hattersley: The only possible conclusion is that rushing the Bill through the House in one day adds to the air of urgency. I have sworn to do two things never in any circumstances. The first is to try to read the Home Secretary's mind and the second is to call for his resignation.

Mr. Baker: I must continue to disappoint the right hon. Gentleman on both counts. If he wants to read my mind, he should read what I say.

It is clear from what the right hon. Gentleman has just said that he is opposed to the general thrust of the Bill. If he is so opposed, why do we have an agreement, through the usual channels, to take the Bill through in one day? The right hon. Gentleman must have been party to that. He must have been asked about it and approved it. If he is really opposed to the thrust of the Bill—which I assure him, if he is about to criticise whether the law will be tougher, marks a considerable toughening of the law and is much tougher than the right hon. Gentleman could produce—he should vote against the Bill tonight so that the whole country can see how he wants to water the law down and how lame his proposals are.

Mr. Hattersley: When provoked, the right hon. Gentleman always changes from a second-class Home Secretary to a third-class party chairman—[Interruption.] We shall certainly not oppose the Bill but we shall, of course, vote for the amendments that are necessary to improve it. If the Home Secretary, like some of his Back Benchers, will contain himself with patience for a little longer, I shall describe some of our improvements to the whole area of policy which the right hon. Gentleman touched on but did not deal with in sufficient detail.

Mr. Shersby: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: Yes, but this must be the last time because I must make progress.

Mr. Shersby: The right hon. Gentleman referred to the need for urgency and asked why the Bill was being rushed through the House. That is a perfectly fair question, but does he agree that the tragic deaths of several people, as recently as the day on which the Queen's Speech was being read in the other place, must place on all hon. Members a degree of urgency to deal with this terrible problem?

Mr. Hattersley: Of course I agree with that in principle, but it begs the question whether the Bill will prevent the tragic occurrences to which the hon. Gentleman referred. We rushed through the Dangerous Dogs Act 1991, but a young boy was killed by dogs a fortnight ago. The idea that passing the Bill will automatically prevent such things is a mistake——

Mr. Baker: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way on that particular case?

Mr. Hattersley: In a minute——

Mr. Baker: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hattersley: I will give way at the end of the next paragraph.

The Home Secretary has——

Mr. John M. Taylor (Solihull): How do we know when the right hon. Gentleman is at the end of his paragraph?

Mr. Hattersley: I shall give way to the Whip if he would like to intervene.

I was in the process of commending the Home Secretary for the Government's one positive initiative. I refer to the attempt to persuade British motor manufacturers to produce more secure cars. However, after three years of attempted persuasion, beginning with a meeting in Downing street in 1988, the initiative has not yet succeeded. I was delighted to see a television commercial last night which commended a car that was unlikely to be stolen. In the age of European car production, there are difficulties in persuading manufacturers to incorporate security features the necessity for which is limited to Britain. The French, Germans and Italians do not suffer from the disease to the same extent. That, I suppose, is why it is necessary to obtain common European standards——

Mr. Baker rose——

Mr. Hattersley: In one moment. I will let the Home Secretary know when I have finished.

I congratulate the Home Secretary on initiating and pursuing the idea of a common European safety standard——

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): What sort of paragraph is that?

Mr. Hattersley: As this is the first day of the Maastricht summit, I cannot resist asking the Home Secretary why he believes that car locks are a suitable subject for Community competence when unfair dismissal procedures and minimum working conditions are not. By any standard, car locks and safety devices are intruding into what the Foreign Secretary calls the "nooks and crannies" of our normal life. I am in favour of that, but I thought that the Government were not.

Mr. Baker rose——

Mr. Hattersley: If the Home Secretary would like me to give way, I am happy to do so.

Mr. Baker: A paragraph from the right hon. Gentleman borders upon eternity, but before he started that long, long paragraph, he made a careless, damaging and harmful comment about a tragic accident which took place a few weeks ago when a young boy was killed in his own garden, alas, by three dogs. It is typical of how the right hon. Gentleman argues in his ill-informed way, grabbing at a few facts, imperfectly understood, that he should try to say that the Dangerous Dogs Act was imperfect because it allowed that tragic accident to occur. It had no effect on that tragic accident because, as the right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well, to do away with the possibility of such accidents, one would have to forbid the ownership of all dogs in almost all circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman should try not to make such cheap points, but I am afraid that that is typical of the way in which he seeks, time and again, to argue his case.

Mr. Hattersley: The Home Secretary simply makes the point that I made, at rather less length. The fact that we pass legislation to prevent tragedies of one sort or another does not mean that those tragedies will be avoided, although I trust and hope that that will be so. The contention of the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby), with which I entirely agree, is that the House has a special duty to move swiftly when it is sure that to do so will avoid a national ill, but I am not prepared to accept the assumption underlying his contention that by passing the Bill we shall solve the problem.

I welcome the one positive initiative that the Home Secretary has taken, to which he referred during his speech —the attempt to make British cars more secure—but that positive action should have been reinforced by a swathe of other positive proposals. Chief among them should have been a co-ordinated attempt to deflect young men at the first opportunity from a practice which turns into an obsession. The problem with such young men is the numbers in which they commit their crime.

[Mr. Hattersley]

The Criminal Justice Act 1988 was intended to overcome the difficulty of Crown courts being inundated with young men who had taken cars and been apprehended before they had done any damage to themselves or anyone else. That Act amended section 12 of the Theft Act 1968, which virtually created the offence of taking and driving away. The offence carried a maximum penalty on summary conviction of six months' imprisonment and a £2,000 fine.

Although the offence was intended to be a low-grade offence with a low-grade punishment, police authorities throughout the country complained of difficulties of getting prosecutions into court. The Crown prosecution service often insists that the cost of prosecution, which is estimated at £190 per hour, is not justified, and proposes a caution instead of prosecution. That is especially the case when the crime is committed by juveniles.

I have no doubt that action should be taken to prevent young men—some of whom, as the hon. Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) said, have been cautioned up to a dozen times—from developing an ingrained course of conduct. We know how that can be achieved. The Home Office working group which reported as long ago as 1988 showed that of 4,500 youngsters who, having been held responsible for motoring offences, attended special motor projects, only 100 committed car-related offences in the weeks and months that immediately followed.

There are examples from throughout Britain of the success of such schemes. One notable example is in south London, where, according to the probation officers who run the scheme, the reoffending rate is 9 per cent., compared with 80 per cent. in adjacent areas. There is no doubt that widespread development of such schemes would cut the number of car thefts.

However, the schemes that I have described suffer from one disadvantage. They seem to the unthinking to provide pleasure rather than punishment. I take a wholly pragmatic view. If schemes result in a reduction in car crime, I am in favour of them. That seems to be the sensible approach, and one which the sufferers from this epidemic would welcome.

I admit that many young men who are required to attend such schemes might have to go through the courts to obtain a probation order, but that would be a price well worth paying for an extension of sentencing in the community where it is a proven success. That is why the Opposition regret that, alongside the proposals that the Home Secretary has made today, he has not already instituted a massive programme of the nature which his own research demonstrates to be the most effective way of tackling car theft.

Such a programme would have tackled the causes of the crime and prevented thousands of young men from developing an obsession which can lead to destruction of property, injury and even death. It would not have sounded spectacular, as the Bill does, and it would not have appealed to the people who believe that the only response to crime is more severe punishment, but it would have been effective. As the only virtue of such schemes is practicality, however, they do not appeal to the Home Secretary.

I ask the Home Secretary specifically what is happening to the proposed scheme in Oxford, where the Blackbird Leys incident last summer caused so much damage and distress. I understand that the police and the probation service are anxious to develop motor projects and are waiting for Home Office approval and the promise of a Home Office grant.

There is one immensely important objection to the Bill as it is currently drafted. I shall deal with it briefly, not to minimise the strength of our objection, but because it is the subject of the first group of amendments with which we hope to deal in the Committee stage. In effect, the Bill creates two levels of car crime. The basic act of stealing a car is defined in section 12(1) of the Theft Act 1968. Clause 1(2) stipulates the ways in which offences can be aggravated, or made more serious, and attract additional penalties.

I understand—and, within the limited value of the Bill, accept—the advantages of warning a young man who steals a car that if, by his reckless behaviour, a pedestrian is killed or injured or damage is done to property, he will be subject to more severe penalties. Within the limitations of the Bill, I understand the purpose and advantage of that proposal, although it is worth repeating that the young man is probably already liable to penalties of similar severity even before the Bill is passed.

Surely it cannot be right that the man who commits the basic offence—and is liable to prosecution under the 1968 Act—may become liable under the Bill, even though his actions, or those which he is accused of taking, are not actions which he takes knowingly or wilfully or which are likely to exaggerate the offence in the way the Bill stipulates. That is in defiance of the principle of English law which requires the prosecution to demonstrate the wilful commission of an unlawful act. [Interruption.] As I see some scepticism on the Treasury Bench, I shall give an example of what I mean, which I hope will demonstrate the unacceptable point.

A young man steals a car and is indictable under the original Act. Let us assume that the young man loses his nerve, or retains his senses, and pulls up in a lay-by with the intention of leaving the car and walking home. If he succeeds in that endeavour and leaves the car and walks home, he can still rightfully be prosecuted under the Theft Act 1968. Clearly, no one would object to that. But if he climbs out of the car to walk home and another driver, legally in charge of his vehicle, swerves off the road and hits the stolen stationary car, the man who stole the car is guilty of the aggravated offence and liable to the additional penalties.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire South-West): Quite right.

Mr. Hattersley: I hear the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) say that that is right. How can it be right to say that someone is guilty of an offence if he gets out of the car and walks away, but guilty of a worse offence if he gets out of the car and walks away and someone hits the car?

Mr. Alex Carlile: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the problem goes a stage further? Courts will not sentence people for those things which they have not done. Whenever a case comes before a court, there will be a prosecution version and a defence version of the facts. The label given to the offence is often misleading, because if the defence disputes the prosecution's version of the facts—even if there is a guilty plea—there will be what is called a

Newton hearing to determine exactly what the defendant did. Therefore, if the facts are as the right hon. Gentleman suggested, the young man will receive the sentence that he would have had for the lesser offence in any event. So the distinction is wholly artificial.

Mr. Hattersley: That is my view.

Sir Anthony Grant rose——

Mr. Hattersley: I think that we are about to hear why the courts will sentence a man for something that he has not done, did not wish to do and, indeed, attempted not to do.

Sir Anthony Grant: There is a much simpler explanation of the point that the right hon. Gentleman made. The fact is that, if the offence of stealing and taking away the car had not been committed, the other car would not have run into the first one.

Mr. Hattersley: While that is patently true, the man in my hypothesis has created exactly the same circumstances and committed exactly the same offence whether or not something wholly fortuitous happens to him. I agree with the hon. Member for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile). The distinction may be clear to Conservative Members, but it will not be obvious to the courts. In consequence, the courts will not share the Home Secretary's judgment.

The Home Secretary's judgment is that the Bill makes individuals responsible for the consequences of their actions. We are all in favour of that, but it can be seen from examples which anyone can make up that the Bill makes people responsible for actions which are not their own but the actions of others. I do not believe that that will be acceptable to the courts, not least because the issue is much complicated by the defence set out in clause 4, which reverses the burden of proof in a way which extends the innovation which first came into English law in the legislation prohibiting the carrying of knives in public places.

According to clause 1(3)(b), a conviction is not possible if a driver proves that "he was neither in nor on nor in the immediate vicinity of the vehicle" when the aggravated offence took place. That vitiates the defence of the Bill by the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West, who said that because the person stole the car he was responsible even if he was when the aggraved offence took place. The hon. Gentleman's argument is totally invalidated by the Bill. More importantly in terms of that argument, however, the defence of clause 1(3)(b) requires the defendant to prove his innocence, and thus contradicts a basic principle of English law.

"neither in nor on nor in the immediate vicinity of the vehicle"

I draw the Home Secretary's attention to another area of legitimate doubt—automatic disqualification from driving as set out in clause 3.

Mr. John Patten: On that basic point of principle, the right hon. Gentleman surely recalls that, under the Prevention of Corruption Act 1916, a person convicted of corruption has to prove that moneys in his possession were gained from activities which were other than corrupt activities, or that under the Sexual Offences Act 1956 a convicted pimp has to prove that his moneys were not gained from immoral activity? Also, under the 1971 drug legislation, a person with a cannabis plant in their garden has to prove that they did not know what it was. There is no great principle adduced in British law, and the right hon. Gentleman cannot refer to one because it does not exist, as I have just demonstrated.

Mr. Hattersley: I confess my ignorance of the three laws that the Minister has brought to my attention, but I recall vividly the first Act of this Parliament, which concerned carrying offensive weapons in public places. I read the speech of the then Home Secretary—now the Foreign Secretary—this morning, in which he dealt at great length with what he described as a new principle of English law, in which a man found to be carrying such weapons was required to demonstrate that he was not doing so for an unlawful purpose. He described that as a reversal of our normal rules of evidence. His speech four and a half years ago was explicit in saying that that was unique to that sort of offence. If it was unique, this is the first extension of it that I know of.

Mr. Anderson: Surely the new principle of law to which my right hon. Friend takes exception is that a penalty can be aggravated as a result of circumstances over which the person has no control. That was the case in the example that my right hon. Friend gave about a lay-by. That penalty would be even more aggravated in the case of a passenger, whose mens rea may extend to riding in a vehicle which he knows to be stolen, but it does not follow that he has any control over the manner of driving.

Mr. Hattersley: That was my first objection. My second concerns the reversal of the burden of proof, and my third concerns the automatic disqualification from driving, as set out in clause 3. However, that may not be an objection if the Minister of State can give a cogent explanation. There is some doubt about whether a 14 or 15-year-old offender will be influenced by the discovery that he will be denied a licence two or three years later. More important is the effect that automatic disqualification would have on proper rehabilitation, which in some ways would be made impossible by such a requirement.

When the Minister of State winds up the debate, will he tell us if he can imagine circumstances in which a sentence —perhaps a custodial sentence—has been served and it would be sensible to direct the offender into some activity which requires a driving licence? I can imagine that that might be part of the corrective training, or even part of the punishment. Will he think about that and tell us whether he still believes that mandatory disqualification is the right course to follow?

I admit that all those considerations are practical, and the Government are far less concerned with practical consequences than with public impact. In our way, we shall persist in examining each Bill brought before us in terms of its real and relevant issues, and that is how we intend to continue to behave when we get into Government.

Mr. Baker: Before the right hon. Gentleman sits down, I have listened to his speech carefully——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. Has the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) completed his speech?

Mr. Hattersley: Yes.

5.4 pm

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman (Lancaster): There can be few more mindless crimes than that which used to be known as "joyriding", but is now correctly described as death riding, because that is what, sadly, it so often becomes, as far too many families in the land now know.

Under the present law, the penalty for taking and driving away a car is a derisory six months, yet those thugs —usually young thugs—wreck people's lives, destroy property and terrify innocent pedestrians of all ages.

I was delighted when I heard the Home Secretary say in October that he proposed to introduce a new offence to tackle the problem. At that time, he proposed to provide for automatic disqualification, a maximum penalty of two years in imprisonment and an unlimited fine—good, but not quite good enough.

I was glad that, when the Bill was drafted, the proposed penalty was increased from two to five years. However, even that is not a sufficient penalty for those who mindlessly destroy other people's lives—and not only the lives of the people they kill. To lose a much-loved child or partner—often the parent of a young family—can cruelly affect many more lives than the person who was killed. We must bring home to these scatterbrained young hooligans the seriousness of what, to them, is a light-hearted prank or blatant exhibitionism.

The thought of spending a few dull years in gaol although the Opposition appear to discount it—should help to dampen even the most foolhardy. Under the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988, there is a power to disqualify youngsters who are under the legal driving age. It is used far too rarely. All too often those youths are legally able to drive when they become 17. It is to be hoped devoutly that, whatever the Opposition may say—they do not seem to like this provision at all—that power will now be more widely used.

Moreover, since the offences covered by the Bill are usually committed by the young, more youngsters will be caught in the net and will be liable to a term of disqualification, which can be unlimited and applies—as do the other penalties—to passengers as well as to the driver. That is important and fair, since egging-on by passengers is all too often the cause of the disaster, as a recent case has shown only too clearly. It will no longer be necessary to prove who was driving, which is sometimes difficult, since all those involved will now be liable. Thus another loophole is usefully closed by the Bill.

Apart from the penalties under the Bill, penalties of life imprisonment for murder or manslaughter are still available under other legislation. However, the Bill tackles not merely injury to persons, but the damage to other people's property which criminals can cause.

As with much criminal law, it is essential for people who have knowledge of the offenders to speak out. It is no kindness to a son or daughter—however much loved—to shield them from the consequences of their criminal behaviour. It must be agonisingly hard to shop someone whom one loves, but we must create a climate of opinion in which that can and will be done.

Anyone taking a vehicle without the owner's consent, or driving or being a passenger in such a vehicle, will be liable under the Bill for tougher sentences if any of the aggravating circumstances—injury, death or damage—takes place between the taking and the recovery of the vehicle. I am bound to say that the shadow Home Secretary's example was ludicrous in the extreme.

Mr. Kenneth Baker: Absolutely, and the right hon. Gentleman would not give way to me.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: The right hon. Gentleman would not give way to the Home Secretary.

It will be no excuse to plead that the consequences were not intended or foreseen or directly caused by that person. All too often, especially on motorways, a relatively small initial error can cause an horrendous chain of consequences. In the right hon. Gentleman's example, that was exactly what happened: the man got out of the car and another driver swerved to avoid him. If the young man did not cause that to occur, I should like to know who did, as my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant) asked. Under the Bill, the person taking and driving away the vehicle will be liable for the chaos and mayhem that can follow the initial act of folly.

All in all, I welcome the Bill and wish it a speedy passage. The only matter that puzzles me is why those on the Liberal and Labour Benches do not see the urgent need for the legislation. Those in Oxford, Liverpool, Newcastle and many other cities undoubtedly do.

5.10 pm

Mr. David Young (Bolton, South-East): It is not for me to analyse in the House today the reasons for the escalation in car theft. Part of it may be due to boredom caused by unemployment and some of it may well be due to our acquisitive society. Where material gain is everything, the law suffers as a result.

It is clear that, in many of these cases, there is complete contempt for the law as it stands, not unlike that shown by certain store owners who, when faced with a vacillating and weak Government, use their commercial power to bring the entire law into disrepute. I see little difference between the contempt in which a car thief holds the law and that of those who continue to open their stores because the Government are not prepared to uphold the law. I will not comment on who those store owners support financially, but many are the financial friends of the Tory party.

Car theft is not simply an offence against property: it is potentially a lethal offence. Between 1 September and 30 October 1991, about 12 youngsters died. Some died as a result of their own actions, but others were innocent people who were mown down by cars being driven at least recklessly or by cars certainly out of control.

This is a serious problem in Bolton. In the first 10 months of 1991, 4,589 vehicles were taken and there were 4,903 thefts from vehicles and 2,533 charges of criminal damage involving vehicles. In total, about 11,000 innocent Boltonians suffered in one way or another from the crime. When these crimes continue to occur, it is the innocent who pay. It is the nurse who comes late off her shift to find her car stolen. It is the young man trying to hold down a job who finds his means of transport taken from him. Worst of all, it is those who are killed by the stolen cars. If we believe in a law-abiding society, this must be a matter of concern to us all.

What saddens me most is that we do not have as much will as we should have to get rid of the crime. With a small amount of the dedication that the Tory party showed in the way it attacked miners and trade unions, we would live in a law-abiding society. What we have is not a society of law and order, but a society of law and disorder.

I do not condemn the police for that. The clear-up rate in Bolton increased from 27 per cent. last to 41 per cent. this year. That is a creditable performance, but there remains a tremendous backlog from which criminals benefit.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn (Perth and Kinross): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Young: I will not give way now, because other Members wish to speak.

There is little point in passing legislation if the police do not have the means to apprehend the criminals.They cannot deal with people they do not catch. The problem in Bolton is that it is often the same people who repeat crimes. The crimes are not simply committed by people on bail. They are also committed by the same people time and again. This morning, the chief superintendent in charge told me of an individual who had stolen 30 vehicles. Clearly, if we wish to rid our streets of this danger, it is not enough to pass legislation. We must also provide the resources to enable the police to carry out the legislation.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Young: I am not giving way.

Equally important is the requisite facility of communication between police forces in different areas because, obviously, car crimes are not exclusive to one town or county. They spread across the length and breadth of the country.

What is apparently lacking is a meaningful deterrent. I am not talking simply about custodial sentences, although I do not rule them out. The Government must take in hand by every means in their power any scheme that will stop this crime. As I have emphasised time and again, we are not talking simply about the loss of property, bad as that may be; we are talking about the loss of life.

The people involved are often between the ages of 13 and 19. Often they have no worry about losing a licence, because a person who applies for a licence in the first place has some respect for the law. For the person with no respect for the law, why should the removal of a licence be any deterrent when that person has never had a licence anyway? Many of those involved are without funds.

The Bill has been cobbled together as a hopeful public relations exercise, but it will result in only a small reduction in the crime.

When such crimes are committed, it is the innocent in our society who pay. It is no good passing new legislation unless it reduces the incidence of the crime. We are seeking not simply to introduce punitive measures for use against the criminal, but to stop the crime of car theft and sweep it from our streets.

A few months ago, our television screens showed entire communities that were terrified. Men and women were afraid to walk on the streets of their own town or city because someone was racing around in a high-powered car that he could not control.

The preservation of the law is a matter for all parties. It is no good simply to claim in words, without actions, that one supports law and order, because, as the saying goes, the proof of the pudding is in the eating. So far, the taste of the proposed legislation has been nasty.

5.20 pm

Mr. Michael Shersby (Uxbridge): I declare that I am, as the House knows, parliamentary adviser to the Police Federation of England and Wales.

The federation and I support the Bill. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should be in no doubt that he has the full support of the federated ranks in trying to deal with this difficult problem.

The increased penalties are necessary. The penalty for the aggravated taking away of a vehicle, causing the death of innocent members of the public, must be introduced because the recent events in Oxford, Elswick and other towns and cities have shown that we cannot sit idly by and watch them repeated.

Until the passage of the Criminal Justice Act 1988, persons convicted of taking away vehicles without consent could be given a custodial sentence of up to three years. My right hon. Friend told us today that, of those sentenced, only about 3 per cent. each year received custodial sentences of more than six months. It is one thing to say that only 3 per cent. of those convicted receive custodial sentences, but it is interesting to consider the number of offences involved.

Those figures, which were given in answer to a parliamentary question that I tabled on 15 November, reveal that, in 1988, more than 20,000 persons were convicted, of whom 3,658 received immediate custodial sentences. Of those, 491 received a sentence of more than six months; 103 received a sentence of between a year and 18 months; 36 received a sentence of between 18 months and two years, and six received a sentence of between two years and three years.

Those figures show that substantial custodial sentences were imposed which cannot be considered light or as encouraging young people to take a risk in the belief that nothing serious will happen to them. The figure of 3 per cent. is a little misleading. The custodial sentences and the number of individuals who receive them are significant.

Mr. Anderson: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that it is not just the actual number of those who are sentenced to immediate imprisonment or to terms of imprisonment of six months or more that is significant? What is crucial is the signal given about the importance the Government attach to this offence. In 1988, the Government sent a clear signal that that offence was no longer so high in their scale of priorities. Does the hon. Gentleman agree, however, that that scale of priorities provides a deterrent in itself?

Mr. Shersby: I entirely agree. However, in 1988, the Government, and indeed the House, decided to reduce the penalty for the offence to a maximum of six months. The House agreed to the proposition that we should rely more on cautions and community service punishment. That decision was part of the policy, which had received support from all sections of the House, of reducing the number of people, particularly juveniles, sent to prison. It was also part of the policy of reducing the cost of criminal proceedings. I agree with what the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said about that.

[Mr. Shersby]

To some extent, the decision in 1988 has resulted—it is difficult to judge to how great an extent—in a massive increase in auto crime—the taking away of cars without the consent of their owners and, in some cases, racing them on the public highway. I cannot believe that there is no connection between the abolition of the custodial sentence of up to three years and the subsequent increase in auto crime.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Shersby: I shall give way to my hon. and learned Friend a little later.

The number of vehicles that have been used to ram-raid shops and other premises to steal goods of every kind from hard-working shopkeepers has also increased. That crime has not been referred to today, but it is a worrying and major part of the auto-crime scene.

Why do such things happen in our country? Some people will say that such crime is caused by unemployment and the recession, but that is not necessarily so. On the Blackbird Leys estate, it was clear to the police that the damage to cars and shops was done merely for pleasure, not for gain. Many of the youths involved in that crime were in full-time work or full-time education. It is true that some were unemployed, but there did not appear to the police to be any common denominator among them except that they lived on the estate or had relatives living there.

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): I live on the Blackbird Leys estate, and I can tell the hon. Gentleman that by no means all those who were caught up in the events were residents of the estate. It is an unfortunate feature of such confrontations that, once they start, every psychopath for miles around who wants to have a go at the police is pulled in. The people of Blackbird Leys and other parts of Oxford who are plagued with this problem are decent, law-abiding citizens. They are more anxious than anyone in the House to see this business brought to an end.

Mr. Shersby: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman intervened, because I know that he has a unique knowledge of precisely what happened.

I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that a number of youths who were in full-time education or in full-time work were responsible for what happened. Many of those in full-time education did not attend school, and some visited Oxford and committed shoplifting offences or car crimes around the city.

During September, the people of our nation sat watching a unique spectacle on their television sets. They watched as young people drove stolen cars at high speed on several estates, to the great danger of residents. "Hotting" was the term used by many of those youngsters to describe their activity. Stealing cars and driving them to destruction had become a dangerous craze, almost to the point of addiction.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: Will my hon. Friend give way?

Mr. Shersby: I will do so in a moment.

The House will recall that a computer scientist, Mr. Melvyn Davies, was clubbed and slashed in Oxford while going to the help of his girl friend, who had herself been stabbed in the body and in the face. He gave a succinct judgment about what happened when he said:

"We have got to stamp out this sort of thing or it will spread like wildfire and become a new craze for the yobs. We cannot let them ruin our lives."

That is one powerful reason why the House is considering the Bill. I believe that we owe it to Mr. Davies and to many others to pass it quickly.

We owe it not only to the people of Oxford but to those of Birmingham, Cardiff, Elswick, and even of rural Shropshire who have suffered. We owe it to the people of my own borough of Hillingdon, where only a week or so ago a teenager who had just stolen a car killed himself when he drove it into a tree at nearly 100 mph. There is no joy in those dangerous rides to death.

It is only as a result of sensitive and skilful policing in towns and cities that the problem will be kept under control. That kind of policing requires good police intelligence and first-class training. Fortunately for us all, those skills are possessed to a considerable degree by police officers of every rank.

The police have also demonstrated considerable success in building good relationships with the community, but they need the backing of the law and a powerful deterrent to prevent the craze of "hotting" from becoming a permanent feature of life in British towns and on estates.

Sir Nicholas Fairbairn: My hon. Friend spoke of "our nation", which includes a place called Scotland. Those new crimes are not occurring in Scotland—but if they were, there would be no difficulty in charging a person with reckless driving under the Road Traffic Act 1988, or, under common law, with assault to the danger of life, which should, if necessary, carry a penalty of life imprisonment.

Am I being told that the law of England is so deficient that, if one assaults a person by driving a car at them to the danger of that person's life or property—whether or not one damages either—that is not a crime known to the common law of England, and would it not attract the most condign penalties?

Mr. Shersby: My hon. and learned Friend makes an extremely valuable point. I am glad that he has drawn the attention of the House to the situation in Scotland and to the law of Scotland, which in so many ways is superior to that of England.

Although the Police Federation welcomes the Bill, it would prefer the basic offence of taking away without consent possibly to incur the same penalty as was available until 1988, of up to three years' custodial sentence. The Bill does not propose that: it proposes only that those who cause injury or damage shall be liable to imprisonment for up to two years—or, if it is proved that an accident caused death, of up to five years.

Over the past few days, police officers have asked me why a community has to wait until someone is injured or killed before an offender is sent to prison for a lengthy period. For most juveniles who steal cars and engage in "hotting", the maximum penalty will remain a six-month custodial sentence—although, as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said this afternoon, the fine will increase next year to £5,000.

I doubt whether many young people will be deterred by a fine of £1,000 or £5,000, because they do not have that kind of money available. However, it will be interesting to see whether, under the Criminal Justice Act 1991, their parents will have some liability, and perhaps exercise more supervision over their youngsters than they have in the past.

Mr. John Patten: Is my hon. Friend aware that, under the Criminal Justice Act 1991, the parents of convicted children will leave themselves liable to meeting an unlimited fine, as levied by a Crown court, if their children cannot themselves pay? That will act as a considerable encouragment to greater parental responsibility.

Mr. Shersby: I am aware of that provision, to which I was referring before I gave way to my right hon. Friend —and I hope that it will be widely understood by parents throughout the country. For the first time, to anything like that extent, parents are liable for the criminal activities of juveniles.

The Bill also imposes an automatic one-year driving ban, but I cannot help wondering how many young people will be deterred by that—particularly as many of them drive without a licence anyway. The police know that "hotting", ram-raiding, and related offences are committed by a comparatively small number of people, many of whom are persistent young criminals. Surely the threat of a custodial sentence would be a stronger deterrent—as it was before 1988—in addition to the longer sentences for which the Bill provides.

The Government give as reason for not reverting to the 1988 arrangements the small number of convictions previously secured. I believe that the real problem was that, before 1988, magistrates were under pressure from the Home Office not to award custodial sentences. If the will had been there and secure accommodation and prison accommodation had been available, I suggest that magistrates would have applied the law in the way that was intended when that legislation was passed.

I am told that, even today, most juveniles are cautioned or sentenced to community service, or receive a discharge because magistrates remain reluctant to award custodial sentences. However, in so many cases, the police and the courts are dealing with persistent reoffenders rather than with first-time offenders, for whom a caution or community service would be an appropriate penalty.

I turn to the taking away of children. Does my right hon. Friend consider that the Bill's provisions will deter the kind of thief who stole Mr. Peter Brown's BMW from a garage forecourt while Mr. Brown's infant daughter was in the back seat? According to Martin Newland's article in The Daily Telegraph today, Mr. Brown turned his back on his car for less than one minute. Mercifully, his car was abandoned three miles away, and two-year-old Natasha Brown was able to tell a passing couple that "a naughty man" had taken the car.

The prospect of community punishment or even six months' imprisonment did not deter the thief in that case. According to The Daily Telegraph, that was the latest in a series of incidents in which children were inadvertently taken by car thieves.

In another recent case, two-year-old James Austin, who had been left strapped into his baby seat by his mother, was driven away while she took some refuse to a rubbish dump some 50 yards from her parked car. Luckily, he was reunited with his mother unharmed.

Were both offences aggravated taking away? Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Minister will tell the House when he winds up. Neither child was injured, and nor were the cars damaged. I suppose that the thieves concerned could be charged with kidnapping or some other offence under common law. Perhaps my right hon. Friend could clarify that point, because that danger is a cause of great concern to many parents.

It is proper for the Government to act promptly, early in this Session, to deal with the problem. I understand the reservations expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House about the speed with which the Bill is being enacted. However, the offence is so serious, and parents and car owners are so concerned, that the House should not delay but ought to place the Bill on the statute book as soon as possible.

5.38 pm

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): This matter is of the greatest concern to my constituents, many of whom are at their wits' end as to what can be done to halt the murderous menace of the theft and racing of cars in residential city streets.

I support the Bill, because anything that can add to the action that can be taken against car thieves is welcome. Much more needs to be done. The Bill is much too little and comes much too late. It is, by itself, little more than window dressing on the part of the Government. Anyone who believes that the Bill will really be effective in catching, punishing and deterring the criminals in question is living in cloud cuckoo land.

The extensive national media coverage in August and September of confrontations with the police left many of the wider public with a distorted picture of the problem. Some of the media were interested only in portraying a violent image of Blackbird Leys. I know the estate well, because I live there. I place it on record that Blackbird Leys, Barton and the other parts of Oxford that are plagued by this menace are good places, with a terrific community spirit. Decent people who are sick and tired of the criminal activities of the few deserve a much better portrayal by the national media and more support from Government.

On Saturday night, volunteers from Blackbird Leys community centre provided—as they do every year—a free dinner and social evening, drinks and gifts for 250 local pensioners. They held a similar event back in the summer, when Blackbird Leys was in the headlines. On neither occasion were the media at all interested in covering the good news; they were interested only in hyping up the bad news.

When I add that youngsters have reportedly been paid by film crews to put on displays in stolen cars and that a recent Channel 4 programme tried—ludicrously and dangerously—to suggest that the real problem was police brutality, hon. Members will have some idea of the anger felt by my constituents about the gross irresponsibility shown by some of the media. They have let down the public and also let down colleagues who, in the local media and in some national programmes such as "Newsnight", have succeeded in giving a more accurate and balanced picture of events.

Now that the events of the summer are out of the headlines, some hon. Members, and members of the public who are not immediately affected, may imagine that the problem of theft and racing of cars has gone away. Sadly, that is not so. Reported car crimes in Oxford are running at 600 per month; car crime has doubled in the past four years, constituting one third of all crime reported in the city, and this year's figures are one third up on last year's.

[Mr. Andrew Smith]

Residents and police are in the front line of a war against hooliganism and car crime, including the displaying of stolen vehicles, which is now running at some 10 to 12 reported incidents per week. They were at it last night, as they are nearly every night.

Just a week ago on Saturday, the secretary of our Headington Labour club, remonstrating with a thug outside her home, was knocked to the ground and beaten. She, and all the other residents with the courage to stand up and defend decent values on behalf of their families and communities, deserve more support than they are receiving from the Government.

The police have taken action to combat the wave of car crime. In the past three months, there have been some 150 arrests in Oxford for car theft. I have the highest praise for the professionalism and dedication of the Oxford police and for the bravery that they have shown when confronted by ugly and sickening attacks.

Let there be no mistake: the Oxford public strongly support the police and they have our confidence. It is evident, however, that the police are overstretched and are having to fight the rising tide of car crime with insufficient officers and with one hand tied behind their backs. The Bill will barely scratch the surface of either problem. If the law is to be effective, the criminals must know that the chance of their being caught is high, as is the chance of their being convicted; and that they are certain to receive a sentence that matches the severity of their crime. Sadly, none of those factors applies today.

Even when their offences are of the ultimate gravity, some people are getting off far too lightly. An example is the appalling tragedy of lorry driver Leslie Parsons, who was killed last February when he was just doing his job. Let me quote from last Saturday's Oxford Mail:

"A teenager whose night of joyriding ended in the death of a lorry driver, was sent to a young offenders' institution for two years.

Alan Dawtrey was driving a Metro at about 80 mph on the wrong side of the road before it smashed into a lorry coming in the opposite direction, Oxford Crown Court heard.

Lorry driver Mr. Leslie Parsons, 51, lost control of the 28-ton lorry after colliding with the H-reg. car.

The lorry careered across the A423 Oxford to Henley road, hitting a second Metro before ploughing into the Harcourt Arms pub.

Mr. Parsons, of Fenny Compton, Warwickshire, a driver with Fine Lady Bakeries in Banbury, died from multiple injuries in the crash early on February 18.

The court was told that Dawtrey had been racing against the other Metro shortly before the crash in the village of Nuneham Courtenay, where there is a 40mph restriction.

Dawtrey, 18, of Boundary Brook Road, Oxford, who admitted causing death by reckless driving and five offences of taking vehicles without consent, was also banned from driving for four years.

The driver of the second Metro, Jamie Hughes . . . of King's Lane, Harwell, was also convicted of causing death by reckless driving. His sentence was adjourned for social inquiry reports.

Judge Leo Clark told Dawtrey it was a bad case, with a number of aggravating features which included running away from the scene 'in complete disregard for the lorry and its driver'."

Surely it is clear to anyone who might imagine that we are discussing an activity that could legitimately be called "joyriding"—from the incident that I have cited and from the horrors of the case in Liverpool, where a car ploughed into some children—just what a murderous evil that activity is.

I am fully aware of the importance of the independence of the courts and of the constraints that they face when sentencing juveniles. I imagine that, in the case that I cited, the offender was given the maximum sentence that could be conferred for causing death by reckless driving; but, given normal remission and remission for good behaviour, there is every possibility that that young man will be freed after nine months in custody. I cannot believe that many members of the public believe that that is justice, or that it conveys the right message to those who, tonight, will steal a car and race it in the path of some other innocent victim.

We should remember that causing death by reckless driving carries the same five-year maximum penalty as is included in the Bill. The public will want to know how many people who are convicted will serve five years and how many will serve nine months.

As the hon. Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) pointed out, the courts and the public receive very confused and contradictory messages from the Home Office and from Ministers, whose words suggest that the police and the magistrates must be backed up, but whose actions have on occasion deprived them of the support that they need. An example is the injunction on magistrates to do everything possible to keep people under 21 out of custody.

As my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said, some supervised car projects may be an effective alternative to custody; but do the Government give the probation service the resources that it needs to run such projects? Why, in Oxford, has it been left so far to the police, the voluntary sector and private sponsorship to try to cobble together a scheme? As my right hon. Friend asked earlier, when will the Home Office commit resources to that scheme?

Mr. John Patten: As the hon. Gentleman and I both have constituencies in the city of Oxford, I was interested to learn of the comparatively recent endeavours to introduce motor projects there. Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the Home Office received the first application from Oxfordshire only last week, on 5 December? It is under active consideration, however.

That application relates to the Oxfordshire motor project—which is aimed at those on probation, following conviction, unlike the diversionary projects to which the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) referred.

Mr. Smith: I hope that that means that support will be forthcoming.

My point is that, in general, the courts are under an injunction not to give custodial sentences to offenders under 21. If the alternatives are to work, we must take care that they are not seen as a reward for those who become involved in such activities. What about the kids who do not steal cars? Where are the projects that might stop them from doing so in the first place? Where the alternatives are to be provided, however, I believe that the Government are obliged, through the Home Office and the probation service, to fund them adequately.

Another example that illustrates the need for change is the diminished opportunity to pass deterrent sentences, not just in terms of the threat to society of a particular offender, but the threat to society that is posed by the crime at large in which these people are involved. That important point is well argued in an article in "Justice of the Peace" by Mr. T. G. Moore, who is deputy clerk to the justices in Nottingham. He points out:

"A court faced with a young offender who has been involved in the taking of vehicles, even though it may be his third or possibly fourth appearance, cannot simply pass a deterrent sentence on the basis of the prevalence of such offending in the locality . . . Section 1(4A)(b) of the 1982 Act deals with protecting the public from serious harm from the offender. The importance of the amendment by the 1988 Criminal Justice Act was that it added the words 'from serious harm from him' to the end of the sentence 'only a custodial sentence would be adequate to protect the public'. The case of R. v. Jacobs and Kinsella . . . makes it clear that the consideration which courts must now take into account is not whether a custodial sentence was necessary to protect the public from offenders generally of the same type, but whether it was necessary to protect the public from a particular offender. This indicates that if the court's desire is to protect the public from persons who take vehicles without the owner's consent, that is by a sense of general deterrence, then this particular criterion of the Criminal Justice Act will not be applicable . . . The question posed for the courts must be whether taking a vehicle without consent can ever, as an individual offence, be so serious that a non-custodial sentence cannot be considered. It is on this point, that the ordinary member of the public and, it is suspected, the average police officer finds it difficult to equate his own perception of the offence of taking without consent with the strictures placed upon the courts by legislation."

We are responsible for legislation. We have to take account of that article and ask what difference the Bill will make in this respect. The answer is that it will make no difference at all.

Even with such opportunities as the Bill presents to get cases into the Crown court, where the offence involves only damage to vehicles or property—the vast bulk of cases—it is the value of the damage to property, as set out in clause 2, that is the criterion, not the extent of the nuisance and danger, although that is the real problem with which we need to get to grips. To get such cases to the Crown court will therefore involve further cost to victims and trouble to the police in obtaining estimates from garages, builders and so on. An element of bureaucratic waste is built into the Bill.

I support the measure, but for those reasons I have no confidence that the Bill will make more than a very small difference. It is much too little much too late. Why has it taken the Government so long to take even this inadequate action? Local residents, the Thames Valley police and I were urging, long before the events of the summer, that something should be done. The Government cannot say, as an excuse, that they did not know what was going on and how it could escalate. I shall give some examples.

I raised what was happening—the racing and the attacks on police—at a meeting with the chief constable on 2 November 1990 at which the Foreign Secretary, the right hon. Member for Witney (Mr. Hurd), and the present Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), were present. The Home Secretary was fully briefed about the position when he visited Cowley in May this year. Again I stressed the seriousness of the matter and the need for more police officers at a meeting of Thames valley Members of Parliament which the Home Secretary was supposed to take, but which Lord Ferrers took instead, on 23 July this year.

The Home Office took more than six weeks even to respond to the points made, by which time the situation in my constituency had already exploded out of control. Home Office Ministers fiddled while tyres and a few petrol bombs burned. If the Government had listened to the police and taken prompt action on any of those warnings —action for which they could have secured all-party support—I have no doubt that some of this summer's tragedies would have been avoided.

Much more vigorous action than is provided for in the Bill is needed. We need more police officers, urgent changes to sentencing policy and an end to the nonesense whereby attempting to steal a car and attempting to drive while disqualified are no longer arrestable offences. Where the Government propose alternatives to custody, they must provide the resources to make them work.

As for the motor manufacturers, we need more progress and Home Office action to build on the excellent collaboration that the Rover Group has with Thames Valley police. We also need Government investment to back up the youth services, teachers and parents so that the next generation of youngsters does not include a minority whose self-discipline, self-esteem and respect for their own future are so lacking that they get kicks from racing stolen cars or lobbing bottles at the police.

The first duty of the Government is to work with the people to ensure security and freedom from fear for the people. This Home Secretary and this Government have failed that test. The Bill should be supported, but unless a much more determined attack on the problem, and its roots, is launched, we shall, I fear, have to address at some point in the future an even more hideous nightmare than that which confronts us now.

5.55 pm

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): We on this side of the House agree with much of what the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) said. It is a rare example of ecumenism—on a day other than a Friday—across party lines. However, before I so much as opened my mouth, the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) had attacked me. He had the impertinence to berate me for knee-jerk reactions on behalf of the Government when he opposes absolutely everything that the Government do, however sensible it obviously is. That is as genuine an example of a knee-jerk reaction as it is possible to get in this place. The right hon. Gentleman does it every time and under any circumstances.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook—and, I suspect, many other Opposition Members—are against all deterrent sentences. In addition, the right hon. Gentleman does not seem to be aware that, although potential joyriders may not read Hansard, the word about tough sentences having been imposed has a habit of getting around. Anyway, if the right hon. Gentleman had remained in the Chamber, he would have realised that much of what he said was total nonsense, for reasons to which I shall turn in a moment.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary on taking action against death riders—I agree with those who have already said that that is a much better way to describe these offenders who are not joyriders—and others who think that it is good fun to take somebody's car and drive it dangerously, thereby damaging property and sometimes killing people, thus causing appalling misery to those whose lives may be wrecked in the process. The public will be thankful to my right hon. Friend for his timely action, following the recent bout of appalling abuse in Oxford and the north of England and the immense misery that this atrocious behaviour has caused.

It is also important that we should all realise that surveys show that a quarter of all stolen cars are used for death riding, just as a quarter of all car thefts happen to unlocked vehicles—which is our fault. There is no reason why we should not lock our vehicles when we leave them and thus prevent that crime.

My right hon. Friend's action at large—to spur manufacturers to action to improve security—is also very welcome, as is his acknowledgement of the Government's role. If we can give tax concessions for unleaded petrol to improve the environment, surely we should not be aghast at the prospect of tax concessions to secure that alarms are fitted in our cars and that some protection is provided to stop a lot of this senseless crime.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend on identifying the fact that, apart from the commission of the taking and driving away offence, there is an additional factor that arises when injury and damage are caused, but that there is no adequate deterrent penalty for that aspect of the offence. However, deterrence will exist only when young people can be locked up in secure accommodation: if they cannot be locked up, all this will be a waste of time.

Having said all that, I am afraid that I cannot be as enthusiastic about the Bill as I should like. We support and accept the good sense of increasing sentences for offences that are worse than taking and driving away and of extending the deterrent of disqualification where personal injury and damage occurs, but it is quite another thing for someone to be guilty of additional offences that he does not commit, to which he is not a party and which he might not have foreseen as the likely consequences of his taking and driving away.

How would that occur? It would arise where a defendant could not prove, on the balance of probabilities, that his story was correct, that someone else was responsible for causing personal injury or damage to the vehicle taken or to other vehicles and articles, and that he was not a party to the offence. It would arise where, for example, the original taker and driver away was arrested, but after he had left the car and was going to have no more to do with it. He may not be able to call upon the driver who took over the car to support his defence and to help him discharge the balance of probabilities in his favour, because that driver would not want to expose himself to the criminal charges of aggravated car theft.

In the environment in which these cases occur, witnesses are young and can easily be intimidated. The accused also might not be able to call witnesses who saw the damage-causing driver, because that driver may have terrified the witnesses to prevent them from giving evidence. That seems to be the stuff of which miscarriages of justice are made.

I appreciate that the number of cases in which the taker and driver away is not the driver who goes on to cause personal injury or damage will be comparatively few, but I ask my right hon. Friend whether it is necessary to make such a draconian change in the traditional principles of British law, or to do it by reversing the normal burden of proof. Clause 1(3) says:

"A person is not guilty of an offence under this section if he proves".

Will my right hon. Friend reconsider whether this part of the Bill is necessary?

I support the intention of the Bill and its important deterrent aspects, and I shall support it for the same reason as the hon. Member for Oxford, East, but I must confess that I do so with some reluctance at this stage.

6.3 pm

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): If the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) had been here for the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley)—[HON. MEMBERS: "He was here."] If he had been listening, then, he would have heard my right hon. Friend's point about the lay-by.

Having said that, the hon. and learned Member for Burton makes a good point: it would offend against the views of ordinary persons and would be a crying sense of injustice if people who were not party to the aggravated crime and who had sought to distance themselves from it were found guilty because the balance of probabilities had fallen on them to prove their innocence. Anyone who has practised at the Bar knows well that, in the sort of case that arises on an estate, where a number of people are involved, intimidation is such that it may prove impossible for a young man to find witnesses to say that he had left the scene of the crime and that another person was guilty of aggravated theft.

Any amendment to the law that provides an aggravated penalty for someone who could not have foreseen that for which he is sentenced must be wrong. The Government must find an answer to that key point, which was made by the hon. and learned Member for Burton, who has long experience at the Bar, and by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook.

The Bill is an attempt to respond to widespread public concern. No one doubts that concern or that the offence is prevalent. Almost daily, my local newspaper, the South Wales Evening Post, publishes examples of what used to be called taking and driving away—joyriding. There is a graveyard for cars at Kilvey hill, where young men drive cars that they have taken without authority and then burn them. There is an immense feeling of anger among ordinary members of the public at the extent to which they are inconvenienced, and they are crying out for something to be done.

Magistrates are under a constraint not to send young people to prison. There is the problem of general deterrence, which my hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith) set out in his excellent speech on behalf of his constituents. Surely the Lord Chancellor should have issued guidance to justices on the tariff for sentencing in such cases.

The House may be interested to learn that hon. Members who represent south Wales constituencies hold fairly regular meetings with the south Wales constabulary. The main item on the agenda of our last meeting was joyriding. We saw several videos that the police had taken from helicopters showing the nature of the driving of some young drivers and the constraints on police in pursuing them, particularly in built-up areas. Guidelines have been issued to them on the point at which they must desist from the chase because of danger to the public. They expressed various other concerns, few of which are addressed in the Bill.

Although we must respond to the offence, we must avoid the "Something must be done" syndrome and ensure that we do not lash out wildly in some public relations exercise. Why must the Bill be completed today? Why do the Government reject the argument that even a Home Office Bill is capable of improvement? A Special Standing Committee could hear the views of practitioners, police officers and others on how the Bill could be improved.

Is the Home Office alleging or claiming that an emergency has arisen since the Conservative party conference, that the Bill must be completed in one day and that it is inconceivable that it could be improved in Committee? That is an arrogant view to take of the Bill. If there is such an emergency, why is there not a similar Bill for Scotland? Do the Government contend that the emergency is confined to England and Wales and somehow stops at the border?

The legal situation in Scotland differs from that in England and Wales. Section 178 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 applies in Scotland, rather than section 12(1) of the Theft Act 1968. Will the Government give an assurance that there will be a similar attempt to alter the law in Scotland if there is an emergency there?

Penalties in Scotland also differ from those in England and Wales. In Scotland, the penalty for a summary offence is three months' imprisonment or a fine, but not both. On indictment, the maximum sentence under section 178 of the 1988 Act is 12 months. Why is there a difference? If the emergency is so important, why are not the penalties for these aggravated offences equally applicable in Scotland?

As a Conservative Member asked in an intervention, if there is an adequate remedy under existing law, why is there a void in the current law in England and Wales? Surely the Government must either say that the position in Scotland is essentially different from that in England and Wales or provide a timetable within which they will aim to introduce equivalent legislation in Scotland.

There are other differences in penalties between England and Wales and Scotland with which we should deal. We must ask ourselves: who are the perpetrators of these offences, and what are their motives? As several hon. Members have asked, are these individuals, who typically are young men in their teens, likely to be deterred by the changes brought about by the Bill?

The south Wales constabulary interviewed young men who had committed these offences and the factors involved were set out. The plus factors included the kicks that those people got from driving in that way. One of the minus factors was clearly the risk of being caught and the associated penalty. How do we ensure that there is a much greater chance of catching those young men and adequately dealing with them? Is that matter addressed by the Bill?

The key question was put forcefully and eloquently by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook: is the lack of an adequate penalty the root of the problem, or can we tackle the matter in other ways—for example, by extending motor schemes in the way he described? My hon. Friend the Member for Oxford, East said that such schemes should be available not only for those who have already committed offences but for young people who might be tempted to do so, perhaps for kicks. Extending schemes, as suggested by my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook, would be a cost-effective way of dealing with the problem.

I am afraid that we are assuming too much from this proposed change and that it is a little too simplistic—a sort of professional defamation from those who believe that applying law and order is the only way of solving what are, in part, deep-seated social problems.

The issue is much more multi-layered than that. There are other key considerations, one of which is the near-certainty of detection. In this respect, police manpower levels are important. There was great astonishment and anger in south Wales when we heard by letter of 28 November 1991 the news that the Home Secretary was unwilling to agree any additional manpower for the South Wales police authority in 1992-93. The letter boasted:

"the South Wales Police has received approval for 99 extra police posts since the Government took office, with actual strength increasing by 198—or 7 per cent.—over that period."

That 7 per cent. must be put in the context of the more than 100 per cent. increase in this type of crime.

I certainly would not boast about that 7 per cent. Like everyone in the area covered by the South Wales police authority, I must ask why built-up urban areas such as Cardiff and Swansea will pass this Christmas—with all the great temptations offered to young people at that time—and go through 1992-93 with no increase in police manpower.

A wide range of powers are already available under statute law to combat this crime. Maximum sentences could be increased. As several hon. Members have said, the changes brought about by the 1988 Act—making this crime only a summary offence—should be reconsidered. If the Government are concerned about public expenditure and court time, will they make offences under section 12(1) of the 1968 Act indictable, rather than purely summary, offences for people who are making a second or subsequent court appearances?

The Bill does not deal with other key matters. If the Government wanted to reduce the number of obstacles that prevent prosecution of offenders, thereby making convictions more certain, they would alter the mens rea principle under section 12(1) of the 1988 Act and import the term "knowing or believing" from section 22 of that Act. That would put a lighter burden on the prosecution, and improve the chances of convicting an offender. Had the Government not thought that they could get the Bill passed without the House having a serious attempt to debate or qualify it, those matters could have been discussed with experts.

Our police forces have another major complaint about the Bill. They say that it does not deal with the problem of people who persistently reoffend while on bail. My local police force has given me remarkable examples of young people in the south Wales constabulary area who have persistently reoffended. In South Glamorgan, over a period of a year, a 15-year-old male took 15 cars and was involved in six house burglaries, one handling offence and six thefts. The most that that young man received was a supervision order for one year.

I shall not bore the House with the details of another case, but I shall summarise it. In West Glamorgan, a juvenile male was found guilty between the ages of 13 and 15 of offences involving 45 takings of cars, but it was only towards the end that he received a custodial sentence. One can well understand the anger and frustration of the police force. In another case in Mid Glamorgan, a young man between the age of 11 and 16—I pass over six or seven pages of antecedents—was involved in 32 burglaries, 34 thefts, 15 offences of criminal damage and 41 offences involving motor vehicles, but the most severe penalty that he received was a supervision order for 12 months. He gaily continued to offend and reoffend, to the point where the police wondered whether it was worth bothering to pick him up. Those are the problems that face our police force.

In 1990, 20 per cent. of detected crime in Mid Glamorgan was committed by juveniles. In South Glamorgan, that figure was 17 per cent. of the total, and in my area of West Glamorgan, the figure was more than 22 per cent. However, the police ask how the Government are helping them to deal with those who persistently offend. What happens when the police do detain such individuals? Should not more secure units be available for those juveniles while they are on remand? Some investment is at last being made in south Wales in that respect.

Other issues with which I shall not detain the House but which have been mentioned by other hon. Members include the design of motor vehicles, the admirable Which? survey, the question of insurance and rewarding those who take adequate precautions to secure their vehicles by having the means to immobilise them in case of theft, safety improvements and cases such as those in Swansea, where, for example, the local authority has now put attendants in several of the key car parks. The authority charges people to park there but the editor of my local papar—The South Wales Evening Post—said on 3 December:

"Many people will be pleased, and reassured, that Swansea City Council appears to be moving towards a policy of providing attendants for selected car parks."

The paper went on the say that such a move would at least give the people who came into the city centre greater reassurance, even if they had to pay for the privilege. The Government must deal with the issue of making crime more difficult for the young people who are tempted to perpetrate it, and local authorities can also help.

Clearly, the Bill is a step forward, by and large. It is an attempt to deal with a prevalent problem, but I fear a distortion—the Government are considering only one aspect of the issue. They are not attempting to modify the existing law in ways which would help the prosecution. I have mentioned some ways in which section 12(1) of the Theft Act 1968 might be amended. I have also mentioned the question of indictment after the first court appearance, and other hon. Members have suggested other means to tackle the problem. However, it would be wrong for the Government to hype the Bill too much, and to raise expectations which they certainly cannot meet.

Mr. Michael Irvine (Ipswich): The right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) delivered what I thought was a curiously muddled speech.

Mr. John Patten: Characteristically muddled.

Mr. Irvine: I shall confine myself to "muddled".

In the fist half of his speech, the right hon. Gentleman complained that the Bill was irrelevant, that it did nothing, that it was wholly superfluous and was simply aimed at the headlines. In the second half, he suddenly changed tack. Far from arguing that the Bill did nothing, he argued that it was too draconian. He criticised the changing of the evidential requirements and complained that the burden of proof has been reversed in certain important respects. He also attacked the provisions for automatic disqualification.

Such a muddled approach is symptomatic of a tendency, among all too many people who should know better, to treat the taking and driving away of vehicles as a less serious offence than it is. It is such loose, flaccid and irresponsible thinking which has led to the widespread use of the offensive term "joyriding". Such thinking was behind the absurd argument that the police should be restrained from giving hot pursuit to stolen cars, and it also lay behind much of the nit-picking objection to the Bill that we heard from the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook.

For many people—if not most—their car is, after their home, their most valuable piece of property. When their car is taken, they suffer, at the very least, considerable inconvenience and very often substantial financial loss. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary stated that as many as 40 per cent. of all vehicles taken and driven away unlawfully are damaged when returned to their owner. If a car is unlawfully taken and then returned in a damaged state, it seems absolutely right that the person or persons responsible for taking it should be assumed to be responsible for causing the damage unless they can prove the contrary. After all, they removed it from the custody of its owner and, prima facie, they should bear the responsibility for any damage which occurs between that time and the owner getting it back. Some hon. Members may think that that is unfair, but I believe that car owners whose vehicles have been taken would think differently.

The unlawful taking and driving away of vehicles goes well beyond damage to property. Car thieves are usually young and unused to driving the particular car that they have taken, and they are usually attracted to high performance cars. That is a lethal combination. "Lethal" is the right word. A few years ago, a Government publication entitled "Practical Ways to Crack Crime" stated:

"A stolen car is about 200 times more likely to be involved in an accident than the same car driven by its owner."

The unlawful theft of cars all too often leads to injury and death.

We know that legislation alone cannot provide a remedy, but it can make convictions easier to obtain. It can increase deterrents. It can single out for special treatment the special aggravating features of a crime. The Bill does exactly that, and I believe that it deserves the support of the House.

6.29 pm

Mr. David Clelland (Tyne Bridge): I begin with an apology to my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley), the Home Secretary and other hon. Members who spoke before I entered the Chamber. My late arrival was entirely due to an unenjoyable ride on British Rail. I must apologise if I repeat some of the points already made—I do not expect that I shall, except perhaps in my introduction.

In 1990, nearly 500,000 vehicles were stolen in the United Kingdom—one every minute of the night and day. Some 30,000 vehicles were stolen in Northumbria alone, and more than 770,000 thefts were reported from vehicles.

Insurers paid out nearly £500 million for car theft claims. Nearly one third of all recorded crimes were due to thefts from or of motor vehicles. About one quarter of missing vehicles were never recovered. A stolen car is 200 times more likely to be involved in an accident than one driven by its owner. At least three car owners out of every 20 have experienced theft from their vehicles, and it takes as little as four seconds for a car thief to break into a car without a key.

Most joy riders—or death-riders, as they should more accurately be described—are aged between 13 and 16, and the Bill does little to deal with that problem. My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) gave one example from his constituency. In a recent case in Northumbria, a youth under 15 years of age was arrested and admitted 100 offences of taking vehicles without their owners' consent. He eventually appeared before the court and was placed in the custody of the local authority. He soon escaped and was rearrested five hours later, when he admitted having taken 10 vehicles within those five hours. That is a serious problem. The perpetrators, who are usually male, come from all social classes and backgrounds, and all districts of the country. It is against that background that we must examine the Bill's likely impact.

While heavier penalties may be appropriate, they will not affect the level of car crime to any significant degree. I believe that the Bill, when enacted, will make no contribution to relieving the communities on Tyneside and elsewhere of the terrifying levels of car-related crime and its sometimes lethal consequences. The heavier penalties outlined in the Bill will go some way to balance the punishment and the seriousness of the crime to which that punishment relates. I have no doubt that those penalties will be welcomed by many who, day and night, suffer from the madness of high-speed driving through residential districts. However, I fear that the welcome will be short-lived once it becomes clear that, while those who are caught may be dealt with more severely, the level of car crime will not be noticeably reduced.

The Bill would not have altered the punishment meted out to those responsible for the death of baby Richard Harthill, who was killed by car thieves in my constituency just over a year ago. Even if the penalty had been increased, it would not have brought back Richard Harthill. Those who commit such crimes will not be deterred by the measures outlined in the Bill. Such people often lack the intellect to comprehend or fear legal reprisals and, more often, do not expect to be caught.

There have been many instances in which car thieves have been killed or badly injured while committing their crimes. The misplaced hero worship of two such thieves was recently blamed for an outbreak of disturbances on north Tyneside later spreading to Newcastle. The knowledge that there is a great risk of death or serious injury has not led to a reduction in the rate of such crimes. One must therefore ask: if people are not deterred by the thought of losing their lives, what deterrent will a longer gaol sentence provide?

While I welcome the Bill in so far as it at long last recognises that something must be done, I believe that, it avoids the issue of prevention. It is far too easy for cars to be taken; often drivers make it easy by not taking the proper precautions—as the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) said. I have heard of people with company cars, hire cars or contract vehicles who take a relaxed view of car security because they believe that, if the car is stolen, they will be supplied with another one. Such reckless and irresponsible behaviour could lead to the death or serious injury of an innocent victim.

I welcome the fact that the Government have said that new British standards have been introduced for car security and that the Department of Transport is pressing for such standards to be included in a new European directive. However, I do not accept the argument put to me by the Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department in a letter of 24 February.

> "It would be a breach of European Community law for the Government to introduce national legislation to strengthen the existing community requirements for vehicle security since this would constitute a technical barrier to trade with other Member States."

That would be true only if British legislation required all new cars sold to be fitted with anti-theft devices. Surely there is nothing in the European legislation to prevent Her Majesty's Government from introducing measures requiring drivers to ensure that their vehicles are properly secured against theft. That would not necessitate any technical changes in imported vehicles.

I should like all new cars to be fitted with good quality security devices. I do not know why we should have to wait for European directives, or the 20 years or so that it would take for a new generation of such cars to find their way on to our roads. By placing the onus on the driver in the first instance, our Government could introduce measures quickly and independently. I know that that would not be universally popular, but if it saved one innocent life, who could say that it was not worth it?

What standards should be set in such legislation? Car alarms are one form of deterrent, but they are often not detected by a thief until triggered, by which time he is already in the vehicle and often merely continues in his task. A visible and substantial immobilising device should be fitted to the gear stick or steering wheel. That would deter most opportunist thieves, particularly if the device were complemented by an alarm. Some 90 per cent. of car thefts are committed by opportunist thieves. Minimum standards laid down by the Department of Transport would prevent the use of cheap and easily overcome equipment.

I must add—in some way against my own argument—that I am still awaiting a reply to my letter of 27 September to the Home Office, in which I once again asked what was to be done to stop the general sale of skeleton car keys. The House will no doubt be as shocked as I was to hear of the following recently circulated advertisement. I shall leave out the name of the device and its manufacturer for obvious reasons, but I will quote from the rest of the advertisement:

> "The . . . Key Set consists of three skeleton keys to suit different types of lock, and will open the majority of British and foreign cars. Previously only available to the Motor Trade these keys are now available to other businesses."

A note at the bottom of the advertisement states:

> "These keys are intended for use by management and authorised staff only, in connection with their trade and must not be used for any illegitimate reasons."

I do not think that potential car thieves are likely to take much notice of that qualification. The Government must take action urgently to stop the sale of general equipment which makes stealing cars so much easier.

If we are to make an impact on the astronomical levels of car crime in the short term, substantial and visible security devices are a must, but they will be useless unless they are used by drivers. I have already referred to the irresponsible attitude of some drivers, so alongside the requirement to have such devices fitted must go the legal requirement to use them. It should be an offence for a car to be left unattended without such a device properly engaged. Because they are visible it would be quite easy for a patrolling policeman or traffic warden to spot offenders and issue a ticket. Finally, to ensure that the devices are kept in good working order, they should form part of the inspection required for the issuing of an MOT certificate.

The motor car can be a joy. It brings freedom and mobility to millions of people, but it can also be a lethal weapon in the wrong hands. It is within our power hugely to reduce the number of thefts, accidents and fatalities which too often result from that. Unfortunately, the Bill does not introduce measures that would be effective. I realise that to legislate effectively will mean as it so often does that there will be some cost, inconvenience and loss of liberty on the part of the innocent and the victims, but that is the price we pay for not tackling seriously and effectively enough the root social causes of such crimes. They are, however, another issue for another day.

Sir Anthony Grant (Cambridgeshire, South-West): Later, I shall say something about car security which follows on from what the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland) said.

Many Back Benchers have highlighted the dangers of joyriding and the urgent need to do something about it. I believe that they reflected public anxiety in so doing, but the nitpicking approach of the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman was entirely out of keeping with the public mood and will be seen as such. It would take a wizard to find out precisely what the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) was proposing as an alternative.

I declare an interest: I have the honour to be president of the Guild of Experienced Motorists, a body wholly dedicated to road safety. It has been so for many years. For a long time we have urged tougher measures to stop the curse of joyriding, which should never have been given that name in the first place. I do not know what ass coined the phrase, but it gives the impression that this is just a harmless frolic on the part of light-hearted youngsters. Sometimes the courts have tended to take the same view. Of course, it is nothing of the sort; it is a serious crime which all too often leads to more serious crime—to death or injury for life and to human suffering. I would call it misery-riding.

I welcome the Bill, therefore. The Theft Act 1968 was hopelessly inadequate to deal with the problem, so I hope that the Bill will reach the statute book without delay—and with enough publicity to show criminals, young and old, that the public are not prepared to tolerate this menace any longer.

I wish to question some of the Bill's provisions, nevertheless. The Opposition amendments seem half-baked; their only effect would be to water down the Bill. I take a rather different view which might be called draconian, but the issue calls for draconian measures. I do not know whether my alterations to the Bill may be considered in another place, but I did not have time to table amendments for this debate.

My amendments would increase the severity of the penalties. The maximum sentence of five years when death is caused—clause 1(4)—is inadequate. I would be happy to increase that to 10 or 14 years, or even to life if the offence was serious enough. The two-year maximum sentence for other offences may not be enough to deter, either. I hope that that will be considered in another place.

As for clause 2, I cannot see why the offence should not be triable by magistrates courts or the Crown courts without the rigmarole stipulating the amount of damages. One can imagine wicked cases in which only a small amount of damage was caused. This curse must be stamped out, but it will not be stamped out by probation or wishy-washy telling off from the Bench—or by some of the alternatives mentioned by Opposition Members. We need a much more severe approach and that will usually come only from the Crown courts, to which many of these cases should go.

The courts have used disqualification far too feebly. I see no reason why there should not be a minimum rather than a maximum period of disqualification. When death or permanent injury result from an offence, I would have no objection to imposing a life ban. It may be said that many offenders are young people who do not even have a licence, but if they were threatened with not being able to get one for some years until they were more sensible or mature, that would constitute a deterrent. I should like the courts to use disqualification more frequently.

As the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge said, the real deterrent is better security. Not only those who let out company cars but car manufacturers must accept some responsibility. It is ridiculous that security systems should be regarded as no more important than cassette players. They should be as compulsory as seat belts. I sometimes wonder whether car manufacturers would have fitted brakes if there were no sales benefit in them. I hope that the Minister will be robust in the discussions that he is pursuing with the manufacturers, and I hope that they will respond with a sense of responsibility.

I also hope that the Home Secretary will deal robustly with the European Community, and will resist any nonsense about non-tariff barriers to trade, on which the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge touched. It is possible to get round such nonsense. The Minister should remind Europe that, despite what some people think, car crime is just as prevalent there—it happens in Germany and France, too, as some of our colleagues on the Council of Europe know to their cost. The Minister should receive a sympathetic hearing from the European Community, and the sooner a directive in this area is introduced the better.

No system is 100 per cent. foolproof, but many new ideas are emerging. Since I published a letter in The Times, I have been sent suggestions from all over the country, some of them rather wild and others which I am not qualified to understand. I have, however, gone in some detail into one sent to me by a constituent. My constituent, Mr. Musker, has patented a practical device involving a simple combination lock, the number of which—as with an executive case—is held only in the mind of the user of the car. I shall not go into more detail now, but I have asked the Home Secretary to put Mr. Musker in touch with the experts in his Department or in the Department of Transport and to ask them to study the device in great detail with my constituent. I hope that my right hon. Friend will respond as soon as possible.

We regard this Bill as urgently needed, but the study of these new devices is equally urgently needed. I have made a special plea to the Home Secretary in writing that Mr. Musker's case be seriously considered.

The criticism has been levelled that the Bill is being rushed through. It is not the first Bill to be rushed through in my time in the House, nor will it be the last. It is certainly one of the most necessary Bills to be rushed through the House, and I wish it well.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): I, too, welcome the legislation and the mood of the House. It shows that hon. Members are deeply concerned about joyriding and about the need to ensure that proper measures are taken to resolve the terrible wave of crime that is affecting people in this country. Like the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant), hon. Members are prepared to put forward fresh ideas which we hope will be considered by the Minister of State. I also intend to put forward a couple of new ideas, and I hope that they will be examined.

I realise the enormous pressure that must now bear on right hon. and hon. Members to pass the legislation as quickly as possible. I, too, am not a great fan of any procedure which would prevent hon. Members from taking a careful and measured look at proposed legislation. One of our most important functions is to study carefully what the Government present, and to make suggestions that would directly benefit the victims of that appalling crime.

On 22 July 1991, four people needlessly died in Leicestershire. Two of them were a husband and wife who had travelled to Leicestershire the previous afternoon. The other two were teenagers, the driver and passenger of a stolen Austin Metro involved in a two-car crash. In April last year, four people died near Melton Mowbray. Two were 16-year-olds, the others were a husband and wife in their 60s. In May, a 16-year-old died after the car he had stolen careered off the road between Loughborough and Copt Oak. Earlier this year, a 16-year-old passenger died after a crash at Wanlip. The car had been stolen. Hon. Members will have other examples of the horror that such crime perpetrates. The few examples that I give are an appalling record for a county such as Leicestershire. According to the police, every day about 22 cars are stolen in Leicestershire.

There are, of course, suggestions on which we can all agree. We would like car manufacturers to play a much more important role in installing locks which halt thieves. Far too few ensure that that happens. I accept the need for car manufacturers to meet the Home Secretary early and regularly, and I hope that the Minister of State will tell us when the Home Secretary or he last met car manufacturers.

Mr. John Patten: I will tell the hon. Gentleman now. We last met car manufacturers within the past two months. My right hon. Friend and I will be seeing all car manufacturers—not only British Car manufacturers, but representatives of European and Japanese car manufacturers—on Wednesday, and we shall speak very forcefully to them.

Mr. Vaz: I welcome that intervention. I am pleased that the Minister will speak forcefully to car manufacturers. When he says that he will do something, he does it. I hope that he will also take on board the comments of car manufacturers and retailers who have told me that they face a difficult situation in terms of this country's economic conditions. The recession is affecting them. If they are to allocate resources to installing devices to prevent theft, they should be helped in some way by the Government. For example, they refer to car tax as one form of help, but they have other suggestions, including the price of petrol and other issues. I hope that in Wednesday's dialogue the Government will take car manufacturers' concerns on board.

The next matter relates to the need for the police to be able to allocate more resources to deal with car theft and to be able to provide the necessary personpower and administrative help. I am sure that all hon. Members will agree with that. The problem is that police forces such as Leicestershire police force find it difficult to allocate more resources when they have not been given sufficient resources over several years. The Minister of State, with his encyclopaedic knowledge, will jump up and tell the House that the police force in Leicestershire has been allocated an extra 27 police officers. We know that, but the Leicestershire police force asked for considerably more officers than that. It asked for additional resources to deal with the high level of crime.

We are talking about car theft and about what happens when cars are taken away and damaged and injury is caused. That is only one matter that the police have to examine. The Leicestershire police force pleads for additional resources. I hope that the Government will bear that point in mind. It is not sufficient just to pass legislation to ensure that there are new criminal offences. We must have police officers to detect crime and to bring people to justice and to ensure that the administration of justice is properly examined.

We need to ensure that our courts take a much tougher line. They will welcome the proposed penalties. Some of our magistrates in Leicestershire have other ideas. Councillor Adoline Smith JP was quoted earlier this year as calling for culprits to be birched. She said that Parliament was not acting quickly enough. I see the hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) getting very excited. The Minister of State will recall that, last week, he incorrectly said that the hon. Member for Northampton, North had called for castration in respect of certain matters, but he later realised that it was another Conservative Member.

The hon. Gentleman finds a friend in Councillor Adoline Smith, who says that birching is one way to ensure that young people are aware of what they are doing. I am sure that it will come as no surprise to hon. Members—it will be a relief to the Opposition Front Bench—that I do not support birching, and I do not intend to move amendments in Committee suggesting that we should birch young people.

Councillor Adoline Smith also said that Parliament had not acted quickly enough. I hope that, on reading Hansard and realising the timetable that has been set, she will know that we are taking this matter very seriously indeed. Another suggestion has been put forward by Mr. Alan Gayton, the head magistrate in Leicestershire.

Mr. Greg Knight (Derby, North): He is a very good magistrate.

Mr. Vaz: The hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) will remember him, as the hon. Gentleman practised in the Leicestershire courts. Mr. Gayton's suggestion is a result of his great frustration. He suggested that those who perpetrate such crimes should be taken to the scene of the crime. He feels that young people will be more aware of the damage that they do if they are taken to watch what the emergency services have to do and see the carnage that has been wreaked. He said:

"Actually watching the emergency services prising the killed and injured out of mangled metal might just bring home to these fools the enormity of the likely consequences of their behaviour."

The probation service in Leicestershire has welcomed such a suggestion. I do not know how it will work in practice, but Mr. Gayton, who has 27 years' legal experience, says that there is a need to remind young people of what they have done. Of course there are psychological and psychiatric implications of that suggestion. I am neither a psychiatrist nor a psychologist, but that suggestion was put by one of our most senior magistrates.

I should be grateful if the Minister could comment also on the suggestion made by the chief constable of Leicestershire. On 17 April, he suggested that young people should be taught to drive as young as 13. He felt strongly that that would be one way to show young people that driving a car was not exciting or different. It would mean that young people would not have to steal cars if they wanted to drive, and it would enable them to understand that driving a car was something responsible. He said:

"I would like to see introduced into schools car driving and maintenance for children as young as 13.

A third of reported crime in the county is juvenile crime."

That is an interesting suggestion, upon which local people have seized as one way of dealing with the problem. I hope that when the Minister will say whether he agrees with the chief constable and whether he hopes to examine that practical suggestion carefully. Such matters need to be examined carefully.

I turn finally to a couple of things that should have been in the Bill, but which are not. We need to place greater emphasis on preventing such crimes. The chief constable's suggestion that those as young as 13 should be taught to drive is one way in which such preventive work could operate. However, it is important that the Government make more resources available at local level and ring fence them so that we can deal with the issue and prevent young people from embarking on such careers. That is the only way to deal with the long-term problems of car theft and death riding.

We must ensure that young people are made aware of what is happening. That means putting much more emphasis on teaching about such things in our schools. We should ensure that police officers spend time in schools on this. Many schools in my constituency invite police officers who are on the beat to explain the law to young people at school. Too few people are made available by police forces —no doubt because of the personpower implications—to ensure that such educative and preventive work is carried out, but that would be one way to ensure that young people are made aware of the serious issues at stake.

I very much hope that the Minister will respond to the debate in the spirit that has been evident in the speeches of hon. Members from all parties. This is a serious problem and the public demand that we should do something, and do it quickly. We should be aware of the tremendous implications of such legislation, especially because it brings into question the fundamental principles of the way in which we prosecute and the way in which our criminal justice system operates. Bearing all that in mind, we must listen to the real fears and concerns of local people.

I had intended to conclude on that point, but very finally, I should like to bring another suggestion to the Minister's attention. I had almost forgotten it, but I should never have been forgiven if I had. I refer to the Leicester Mercury's Leicestershire vehicle watch campaign, which was initiated and launched by our local newspaper with the support of all local Members of Parliament. Given that that newspaper's editor and other journalists are coming down here tomorrow, I would be seriously criticised if I did not mention their serious suggestion.

The campaign involves the owners of vehicles putting a fluorescent sign in their windscreen, proclaiming their membership of the campaign. About 30,000 motorists signed up for the scheme, and fewer cars bearing the mark were stolen than would otherwise have been expected. We all support that new idea and campaign. I very much hope that the Minister will also support what the Leicester Mercury and Leicestershire constabulary are doing, and that he will adopt the scheme and apply it nationally.

Mr. Iain Mills (Meriden): As the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) is not in his place, perhaps the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Central (Mr. Darling) will inform him of my opening comments. I had asked the right hon. Gentleman, if he disagreed with the Bill, to tell us the Labour party's policy, and the right hon. Gentleman referred me to his speech in our debate on the Loyal Address. Although I have now read the right hon. Gentleman's speech three or four times during this excellent debate, I must advise the House that I cannot see a clear policy.

When the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman replies to the debate—I do not know whether that will be the right hon. Member for Sparkbrook or one of his right hon. Friends—I hope that the Labour party's policy will be made absolutely clear. I find it bewildering that so many of the right hon. Gentleman's colleagues, including the hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz), have made it clear that they want action and teeth. Although they may want teeth of a different shape from those of the Government, they do want action. I should therefore be grateful if the Opposition could make their policy clear.

I agree with colleagues of all parties who have talked about "joyriding" being a most inappropriate term. We should use either the phrase "misery riding" or, as has been suggested, "death riding". They would be much better terms and might help to discourage those who indulge in what is a deliberate crime, not a disease.

Although I do not want to detain the House for too long, I should like first to make a few points about demographics. I am informed that there is no easy demographic feature to this problem, except age. The problem involves the young and men, but they are not social class C2s and DEs only. They also include ABs. I have seen reports stating that the perpetrators' designer jeans, jackets and trainers, together with money and credit cards in their wallets, show clearly that those who commit the crime of death riding are not unemployed or doing it through boredom because they do not have a job. Often they have money and are doing it for fun.

Let us go a little further and look at how it happens. I do not know whether hon. Members realise what happens at the sort of scenes that have occurred in my constituency. It contains the national exhibition centre, Birmingham international airport and Birmingham international station, which have given rise to what is possibly the largest concentration of car parks for high-powered, new and decent cars in the west midlands, if not in the country. Those areas are difficult to police because they are huge. Anybody who passes down the M6 and looks at the national exhibition centre knows how gigantic its car parks are. They have to be to service that most excellent institution. They are a target.

What happens is often quite well organised. One of the lads will spot a really good car, such as a Ford Sierra Cosworth, a BMW 7 series or the right sort of Jaguar entering the car park at either the station or the NEC. His mates will be alerted and will come down the road from the north of my constituency. It takes them about three minutes at most to get into the car. They do not operate by having only one fellow who sneaks up to drive the car away; a whole group is involved. The more people they can get into the car, the more fun it is. I assure the House that all this is true. They then spray on the back of the car, "Chase me, Charlie" or "This is stolen", and deliberately look for a police car so that they can induce a chase.

One of the guys who does this has said—this has been published in a national newspaper—that they like cars with big boots because they can then get lads not only in the car, but also in the boot. That is why nobody, including my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence), can convince me that those who indulge as passengers do not have equal responsibility for what happens. In fact, those involved vie with each other about who will drive. It is a case of peer group pressure. Driving the car becomes a way of proving one's manhood or that one is macho. Sometimes they take it in turns to drive. Indeed, having spotted the cars, they sometimes steal them and store them in garages for use on special occasions.

This is not a crime committed by young people who are bored and out looking for a bit of fun. It is a deliberate crime. The offenders intend to take the car and use it for dangerous purposes. The aggravated taking of a car is not just for fun. It is serious and the more dangerous young people can make it, the more they enjoy it. That is why I greatly welcome the penalties introduced by my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary for those who take cars in such circumstances.

I urge my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary to ignore any comments made about the speed of the legislation. I assure him that in the west midlands and in my constituency where, as I said, we have a particular problem, it will be welcomed just as soon as it can be put on the statute book. The Bill will be welcomed not just by me but by the many magistrates in Birmingham and Solihull who have come to me wringing their hands. They understand that I, too, am worried about the problem, but they ask what they can do in their courts to make sure that the criminals are given adequate penalties that will act as a deterrent.

I remind hon. Members on both sides of the House, but perhaps especially Labour Members, that they should not fool themselves that the lads who gather together around the boot of a Sierra Cosworth and say, "Let's get this Cossie and go lads," are unaware of the penalties. They know the penalties very well. They look at the lad who is under 17 and say, "You have a better chance. If they catch us, you will not get the penalties that we would." But in any case, what does it matter to them? They do not have any money, or, if they have, it is their parents' money.

The introduction of extra responsibilities for parents in the Criminal Justice Act 1991 is welcome. Perhaps my right hon. Friend the Minister will expand slightly on the penalties that 15 and 16-year-olds who commit this crime would attract. I am aware that driving under a ban is in itself a further offence which carries a six-month penalty, and that the ban on driving can be extended until after the offender is old enough to drive. The magistrates in my area are greatly worried about how the under-17s and particularly the 15 and 16-year-olds will see the sentence.

Mr. John Patten: My hon. Friend gives way with characteristic courtesy. Once the Bill becomes law and the parallel changes made in the Criminal Justice Act 1991 are brought into force, as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary intends to do in October next year, offenders in the 15-to-17 age group could be sentenced to up to one year in a young offenders institution rather than six months, as was previously the case.

Mr. Mills: I welcome that, and thank my right hon. Friend for his interjection.

As one who spent 20 years in the car industry, I know that the market demands goodies and nice things. It has never demanded safety. Therefore, the ability to sell cars on the basis of safety or security is limited. The motives are simply not there. The provision of greater security will need some encouragement. The industry has responded well, but I ask the House to recall a story which I gather is correct. In the Members' Cloakroom, we all have our hooks to hang our coats on and our pink strings to hang our swords on. To prevent his car from being stolen from just up the river, one hon. Member used to take the steering wheel off his car and hang it on the pink string.

The House will forgive me for saying that, in these days of high technology, there must be some way in which the vehicle industry could provide more foolproof methods of preventing people from breaking into cars. It might be deadlocking or visual identification. The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) spoke about vehicle watch schemes. Such schemes have been established in Warwickshire, near my constituency, and in the west midlands in my constituency. They are extremely important, and I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to encourage them.

Mr. Clelland: The hon. Gentleman has touched on prosecution, which is the key to the problem, if the hon. Gentleman will pardon the pun. He talked about encouraging manufacturers to fit security devices. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that we should consider legislating to make manufacturers fit such devices? We did not talk about encouraging manufacturers to fit safety belts: we legislated on safety belts. We should also legislate on car security.

Mr. Mills: The hon. Gentleman puts me in a difficult position. I was one of the prime supporters of the Bill which introduced compulsory wearing of seat belts. I have also worked in the car industry. I am not sure that we need primary legislation. British standards exist now. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary attended a meeting of the Association of British Insurers, which provides good incentives for car manufacturers to produce more secure cars by reducing the insurance premiums for the people who buy them.

My right hon. Friend's speech to the association was excellent. He has also met the car manufacturers and, as my right hon. Friend the Minister said, is seeing them again on Wednesday. Perhaps we shall have to legislate, but I believe that out of their technological skills car manufacturers could provide the necessary mechanisms. I cannot believe that in these days of high technology there is not a relatively simple and inexpensive way of immobilising a car.

In the old days in the army we used to take the rotor arm off the vehicles. The lads in the other battalion had the same rotor arms, so they put it on and drove the vehicle off. The House will forgive me for being slightly facetious.

Mr. Vaz: I was interested to hear about the vehicle watch scheme in the west midlands, which is similar to the scheme in Leicester. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that different parts of the country do different things and that it would be helpful to have a national scheme supported by the Home Secretary which could be supported everywhere? At present we run the risk that, if some vehicles from my area go into the hon. Gentleman's area, people may not understand what the sign means. If we had one scheme supported by the Home Secretary, it could be of great help in solving the problem.

Mr. Mills: I would have no objection to a national scheme. The Warwickshire and West Midlands police work closely together, especially in policing the M6. I understand that the fluorescent disc is common to both police forces. I would not disagree with some form of national co-ordination.

I had hoped to raise in more detail one of the matters raised by my eminent constituent, His Honour Frank Blennerhasset. He asked me to say that many of the crimes with which we are dealing are aggravated by drug and alcohol abuse. He is still worried about the difficulty that the courts have when dealing with death riding or other matters. The definition of alcohol abuse by the World Health Organisation as a serious disability creates a disadvantage for the court in giving serious penalties for ignoring and breaking the law where alcohol or drug abuse is involved. Alcohol and drug abuse is certainly a factor in death riding and aggravated taking of cars. If it is not appropriate to deal with it tonight, I have written to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and I should be grateful if he would respond in writing.

Mr. Ted Leadbitter (Hartlepool): This is one of the rare occasions when the two sides of the House are at one. The Secretary of State and the Minister of State, who has just left the Chamber, agree that we have a problem on our hands. Members of Parliament have a common interest in doing something about a serious problem and doing it quickly. The interesting thing is that there is a tendency to presume that an action takes place, the culprit is found and we have to decide what sentence to apply in the courts to settle the matter. It is not so easy as that.

Experience has shown that the idea of getting caught takes into account very little the sentence that might be around the corner. Accessory to murder is a particular example. The notion of not getting caught is much stronger than the deterrent of a sentence. Nevertheless, we need some judicial procedure to deal with the matter. Where does the responsibility really lie? First, as the vehicle is created and manufactured by someone, that person has a responsibility. There is no point in putting on the market a product that will cause death, if that can be avoided.

The hon. Member for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), among others, pinpointed the fact that in the first place responsibility rests with the manufacturers. Undoubtedly, the technology exists to make stationary cars safer. Therefore, we should not be talking in terms merely of encouragement; we should get the thing done. The Government should require car manufacturers to provide the necessary safety. If motorists have to pay a little more for their cars, so what? It is far better to be a law-abiding motorist—as the majority of us are—and to know that we have made some contribution to our added safety. It is not only the poor woman with her child living on an estate who may be killed—as in the case cited by my hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge—because motorists use the roads while death riders are about.

Where does the next responsibility lie? It lies with motorists who, as the customers, should encourage motor manufacturers by saying that they want safe cars and are prepared to pay whatever it costs—I believe that the sum would be nominal—to make the car safe when it is stationary and not being used.

The first two responsibilities lie with the manufacturer and the buyer. Where is the third? It is with the parent. It serves no useful purpose when a parent boasts on television that his son is the best of the bunch and not likely to be caught, as happened in the case of the ram raiders in Tyne Bridge during the riots some weeks ago. The total ignorance of some parents must be attacked and public consensus must provide another responsibility. Where does that lie? It lies with the media, which serve no good if they are prepared to give time to parents who are so blatantly ignorant. Other parents, who are equally ignorant, may think that it is bravado to appear on television and boast about a serious wrong, which is potentially murder.

Where else does responsibility lie? It lies in schools, colleges of further education and polytechnics, where young people should be given regular reminders—from the police, through video and by other means—of the full horror that their actions can bring about, and the loss and distress that can be caused to families, whether young or old. When grandmothers and grandfathers lose children, they suffer grief. Whenever someone is hurt, their family suffers grievously, and that may take years to overcome.

I have listed a number of responsibilities on which I call upon the House to take action. The final responsibility lies with the police.

Mr. Clelland: My hon. Friend referred to the fact that manufacturers have some responsibility to provide safe and secure vehicles. He is making the same mistake as the Minister of State and the Home Secretary. Even if manufacturers could be encouraged to produce vehicles with security devices, it would take about 20 years for the new generation of cars to find their way on to our roads. The problem is here and now. What is to be done about cars on our roads now, which do not have adequate security devices?

Mr. Leadbitter: I thought that I had made it clear that manufacturers should be obliged to provide such vehicles. My hon. Friend the Member for Tyne Bridge mentions cars on the road now. If we can modify our cars to use lead-free petrol at reasonable extra cost, it will surely not be too difficult to overcome that little matter. Some time would need to be taken because of the large numbers involved, but I should have thought that a programme lasting between one year and 18 months could mop up the cars on the road now and ensure that they comply with the safety standards to which the hon. Member for Tyne Bridge rightly referred. I note that he has tabled an amendment to deal with that in Committee.

The police also have a responsibility. Although they do excellent work and face many problems, there is nevertheless a weakness in their deployment of forces and in their operations. Too many police officers seem to be driving around in patrol cars and too few are on their feet in the estates. While the police may have felt that patrol cars were a priority to ensure efficient operations, perhaps there should now be a shift of emphasis, with more police on the beat around the neighbourhoods.

I have referred only in passing to the victims. There is no doubt that in modern times we seem to be becoming partially immune to regular, daily reports of tragedy. We seem to take it for granted that it will happen. We are sorry, but the next day another incident occurs. This problem has been with us for some time, and we have taken it for granted. Due to recent publicity, we are urging that a Bill be pushed through the House quickly, and quite rightly so.

The House must remember that we have a responsibility to highlight the real tragedy of this type of offence. Unless we do so, tomorrow will be just another occasion. Next week, after the Bill has passed through another stage, it will be just another occasion. Like cats playing with pieces of different coloured wool, in a few weeks' time we shall have another interest. That is one of the penalties of modern life, which is very racy and interesting, and it is bound to happen. It is not a fault, but we must recognise that it exists.

I am pleased that the Minister of State said that he would speak firmly to the manufacturers next week. There is no doubt that we have a common interest, but as well as meeting a legislative requirement we must provide a service, using what publicity we can, to make it abundantly clear that there is a disease called death riding in our society, and that it must be brought to a halt. That will happen only if all those responsible act together to end it.

7.29 pm

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): I welcome my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary's introduction of the Bill and certainly support the need for urgent action. I only wish that we could perhaps have tougher action, because the level of car crime is absolutely intolerable. The figures for 1989 showed that we had the worst problem in Europe, with 400,000 thefts in England and Wales. The latest figure, if I heard my right hon. Friend correctly, is 550,000.

The hon. Member for Bolton, South-East (Mr. Young) referred to the figures for Bolton. I do not know whether he saw the editorial in today's Bolton Evening News headed "Car crime puzzle", asking why we should have such high car crime figures. The hon. Gentleman mentioned what he described as 11,000 innocent Boltonians who were affected in the past 10 months, and the editorial asks what the Government are intending to do about it.

If the national surveys are to be believed, 25 per cent. of people who had their cars stolen did not lock them. With the inadequacy of the locks fitted by some manufacturers, they perhaps felt that locking the car did not make any difference. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister is successful in his efforts to persuade manufacturers to fit better locks, and I hope that people will lock their cars when they have those better locks.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) spoke about the vehicle watch scheme in Leicester. I am pleased to say that I helped to launch such a scheme in Bolton, and I recommend that everybody should use the stickers.

The Government certainly support the police. What annoys me about the Opposition is that they are ambivalent in their support of the police. The hon. Member for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter) said that we had a common approach and that the police face many problems. One of their problems is the sort of statement made by the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant). I hope that the hon. Member for Hartlepool would dissociate himself from the remarks of the hon. Member for Tottenham, who said that if the killer of PC Blakelock

"came forward and said he did it, but didn't want me to tell the police, I would not tell them."

I hope that Labour Members would completely dissociate themselves from such an attitude. Our first duty is to support the police, if we are to get on top of these crime figures.

Mr. Leadbitter: That is an easy one. I have no hesitation in saying that I found that comment disgusting. I rebut it and I would have nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. Thurnham: I am pleased to hear the hon. Gentleman say that. Perhaps the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) and others who have intimated that they would not support the police will do likewise.

The Government have supported the police with an extra 16,000 men and women in uniform and an extra 12,000 on civilian duties, totalling 28,000 extra posts. My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, West (Mr. Sackville) has already welcomed the extra £20 million for Greater Manchester police, although I am not able to translate that into the equivalent number of police positions that one would expect from that sum. It would appear that only 20 extra police are allocated for Greater Manchester police in 1992-93.

I support the extra powers in the Bill making all passengers liable and increasing the maximum sentence to two years, or five years in the case of a death, and the maximum fine to £5,000. There is a problem with 17-year-olds. The proposal that we should ban them from driving after their 17th birthday, even if the offence was committed before that, is long overdue.

[Mr. Thurnham]

I should like to draw attention to repeated offenders. When I intervened in my right hon. Friend's speech to ask about an offender in Bolton who had already stolen 30 vehicles this year, he said that the Bill would not address that problem and that we would have to wait for his proposals in the new year. Why do we have to wait? Of the 400,000 offences that occurred in 1990, only 5,000 offenders went to prison or a youth offenders institution, of whom 4,000 went in for six months or less, so only 1,000 were given sentences of six months or more. No doubt many of those were released before the six months were up. I call on my right hon. Friend to do all he can to introduce measures urgently.

The study by the Northumbria police shows that 40 per cent. of crimes detected by the police in 1989 were committed by people on bail. Those likely to reoffend on bail must be deterred either by a new offence or by altering the rules governing the granting of bail. The chief superintendent in Bolton wrote to me saying:

"the current legal system is not capable of dealing with the worst offenders effectively."

The chief clerk to Bolton magistrates court, Mr. Peter Dawson, sent me a letter from Mr. Moiser of Plymouth magistrates court, which appeared in The Times in September. He wrote:

"the Bail Act needs immediate amendment . . . there is no reason why"

the Government

"cannot act quickly".

I would have hoped that we could have included an amendment to the Bail Act 1976 in this Bill to put that matter right immediately. Obviously, measures should be taken to provide more places in bail hostels. Not enough is being done in that area. There are 500 extra places now and 700 extra places to come in the next two years or so, but we should do a great deal more.

We have a great problem knowing what to do with criminal youths. Some 30 per cent. of crime is committed by youths under 17. We have heard about special schemes in Salford and elsewhere, and they seem to have promise, but social services in Bolton and everywhere else must face up to the challenge. We need more secure units and special schools.

The other day, when we debated child abuse in Leicestershire, I drew the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health to the chasm in social services provision for juvenile delinquents. In some local authority homes, 85 per cent. of the staff are unqualified. In other words, only 15 per cent. are properly qualified. When we consider the best provision outside local authority provision, it raises many questions. There is a great challenge which social services must face up to.

In considering the best practice elsewhere, Mr. Melvyn Rose has spoken of the work done at Peper Harow. I understand that the charge there is £1,000 per week. If that is what it costs to bring offenders back into society as helpful and constructive people, it is well worth while. We need to see what provision is being made. There are profitable organisations as well as the non-profitable, charitable ones, such as Peper Harow.

I was somewhat surprised the other day to look at the accounts of a private sector company which provides homes for disturbed children. The proprietor of Helsey Hall Ltd. Mr. Stephen Lloyd whom I meet shortly, draws substantial sums for his work running these special schools. The accounts for 1990 show that his salary was £507,750 and his total emoluments, including pension contributions, were £782,750. Substantial sums are being made by people in the private sector who are addressing the problem.

What are the social services doing? There seems to be an enormous chasm between what local authority homes provide and the provision elsewhere. Can my right hon. Friend consider that problem? In Bolton we have a young Houdini aged 14 or perhaps 15 now who, when I last spoke to the police, had committed more than 140 offences at colossal cost to society. It is worth facing up to the costs of institutions such as Peper Harow if we are to put such offenders on to the right track.

I look forward to my right hon. Friend's proposals for dealing with repeated offenders. I hope that he can bear to listen to all that is said to him by the police and other community workers. What further action will follow from the "Safer Communities" report that came out in the summer? I have certainly written to my right hon. Friend about that and I am awaiting a reply to my recent letters. I hope that my right hon. Friend will be able to visit Bolton in the near future. He was in Manchester recently. I can assure him that every opinion survey that I have done shows that law and order is the number one issue for my constituents.

Obviously I could speak for much longer on this subject, but I know that time is pressing. I look forward to my right hon. Friend visiting Bolton and seeing for himself some of the problems that we have.

Mr. Jack Thompson (Wansbeck): I apologise to the House for my absence at the beginning of the debate on this important matter. As usual on a Monday, I was held up by British Rail. I was held up for two hours today; last week I was held up for an hour, so things are getting worse.

I support the Bill. Obviously, it has been put together quickly—I would not use the harsh expression "cobbled together"—and I accept that it may contain one or two quirks. I do not criticise the Government for that, because I believe that we needed such a Bill three months ago. I am more than happy to see it now. If there are any problems, adjustments can be made. I look forward to discussing the amendments that have been tabled by my hon. Friends, which will improve the Bill.

I am not sure whether the true reasons for young people, particularly those in my constituency, committing this type of crime have been identified. I know of no young person in the socio-economic category A who has stolen a car; most of the young people involved seem to belong to the C and D groups. I hesitate to put people in such categories, but those young people have little income and little or no prospect of getting a job. I know of children as young as 10 in my constituency who are worried about getting a job. Perhaps that concern accurately reflects the attitude of young people there. The possibility of such young people owning a car without a wait of many years is slim. Perhaps that is one more reason why they indulge in such a "hobby".

In my younger days, a hobby meant playing with a top and whip, playing marbles as well as cricket and football in the right season. Stealing cars and computer hacking are modern versions of such hobbies. I have no ability to do either, especially computer hacking. Car crime seems to be the in thing. The other guy is a chicken if he has not stolen a car, and the thief considers himself one better. Perhaps that person is more attractive to the girls, as well. Perhaps they encourage young men to do such things.

I accept what has been said about the influence of the media. In the limited time available to hon. Members to watch television, I have seen some of the American police programmes. Inevitably, those programmes involve a car chase at high speed, and numerous cars are smashed up and damaged. Surely that must influence young people. That is yet another reason for car crime—there are as many reasons as there are answers to the problem. However, something must be done, and I am delighted that the Bill has been introduced.

The son of one of my constituents, Mrs. McVitie, was killed as a result of a crash in a stolen car. He was not driving, and there is some doubt whether he got into the car voluntarily or whether it was a case of him being judged a chicken if he had not. He went through the windscreen when the car crashed. Mrs. McVitie, all credit to her, recognised that her son had committed, in essence, an offence, although it is not in the book as such. She has campaigned for months for the introduction of relevant legislation to deal with the problem. I pay tribute to Mrs. McVitie because she tries to discourage other young people from doing the same as her son.

I believe that prevention is better than cure. I do not want to argue the pros and cons of the sentences and fines advocated; time will tell whether they are appropriate. It will be possible to adjust them if they are not. I would prefer the introduction of the means to prevent car crime. A number of good suggestions have been made.

Many sophisticated devices have been developed to improve house security. I recently had a new system installed in my house, and I am amazed at how it works. Those developments came about because of the demands of house owners who did not want their houses burgled. The market has responded to that demand by producing new, sophisticated devices. They cannot guarantee the absolute security of a house, but they can make it more secure. Perhaps some of those marvellous devices can be considered for cars.

A simple device has been used by a number of car showrooms in my constituency. I do not know how efficient it is, but it is worth considering. Many of those companies are unable to put the cars on sale inside when the showrooms are locked up, so they put a wheel clamp on the vehicles, which is a simple device. Its use originated in London as a means of preventing people from parking in the wrong place, but I believe that it is a useful device to prevent the theft of a car.

I pass a car showroom in my constituency regularly and the cars on display do not seem to have been disturbed —because it uses wheel clamps. At least that device reduces the chance of cars being stolen. I do not know how much such a device costs, but, given the ready market, I am sure that it could be reasonably priced. I have even considered using one myself, but I have a secure garage, I hope.

Mr. Clelland: The wheel clamp is extremely useful, because it is visible. Potential thieves are put off because they can see that it would be difficult to steal the car. I am not sure whether a wheel clamp would be particularly attractive to owners in inclement weather, but does my hon. Friend agree that, if a device is visible, inside or outside a car, it acts as a valuable deterrent?

Mr. Thompson: Yes. I hope that the Home Secretary will consider all the suggestions that have been made in this sensible debate.

The debate has been marred only by the snide remarks of the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) about my hon. Friend the Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant). This issue has generated cross-party support and those remarks were a bit off, given what we are trying to achieve.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): I support the aims of the Bill, and I shall vote for it tonight. I want to concentrate on whether it will provide a sufficiently good means of dealing with young people.

As we heard from my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, the maximum penalty for someone aged 16 or 17 is subject to a ceiling of one year. However, if one takes off time for remission and good behaviour, one is left with a sentence of four months. We are often talking about young people who have been through the entire menu of alternatives to imprisonment before they are sent to a young offenders institution, formerly known as a detention centre. The penalty offers little deterrent to those youngsters.

In the summer, I visited my local crime prevention panel and the police to discuss this matter. I was told of one particular youngster in Stockton-on-Tees who has been arrested and charged no fewer than 17 times this year. He has been convicted of car crimes 16 times and had one charge pending at the time of our discussions three months ago.

The last time that that young person went into secure accommodation in Middlesbrough, he went in through the front door at 3.30 pm, and at 5.30 pm he disappeared out the back door and stole a car to make his escape. He was rounded up about a week later, having stolen four more vehicles. That one 14-year-old has been responsible for the loss of cars to the value of £2·5 million in the last year alone.

The superintendent of police in my area has told me that, were we to round up about 150 people in the county of Cleveland, it would eradicate about 80 per cent. of all car crime, which itself constitutes about 60 per cent. of total crime in the county.

Two types of car crime offenders concern us. First, there are those juveniles who steal and wreck fast cars. They are the death riders or joyriders—just stupid and irresponsible people. Above that is a thin veneer of hard cases, who continue offending into their twenties. They are the people to whom the Bill will have some relevance.

There are many other hon. Members present from the north-east, who have struggled down on British Rail to participate in this debate because we have seen in recent months horrifying scenes on our televisions. They include high-speed chases through densely packed suburban areas, filmed from the air by helicopters. At the crime prevention panel, I watched a video of a police chase through the centre of Middlesbrough, in which a 14-year-old drove a Vauxhall Astra at 90 miles per hour on the wrong side of the road, weaving in and out of oncoming traffic.

[Mr. Tim Devlin]

That offender damaged no fewer than eight vehicles, and the police gave up the chase on four separate occasions because it was too dangerous to continue pursuing the stolen vehicle at various stages. The situation is getting completely out of hand.

In the north-east, we also saw on our televisions a gentleman—if one can call him that—being interviewed after the death of his son in a 90-mph crash involving a stolen car on the outskirts of Newcastle. That father said, "No, my son wasn't a joy rider. He was a professional car thief. He was one of the best in the business." Many hon. Members are nodding, because they remember that interview. Our constituents were horrified that the media should have given such a person a platform, and that the father's attitude was so wholly irresponsible.

What are we to do? The Bill makes a good start, but it is only a start. It does not deal with hard-core, habitual car thieves—most of whom are in their teens, and who will grow out of it by their mid-twenties. I am told by the probation service, social workers, educationists, and those involved in the youth offenders institute in my constituency that the turning point comes in the late teens, when such offenders get a regular girl friend and decide that it is about time that they acted a little more responsibly. However, in that window between the ages of 13 and 17, there are some dangerous young men who will not be taught any lessons until they are contained.

I would like the Bill to contain a first offence penalty of a six-month custodial sentence—with no remission and no time off for good behaviour—in a properly funded and managed institution. A second offence would merit two six-month sentences; a third, three six-month sentences, and so on.

If the individual kept on offending, he would simply be given six months' custodial sentence for each offence—not to run concurrently, but consecutively. Then, a youngster who stole three cars would go to a young offenders institution for one and a half years. I am told by those who have responsibility for the care and custody of young people that they can actually do something with them over that period—but little can be achieved with a young man in one or two months. He returns to the same circumstances as before, to associate with the same peer group, and starts behaving the same way as before.

I have written at great length to my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary. I emphasise that juvenile crime is not the same as adult crime. I once defended a juvenile on a charge of reckless driving, and he was banned from driving for two years after being found guilty of the most horrific driving at night without lights. As I pulled out of the court car park into the road afterwards, I was almost rammed by some genius in a gold Capri. It was none other than the juvenile that I had just been defending. The way such people behave is quite unbelievable.

We must recognise the essential difference between juvenile crime and adult crime, and start to treat it seriously. The opposition to the Bill that we have heard tonight, to the effect that it will make such offences more difficult to prove, will not go down well in the country. The public want the House to do something serious about the problem. I doubt that the public will think that the Bill goes far enough—but it makes a good start.

Sir Giles Shaw (Pudsey): I apologise to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department for being unable to attend at the start of the debate, due to the aggravated taking of British Rail, which took three hours to take me from York to the metropolis. I am none the less glad to make a short contribution to the cross-party connection in support of the Bill. Right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House agree that something must be done, and quickly.

I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) that the Bill is a rapid reaction to the tip of what is obviously a substantial iceberg—and rightly, because the extent of public anger had to be addressed. The iceberg is the result of a rapid rise in vehicle theft by young persons which goes back some time. It is at its most active in urban areas such as my constituency, the metropolitan city of Leeds, and other big cities such as Newcastle, Bradford and Manchester, whose Members of Parliament have contributed to the debate.

Figures from the police forces of North and West Yorkshire show the astonishing rate at which vehicle theft has risen. In 1990-91, the six-monthly average for vehicle thefts in West Yorkshire was 20,900. Between 1989-90, there was a 53 per cent. increase in recorded vehicle theft offences in the county and the number recorded in the Leeds metropolitan district rose by 85 per cent.

There is a disturbing trend for younger children to involve themselves in that kind of crime. In 1989, 19 per cent. of all those convicted of vehicle theft were aged under 17. So far this year, the figure has risen to 27 per cent. West Yorkshire police statistics suggest that the peak age for the offence of taking a vehicle without consent is 15. That is the outrageous undercurrent against which the real bravados—the macho bunch—have participated in so-called joyriding or death riding. That is a dangerous cult and it must be dealt with harshly.

Between July and October this year in Leeds, two children aged under 10 came to the attention of the police for vehicle theft offences. The Bill does not attempt to address that aspect—and understandably so, because the problem must be dealt with in a short and concise way.

Many devices and initiatives are available, but the view of West Yorkshire's chief constable is this:

> "It is interesting to note that the upsurge in vehicle crime began in earnest in 1989. It may be no coincidence that just prior to this the Criminal Justice Act 1988 reduced the unauthorised taking of motor vehicles to a summary offence, triable only at magistrates courts. Following this reduction to a 'less serious' offence, sentencing policy seems to be that the offence of taking vehicles without consent is not in isolation deemed to be serious enough to attract a custodial sentence. In consequence, young offenders may take many cars and never face the prospect of a deterrent sentence."

That point was well made by my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South. The chief constable adds:

> "The proposed legislation to deal with aggravated taking of vehicles is most welcomed as recognition that there is a real problem to be addressed. I am left wondering, however, whether it will address the basic problem of the volume of car crime committed, particularly by significant numbers of young offenders who are not dealt with in a way that effectively deters their criminal activities."

There are only three reasons for the Bill. First, we have seen a rapid growth of horrendous proportions in the incidence of this crime. Secondly, the Home Secretary and his colleagues have found a way in which to deal with the problem swiftly and, I believe, to remove the uppermost element. Thirdly, the Bill has received all-party support, which has enabled us to deal with it in the current Session.

I am bound to say, however, that the Bill does nothing to deter younger vehicle takers—and it will stand or fall according to its deterrent qualities. We do not want to see a massive amount of custodial sentencing, although we are glad that provision is made for it; what we do want is a reduction in the number of people who participate in such a horrendous cult and in the equally horrendous statistics relating to youngsters who take cars, go to court and then take more cars.

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): I support the Bill because it seeks to address a serious problem, but I believe that that problem is greater than it appears to be. My right hon. Friend will not be surprised to learn that I speak from gut reaction rather than a detailed knowledge of the law or the statistics, but I believe that my gut reaction is shared by the vast majority of people in this country.

Over the past few years, there has been a massive increase in hooligan crime—crime perpetrated by maladjusted, ill-disciplined adolescents: vehicle theft, theft from vehicles, vandalism, mugging and, at a lower level, intimidatory cycling on modern pedestrian estates, which is very disturbing for residents. In short, young hooligans are terrorising and destroying the neighbourhoods in which they live.

At the weekend, a constituent came to see me. A neighbour's child had been breaking my constituent's windows, hurling abusive language and stealing property at will. The youth in question had been before the courts, but was still at large. The police had been round to have a supportive chat; there was nothing else that they could do in the circumstances. While a police constable was in the living room, the car parked outside was being daubed by the youth.

How much worse the problem must be in our larger inner-city areas, whose suffering has recently been laid bare by the national press. The fact that it is concentrated in the poorer areas is no justification for such behaviour, for which there can be no justification; it increases the urgency of the need to find a solution. Until the blight is eradicated, no one will wish to employ people from the areas where this menace exists, and the poor will become poorer.

Of course there are people who come from disadvantaged backgrounds; of course we must do what we can about it. Sadly, however, there will always be people from disadvantaged backgrounds and there will always be a few people—many of them not from disadvantaged backgrounds—with strong and perverted personalities, who, through macho perversity, gain satisfaction from bullying and terrorism. The influence of their degradation is way beyond their puny numbers.

Where the problem exists in one part of the country, or in one community, it is greatly magnified through the small screens in the sitting room, which multiply that problem by stimulating its imitation. The situation is becoming worse, not better. This is a useful Bill, but it papers over only one crack. To be effective, justice must deter and it must be swift; at present, it is neither.

Manifestly, we have no effective deterrent for hooligan crime, or we would not be debating the issue. What about fines? Fines—for people with no jobs and no money? My right hon. Friend the Minister rightly said that their parents could be fined, but some parents have less control over their children than Robert Maxwell's children had over their fraudulent father.

What about prison? Should we send such people to prison, so that they can learn how to become professional criminals? In the majority of cases, neither society nor the youths in question would be served by that. What about community service? In some cases, yes; but, in general, the people with whom we are concerned would not be deterred. We require a proper deterrent and I am increasingly of the view that we need some threat of pain and humiliation to purge people of the pseudo-macho personalities that cause the problem. The realisation must be forced on the "big man" that, in reality, he is a little man.

Last week in the House, I suggested that such people should be given a sound thrashing. I believe that my suggestion caused something of a stir. I am not sure why; perhaps it was due to the appreciation that, in the country as a whole, the idea would—not surprisingly—gain considerable support. It is done; it is over; it is finished. It is a deterrent. I wonder how the young Napoleons who terrorise their neighbourhoods would react if they believed that, in the end, they would suffer a sound thrashing.

Alternatively, what about a kind of hooligan litter squad? Perhaps hooligans should be attired in some drab and identifying dress and required to carry out repairs and clean up the areas in which their depredations have taken place. William the Conqueror was a cruel and harsh ruler, and I do not suggest that we should harry the north; but during his reign, although people were fearful of the monarch, they were not fearful of their fellow citizens. There may be a moral here: perhaps we need a touch of barbarism to secure civilisation.

We must also have swifter justice. A large proportion of these anti-social crimes are committed by young people who are on bail or yet to be tried—people who laugh at the law while continuing to break it. Notwithstanding the striking lessons of the Birmingham Six and the other cases, I feel that we are in great danger of over-indulging civil libertarians at the expense of civil peace.

For one reason or another, either it is too long before the courts are available to try the cases, or the lawyers appear to require too much time to prepare the defence. To say the very least, there is a suspicion that the legal system has been devised to suit the lawyers rather than to protect the public. Justice without immediacy is justice perverted, not least when the guilty go free after a case has lapsed because the credibility of identity evidence has been undermined by delay.

I recently wrote to my right hon. Friend about a specific case. I received an answer, but I am afraid that it was a long catalogue of half-measures and good intentions. We need action—action this day. It is fine for many of us, given the privileged lives that we lead; it is hell for many of our citizens and we owe them a great deal more urgency than is provided by this useful but inadequate measure.

8.7 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): It is a pleasure to speak in the debate, although it is a little depressing that some hon. Members should despair of finding any real answers to the problem. After all, law and order has collapsed in this country. The crime rate has doubled in the past 12 years, and there has been a whirlwind of crime committed by young people: 50 per cent. of all crime, and 75 per cent. of burglary, is carried out by them. That is very worrying. Surely a Government's job is to address the overall rise in crime that has taken place while they have been in office, and also to deal with this new phenomenon —the amazing increase in youth crime.

If we consider only the superficial elements of these changes in society, and deal with the problem purely at the level at which the Bill deals with it, we shall not do justice to the House or to the people of this country. Although we support elements of the Bill, we want to modify it; that is why we have tabled amendments, which we hope will improve it. We had considerable reservations last week about the Prison Security Bill: we felt that our debate missed the opportunity to create a real piece of penal reform—legislation that would change our penal system radically, along the lines of the Woolf report. We do not have great enthusiasm for the Bill. We believe that it is a missed opportunity for tackling the deep-seated causes of crime.

The Aggravated Vehicle-Taking Bill follows a course that we have come to expect from the Home Secretary and the Government. When a matter of serious public concern arises which leads to a great deal of media interest, someone in central office says, "We must show that something is being done." To the horror of Home Department civil servants, they suddenly receive an order from the Home Secretary, to the effect that a quick fix is needed to make it look as though something is being done. This, therefore, is a quick fix Bill.

Car theft is a matter of great public concern. More than half of all recorded crimes are car crimes, involving the theft of vehicles or the theft of property from vehicles. These offences are very much in the public eye, due to the appalling scenes that we saw on television. Oxford, Bristol —which I visited last week—and Newcastle are suffering great problems. The appalling scenes that we saw on television were brought home to us there. Some of the reporting was irresponsible. With hindsight, it appears that disturbances in other towns and cities can be attributed to the copycat element.

Most people do not want such offences to be tolerated. Councils that conduct local polls say that that is the primary concern. Only a couple of months ago, I visited a major industrial city where a poll had taken place. I was told that people in that city were more concerned about being able to live safely in their homes, not having their cars stolen, and not being burgled or mugged than about unemployment or any of the other big economic issues.

This is not a new offence. It involves predominantly young people who have been involved in taking vehicles without consent for many years. The problem, however, has become very much worse. It is escalating and taking on worryingly new manifestations. It is happening with many other crimes, as crime figures spiral out of control. The tragedy is that the Government have stood idly by and done little to prevent youth crime in general and this aspect of youth crime in particular.

I draw the Government's attention to the Home Office standing conference on crime prevention, chaired by James Morgan, which reported in August this year. The working party, chaired by James Morgan, studied crime prevention programmes. Of youth crime, it said:

> "Considering the significant contribution that young people make to the crime problem, both as victims and offenders, the working group was surprised by the lack of references to specific strategies for preventing crime by and against young people."

That is an important point.

We know that almost half of all recorded crime is carried out by people under the age of 21, yet far from developing a strategy that focuses on youth, as other countries, such as France, have done, the Government have been involved in a war of attrition against young people. I do not draw the simple conclusion that young people have been badly treated—as they have—during the last 12 years. One only has to look at the halving of the value of the youth training allowance and the way in which young people between the ages of 16 and 18 can no longer claim benefit, including housing benefit. Many of them have been forced into having no stake in society. All that is true, but I do not say that young people who have been deprived in that way should go out and steal cars. There is, however, a clear relationship, as the Home Office research and all the other research shows, between deprivation and crime.

The Home Secretary pointed out in the debate on the Metropolitan police that Sir Peter Imbert had said that the map of deprivation matched almost exactly the map of crime in London. The Home Office's own research shows the same close relationship. I have studied some interesting research which shows that, on previous occasions, the Home Secretary and the Minister of State have drawn a comparison with the depression in the 1930s. They state that crime did not rise then, and they ask why it did not rise then. The research now available shows that crime tripled between the two world wars, particularly at the time of the great depression.

There is therefore a clear relationship between deprivation and crime. The training and employment opportunities available to young people have declined and benefit has been reduced. The result has been a substantial increase in homelessness and deprivation. We can see it on the streets of London.

Mr. Mills: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Sheerman: No, not for the moment. I am trying to keep to a very strict timetable.

All those factors are linked to rising crime rates. No doubt a Conservative Member will cite the 1930s, just as has happened in the past. I refer Conservative Members to the research, and I hope that they will learn a little from it.

Painfully little has been done specifically to tackle car crime, which is a major aspect of youth crime. This is even more depressing when one realises that in various parts of the country there are projects run by the probation service and the voluntary organisations which provide an alternative to custody. Hon. Members in all parts of the House have said that these schemes are successful.

The hon. Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) has some interesting ways of looking at the problem, but he did not look at the fact that there are proven ways of taking young people who have committed offences and giving them a chance to confront their criminality. They become involved in schemes which allow them to use up their energy. The schemes involve the use of motor vehicles off the road. There is a high success rate.

All too often, when I visit successful schemes throughout the country, I find that they are about to announce that they cannot carry on, or that they cannot diversify or increase the take-up because the Government have not provided any money. I visited a scheme in Kirklees, near my constituency, which wants to turn into a car project instead of remaining a motor cycle project, but there is no money available for that purpose, even though it is a proven, cost-effective way of deterring young people from continuing to commit this kind of car crime.

The Government have done little to encourage such schemes. The Opposition believe that we should consider alternatives and the ability of magistrates to say that something must be done with first offenders and that an alternative can work. Instead of a young person being sentenced to a period in custody, which means that it is all too likely that he or she will continue in a life of crime, become a professional criminal and never get out of the criminal world, the alternative makes both moral and economic sense. Is it morally right to sentence a young person to a period in custody?

The Home Office has also been remiss about security devices, an important subject that has been debated at length today. The hon. Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) knows a lot about the car industry, but my patience with it is wearing a little thin. Six years ago, the Prime Minister invited the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders to No. 10. They told her that they would respond, but they have not done so. If uniformly high standards were imposed, manufacturers would have to meet them. Competition would be the same and vehicle security would rapidly improve. That is what people want. With the change of cars, higher security would soon be achieved.

Young people often steal the most attractive and new models rather than old bangers. I have been told that, in some cities, if someone wants to ensure that their car is not tampered with or taken, they should buy the rustiest and least attractive car available.

Against the background of Government inertia, we have a Bill that will achieve little, because powers already exist to deal with the taking of a car and aggravating factors. As my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) said this afternoon, any passenger who encourages and any driver who recklessly drives causing injury or damage is guilty of reckless driving, which was renamed dangerous driving in the Road Traffic Act 1991 and is liable to two years imprisonment. The offence of causing death by reckless driving carries a maximum of five years, manslaughter carries a maximum of life, and deliberately damaging a vehicle carries a maximum of 10 years. One wonders what contribution the Bill will make.

I share the misgivings of my right hon. Friend the Member for Sparkbrook about the speed of the passage of the Bill. Hurried legislation is never good legislation; there are many examples of that. There are deep deficiencies in the drafting of the Bill. The Opposition have tabled a cluster of amendments. We hope that the Government will listen reasonably to them, because they have been tabled in a reasonable frame of mind and do not make party political points. If the Government use their majority, the only guarantee of consideration is another place. We do not think that that is good enough. The Bill should have been investigated in Committee.

I say that with some feeling because, in the three years, that I have been doing this job I have not heard so many well-qualified solicitors and barristers, people from the legal community and inquests and from pressure groups say that there are areas of deep concern. That is not an ideological or party-political point; real concern has been expressed by our professional associations and by those who practise in the courts. They worry that the Bill will damage British justice.

The most worrying feature of the Bill is the issue of fault. A passenger who is screaming to get out of a car, who is trying to stop a driver driving dangerously, will still be guilty of the aggravated offence. If any damage is done or if any injury occurs after the initial taking while the car is being driven, the aggravated offence is committed, even if the car is being driven sensibly or carefully. The car does not have to be driven recklessly. If it was travelling at 20 mph and someone else recklessly drove into it, the aggravated offence would have been committed. The situation is the same if someone walked in front of the car and the driver had no chance of stopping. A defendant would be guilty of the offence if he took the car, abandoned it and someone else damaged it before it was recovered.

The chairman of the Bar Council, Mr. Tony Scrivener —[Interruption.] I hope that the remarks of Conservative Members from a sedentary position are not an attack on the Bar Council, which I think all of us would regard as an important and esteemed body. Mr. Tony Scrivener referred to the Bill. [Interruption.] If the Home Secretary would listen to more experts, he would probably be a better Home Secretary. If he listened to Anthony Scrivener, he would be a darned sight better.

Anthony Scrivener referred to the Bill as unique in jurisprudence because a defendant can be guilty of the aggravated offence even though he does no other act than commit the basic offence, and the event which makes the crime aggravated is outside his or her control. That is bad law, which will lead to miscarriages of justice, and we shall seek to amend it.

It was refreshing to hear the hon. and learned Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) express his misgivings about this part of the Bill. I say again—this is not based on party acrimony—that we have severe reservations about two clauses, which must be given serious consideration today or in another place. There is the important question of the reversal of the burden of proof. The defendant has to prove that he was not in, or in the immediate vicinity of, a car rather than the prosecution having to prove that he was.

On the face of it, that seems to be in breach of article 6(2) of the European convention on human rights, which states that a person is innocent until proven guilty. Have the Government taken legal advice? The reversal of the burden of proof is wrong in principle and will lead to injustice. Surely we have had enough problems in the British judicial system with miscarriages of justice. As the hon. and learned Member for Burton said, that reversal could easily lead to miscarriages of justice that we could sort out now. It should not be an issue between us. I hope that the Minister of State will respond positively to my criticisms.

[Mr. Sheerman]

The use of the term "in the immediate vicinity" will raise enormous problems. What if the passenger gets out because he is terrified by what is going on and the car crashes at the next corner? He is still in the immediate vicinity. What if the passenger gets out half an hour before the crash, but the driver continues driving in the area and crashes near where the passenger is still standing talking to his mates? The reversal of the burden of proof would also affect alibi evidence called on behalf of the accused.

In many cases, a disqualification will be appropriate. We believe that that is right, but the court should have a discretion, particularly where no fault lies with the defendant.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: What?

Mr. Sheerman: Where perhaps a defendant has been a passenger and is not accused of reckless driving. May I finish my argument?

Disqualification can have a counter-productive effect. Young people with years of disqualification ahead of them have no opportunity to take part in motor projects, to drive legitimately and to channel enthusiasm into responsible behaviour. The Minister will know from many of the schemes that he visits that one of the carrots that they hold out to young people is the ability to drive vehicles off road and eventually to train for a full licence. That is often the spur which gets them back to a proper relationship with the almighty car.

There is a national crisis of youth crime, but the Bill does not deal with its roots. If Dickens could come back and watch the debate, he would see that most of us are dwelling on the surface of the problem, while beneath the surface something is wrong in England and Wales.

Mr. Anderson: But not, apparently, in Scotland.

Mr. Sheerman: But not, apparently, in Scotland or in Northern Ireland.

There is something deeply wrong. The Labour party has a crime prevention policy and a youth crime prevention policy which will begin to deal with that problem. We shall support the Bill but we shall also try to amend it sensibly. We do not believe that it is the full answer which could have been brought to the House.

8.29 pm

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): I shall not follow the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) down every path of his argument, particularly the last third of his speech. If the House so decides, we may be able to consider some of the detailed points during the debate on the four sets of amendments which will be considered in Committee.

This has been a good debate. I say that because some lawyers have spoken—my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) and the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson). Most of us listened carefully to those hon. Members whose constituencies have been affected by this hooliganism—the hon. Members for Tyne Bridge (Mr. Clelland), for Wansbeck (Mr. Thompson) and for Hartlepool (Mr. Leadbitter). I was particularly taken by a good phrase used by the hon. Member for Hartlepool, who suggested that we should stop using the word "joyriding"—none of us in the House does so any longer, except in unspoken inverted commas. My hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow) said that we should refer to "car hooliganism", which is another exceptionally good phrase.

Much closer to home for me, we listened to the hon. Member for Oxford, East (Mr. Smith), who represents and lives in the Blackbird Leys part of Oxford. I represent the other half and represented the area in which he now lives until the boundary commissioners so cruelly took it from me in 1983.

I begin by revisiting the arguments in the opening speeches about why we need the Bill. When the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) kindly let me intervene, I said that the Bill, should it pass into law, would provide us with not only a deterrent but a punishment and a way of keeping repetitive car crime offenders off the streets.

We need to legislate on this offence because of an evidential difficulty, which is compounded in several ways. It is compounded when several people are involved in the aggravated taking of a vehicle—my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden (Mr. Mills) said that such people were not content with being in a car but wanted to be in the boot as well—and by the speed and lethal power of the Cosworths and other vehicles which they steal. It is difficult for the forces of law and order to identify who is responsible for what, as the hon. Member for Oxford, East saw in Oxford in the autumn. It is also difficult to establish when the damage occurred.

There are three problems—of identification, of intent and of witnesses. That is why we need the Bill. The difficulties are demonstrated by a simple statistic—only 6 per cent. of the people who take without consent are charged with criminal damage, yet four out of every 10 vehicles returned to their unfortunate owners suffer substantial damage.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and the hon. Member for Huddersfield spoke about the unintended consequences of people's actions, and I understand the worries about that matter. That an offender can be held criminally liable for the unintended consequences of his or her actions is a well-established legal principle. A person who attacks someone and who wishes to do grievous bodily harm but unfortunately kills his victim can be convicted of murder after due process.

Moving closer to home, on the offence of causing death by dangerous or drunken driving, the hon. Member for Huddersfield referred to the Road Traffic Act 1991, whereby an offender will be found guilty if he drives dangerously, thereby causing someone's death, whether or not he intended to do so or even knew about it.

Mr. Anderson: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Patten: If the hon. Gentleman will forgive me, following the example of the hon. Member for Huddersfield, I must try to make progress in the interests of speed. The hon. Member for Swansea, East obviously believes that the matter is important. I always think that my points are important as well. I give way to him.

Mr. Anderson: Surely it is not difficult to distinguish the point that the right hon. Gentleman makes about assaults. That is done by considering a case in which a passenger can be held equally liable even though he sought to avoid being identified with the aggravated crime. He may know that the vehicle has been taken, but seek positively to absent himself from the scene and the commission of the aggravated offence.

Mr. Patten: I gave way to the hon. Gentleman because he felt that his point was important, but it is covered by section 12(1) of the Theft Act 1968. People who get in a car when it is stolen are associated with that act and can be convicted of exactly the same offence.

I shall take a more up-to-date example than one from 1968. In the recent House of Lords judgment in the aptly named Savage case, the court ruled that a person can be guilty of actual bodily harm regardless of whether she—in that case—intended any harm or was reckless about causing harm, so long as she intended the assault. In that case, Mrs. or Miss Savage emptied a beer glass over a person's head, the glass went with the beer and the person was hurt. There was no intent, but she was found guilty and the conviction was sustained on appeal.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook made an important point about the minimum and maximum periods for banning and questioned whether that would help or hinder rehabilitation of an offender. A youngster may have committed the offence only once. However, such people must not be favoured, as the hon. Member for Oxford, East said in his powerful speech. If a court decides on a two-year probation order, during the first year the person is mandatorily banned under the Bill and there is nothing to stop the court ruling that during the second year he or she should attend a motor course. I have been to many throughout the country. As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary said, we are funding a great many such courses.

I have referred to some of the powerful speeches made by Opposition Members with particular constituency interests. Among Conservative Members, my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) asked in her characteristically robust way why the Labour party and the Liberal Democrats do not see the urgency of this matter. That urgency is self-evident. Several hon. Members who spoke after the opening speakers—I shall not name them for fear of causing inter-party embarrassment—said that it was an urgent matter, and I applaud them. Clearly, there is a gap between the Opposition Front Bench and those who have experienced these problems in their constituencies.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Uxbridge (Mr. Shersby) and the police for their warm welcome of the Bill. My hon. Friend raised the important point of what happens under the Bill if a man or woman leaves a child in the car and the car is taken. He gave two examples. I hope that I am not thought too patronising or authoritarian when I say that I do not believe that parents should leave children in unattended cars and they certainly should not leave the keys in the car as well. But should parents do that and should the car be taken away with a child in it, those who took the car could be charged with a much more serious offence under section 2 of the Child Abduction Act 1984, punishable by up to seven years' imprisonment.

My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton is a member of the council of Justice—an organisation for which I have great respect and which operates under the presidency of Lord Alexander of Weedon. He raised two particular areas where he felt that there might be some danger of miscarriages of justice should the legislation go through in its present form. I listened carefully to what he said, and I have some answers.

First, on the "liability for others' acts" point, the Bill contains safeguards—as my hon. and learned Friend knows from his study of it—when the accused can show that the aggravating event occurred before he committed his basic offence or that he was not near the vehicle at the time. However, the general principle of liability for the acts of others to which my hon. and learned Friend referred is not at all out of line with the Theft Act 1968. The basic taking without consent offence is that the taker and any passenger may be punished equally.

That was the point I made when responding to the intervention of the hon. Member for Swansea, East, when I mentioned section 12(1) of the Theft Act 1968. It is also precedented in section 35(2) of the Powers of Criminal Courts Act 1973—[Interruption.] It is important that those who are concerned about the possibility of injustice pay attention.

That section states that a person convicted of taking without consent is liable to pay compensation for any—and I emphasise that word—damage to the property "occurring while it was out of the owner's possession" and that such damage is to be treated as "having resulted from the offence, 'however and by whomsoever' the damage was caused."

The precedents are clear for the action which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary is taking in the Bill.

Secondly, on the issue of the precedents for making a defendant prove his defence in the way in which the Bill requires, I argue that every year—certainly since I have been in the House—we have created numerous new offences which have defences attached to them, usually for those who can show that they acted reasonably or that they used due diligence to ensure that they avoided committing an offence. All those defences are for the defendant to establish on the balance of probabilities.

We have traditional defences on, for example, diminished responsibility which allow murder to be reduced to manslaughter, or defences introduced in Acts that have been passed in the last couple of years. The Food Safety Act 1990 is one which has a large number of such defences built into it, as does the recent Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Mr. Lawrence: I hope that my right hon. Friend will appreciate that objection is taken to eating more and more into the principle by which the burden of proof is on the prosecution to establish guilt and not on the defendant to establish innocence. He is perfectly right that in recent years we have been eating into that principle, but if we continue to do so, the principle will go, and that is the civil liberties issue which the system of justice has always been anxious to maintain.

Mr. Patten: I entirely agree with my hon. and learned Friend about the civil liberties issue. If the principle ever was firmly established, it has gone, but the principle's underlying weight is protected by the fact that the defences are there in law. That is the way we have evolved the law over the years, but I shall consider carefully what my hon. and learned Friend said, and I shall read it tomorrow in Hansard.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Irvine) was pretty savage about Labour Front-Bench spokesmen and criticised muddled Opposition speeches. The notable fellow East Anglian and friend to both of us—my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West (Sir A. Grant)—was not satisfied and added "nit-picking" to that criticism. He also wanted us to be more severe in our handling of these offenders. A life term is available for those who are convicted of deliberately causing death, whether the conviction is manslaughter——

Mr. Sheerman: Under the present law.

Mr. Patten: I am finishing my sentence. The hon. Gentleman is treating me as though he were talking to someone from Louisiana and wanting to finish the sentence before it has been started. However, I shall complete what I was saying.

My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, South-West was right about car security and what he said was reflected in the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Meriden, who urged us to do more about car security. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary and I will meet car manufacturers for a return match this Wednesday and there will be some plain speaking.

I pay tribute to the Association of British Insurers, to which we began talking a couple of years ago. It said that it was difficult to use insurance mechanisms to cut car crime, but two years on, it is now using insurance premiums formidably well. We look to the British car manufacturing industry and its European counterparts to do the same as quickly as possible.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) was concerned about people who reoffend while on bail, and we shall deal as quickly as we can with the reports—and the analysis of them—which deal with that. He and my hon. Friends the Members for Pudsey (Sir G. Shaw) and for Stockton, South (Mr. Devlin) were concerned about 15, 16 and 17-year-olds and their involvement with the social services. I understand that the social services want to help people, but sometimes one can help people a bit more by nipping problems in the bud and dealing with them at an earlier stage.

Sometimes, to be firm with people can be more helpful than leaving problems until it is too late. It is much better to step in and help people firmly rather than having to punish them at a later stage. My hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, South and others were quite right. The strongest support of all for the Bill came from my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton, North (Mr. Marlow), who had a range of interesting ways in which to stoke up the legislation to higher and higher levels of severity.

I hope that there will not be a vote on Second Reading. I understand that there will not be one, but I end on this note: that will allow the official Opposition to say that they did not oppose the Bill because there was no vote on Second Reading. However, should we decide to consider the Bill in a Committee of the whole House, the first set of amendments tabled by the Opposition—should the Opposition win the vote or should we accede to them—would torpedo the Bill below the water line and sink it lock, stock and barrel. They are wrecking amendments of the worst type.

The right hon. Member for Sparkbrook and the hon. Member for Huddersfield are trying to have their political cake and eat it. They are trying to say to the general public and to their constituents that they have supported the Bill, but, in a few moments, if we resolve to go into a Committee of the whole House, they will then try to sink the Bill. I have a message for them. We have no intention of allowing the Bill to be sunk, and we shall make it as clear as we possibly can to our constituents and to the hon. Gentleman who tried to have their cake and eat it exactly what they have done. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith, pursuant to Standing Order No. 61 (Committal of Bills), That the Bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. David Davis.]

Question agreed to.

Bill immediately considered in Committee.

[SIR PAUL DEAN in the Chair]

Clause 1

NEW OFFENCE OF AGGRAVATED VEHICLE-TAKING

Mr. Sheerman: I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 22, after 'place', insert 'by the accused or by another person incited by the accused'.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 3, in page 1, line 23, after 'vehicle', insert

'by the accused or by another person incited by the accused'.

No. 5, in page 1, line 26, after 'vehicle', insert

'by the accused or by another person incited by the accused'.

No. 7, in page 1, line 29, after 'vehicle', insert

'by the accused or by another person incited by the accused'.

Mr. Sheerman: To the cries of "Wrecker Sheerman", I argue that the amendments would not wreck the Bill. Indeed, they would vastly improve it. They would limit the new offence of aggravated taking to cases where the aggravating behaviour was carried out by the accused or by another person incited by the accused. That does not sound unreasonable to me, or, I am sure, to my hon. Friends.

The Bill makes passengers liable to the new offence because of aggravating behaviour by another person who was driving the vehicle. Those people will be liable, even though they were not ringleaders, did not incite, encourage, intend or foresee the behaviour. For example, a passenger screaming to be let out of the car will be guilty of the aggravated offence, if guilty of the original taking. A passenger who pleaded with the driver to stop would be equally liable, as would a younger passenger, influenced by older ringleaders.

I cannot understand why the Minister said that this was a wrecking amendment. A passenger will be liable to the aggravated offence, even though he or she was not responsible for the events that made the offence an aggravated one. That cannot be right; it offends all the normal canons of criminal responsibility. It is a bad law that will lead to miscarriages of justice, as Opposition Members said on Second Reading. If a young person is to be convicted of such a serious offence, rendering him or her liable to a lengthy term of imprisonment, there should be some element of fault in the aggravated behaviour.

We all know the negative effects of custody on young people. In their White Paper "Crime, Justice and Protecting the Public", the Government referred to custody as "an expensive way of making bad people worse."

Some two thirds of teenage offenders leaving custody, and 80 per cent. of those under the age of 17, are reconvicted within two years of their release. It is patently daft to imprison for lengthy periods young people who are on the fringe of such activities. It is a recipe for turning delinquents into more serious criminals.

The amendments seek to ensure that the new offence of aggravated taking is linked much more closely to the individual's degree of personal responsibility for the offence. I cannot believe that that could be construed as wrecking the Bill; it surely improves the Bill, as it focuses it more on the people who took the car and the ringleaders, not those who were on the periphery.

Under the amendments, in order to be guilty an individual will have to have carried out the aggravated behaviour or incited another person to do so. That will not mean that the main offenders will get off. The amendments will also ensure that the prosecution has to prove the guilt of the defendant. They will remove the dangerous proposal to reverse the burden of proof, which would cause grave injustice and is of great concern to many practising lawyers in London.

The Bill as drafted is seriously flawed. The amendments will ensure that those at fault, not those on the periphery, pay the price.

Mr. Anderson: I rise only to adopt the arguments advanced by my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman). I shall not expand on them, because we have already given examples of how it would offend against common justice if someone were deemed to be guilty of the aggravated offence when he or she had not given assent to that offence, as aggravated.

I shall argue somewhat against myself by commending to the Government a possible amendment to weaken the defence. It is a purely legal point: a defence is currently provided for the person who can prove, on the balance of probabilities, that the relevant aggravating event occurred before he or she committed the basic offence or that he or she was not—this is the relevant part—in or near the vehicle when the aggravating event occurred.

The phrase "in or near" is relevant, because it makes it seem as though it is a solely geographical matter. That does not cover all relevant circumstances. It is not difficult to conceive of circumstances in which a person participated in the commission of the offence in that he or she encouraged it, without necessarily being geographically in or near the vicinity of the offence. Therefore, the Government may wish to consider strengthening the case for the prosecution by adding to the description of a person being in or near the vehicle when the aggravating event occurred, the following words:

"or did not otherwise participate in the commission of the offence".

Mr. John Patten: I thought that I was right. There is no doubt that the amendments are wreckers—what the hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) has just said makes that absolutely clear.

I listened with particular care to what the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) said about the workings of the group of amendments. I did so because, when they appeared on the Notice Paper, I was at a loss to understand how the Opposition spokesmen could reconcile them with their public stance of support for tough new measures against such people. The answer is now clear: they cannot. The amendments are about negating, not creating, a new offence of vehicle taking. The amendments would emasculate the offence. Their net effect would be to leave the law fundamentally unchanged in practice.

I see that my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman), who is learned in the law, nods in agreement. The amendments would erect around each of the what the Bill describes as aggravated circumstances of the basic Theft Act offence considerable and unnecessary evidential difficulties. Should the amendments have their way, it would never be enough for the prosecution to prove that there was danger, damage or death. To the contrary: it would never be enough to say, as the Bill states, that the events would not have occurred if the vehicle had not been taken in the first place. Instead, the prosecution would have to prove the existing basic taking offence.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Swansea, East for his ingenious suggestion on how to improve the prosecution's lot. The prosecution would also have to prove exactly who did what damage at what time, what injury occurred, who was driving and why. The clock would be turned back to the pre-existing law.

As my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary explained, so-called joyriding is habitually accompanied by dangerous driving, damage, injury and sometimes, tragically, death—all of which are already covered by criminal law. The difficulty lies in proving an offence such as criminal damage against one member of a gang, when it is often not clear who has done what or even who was in the driving seat at a certain time. The evidential difficulties are fiendishly complex and trying for the prosecution. There is not only a strong practical case, but a strong moral case, for saying that everyone is equally to blame—exactly as the Theft Act 1968 does in section 12(1).

I understand that there may be a worry that we are tipping the scales of justice against defendants and that the aggravated offence is an erosion of traditional legal standards—a point made by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence) on Second Reading. I hope that I satisfied him on that matter then. Such concern is misplaced; the new offence is justified not merely on pragmatic grounds but also on grounds of principle and precedent. I refer the House to the arguments that I deployed on Second Reading.

Someone who takes and drives away a car and then aggravates that by damaging, injuring or killing is not justified in then saying that he did not mean to do it. The law will say, "You had no business doing it in the first place." So if someone decides to commit the basic offence, he must accept responsibility when things go wrong, and he has no one to blame but himself.

Defences are provided for people who can show on the balance of probabilities that they had no connection with the aggravating offence. The hon. Member for Swansea, East referred to geographical proximity and to other ways of judging the issue.

I must tell the hon. Member for Huddersfield that either he does not understand his amendments or he must know that, if they were agreed to, the Bill would be completely wrecked and the law would return to where it was. I urge the Committee to resist the amendments.

9 pm

Mr. Sheerman: Far from trying to wreck the Bill, we have been trying to improve it by means of these amendments, on which we have consulted the finest legal opinion. I should like a guarantee at this late stage that the Minister of State and the Home Secretary will consult the Law Society and the Criminal Bar Association before the Bill emerges from another place. We are not trying to torpedo the legislation; we are trying to reflect a view widely held by lawyers. I ask the Minister for such a commitment.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Nicholas Baker and
Mr. Tim Boswell.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Sheerman: I beg to move amendment No. 2, in page 1, line 23, after first 'the', insert 'reckless'.

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, it will be convenient to discuss also the following amendments: Nos. 4, in page 1, line 26, after 'the', insert 'reckless'.

No. 6, in page 1, line 29, after 'was', insert 'intentionally or recklessly'.

No. 8, in page 2, line 28, leave out paragraph (a) and insert—

'(a) it is driven in such a manner as to create an obvious and serious risk of causing physical harm to another person; and'.

Mr. Sheerman: This class of amendments makes the intention of recklessness a necessary ingredient for the aggravated offence. The thrust of the amendments is common sense. They make an offence an "aggravated offence" when that was the intention.

Clarifying the legislation is an important priority for us. As currently drafted, the offence of unauthorised taking would become aggravated if dangerous driving occurred. That is fair enough, and we would agree with the Government on that. However, under sub-section 2(b) and (c), the offence would be aggravated also if, owing to the driving of the vehicle, an accident occurred that caused injury to a person or damage to property. The driving would not have to be dangerous or reckless in itself.

In other words, if a car is taken and the driver is driving carefully but another car is recklessly driven into it, an aggravated offence will have taken place. I know that I am going over some of the ground that we rehearsed on Second Reading, but I shall be brief. If the car is stationary at traffic lights and another car hits it, the aggravated offence will still have occurred. Similarly, if a person runs in front of the car when it is being driven carefully and even if the driver cannot avoid hitting that person, the aggravated offence will have taken place. I asked the Minister about this important point on Second Reading, but he did not mention it in his reply.

Subsection 2(d) also raises an anomaly. The aggravated offence is committed when damage is caused to the stolen vehicle, but there is no requirement that that damage should have been caused intentionally or recklessly. The defendant will be guilty if someone else damages the car after he has left it but when he is still in the immediate vicinity or if he cannot prove that he had left the vicinity.

The amendments seek to ensure that the car must have been driven recklessly, that there must have been some fault on the part of the defendant and that the defendant should not be guilty of a serious criminal offence if the events that make that offence aggravated and serious lie outside his or her control. Similarly, damage to the stolen car must have been intentional or reckless. Without those safeguards, the Bill will be unjust and will be seen by many members of the public as unjust.

The public are worried about young people taking cars and driving them in a reckless fashion down the streets, causing mayhem. We had some graphic descriptions of that on Second Reading. That is altogether different from some of the examples that I have described which will be caught by the clause.

We believe that it is wrong for young people to be held responsible for a serious criminal offence when they were not at fault beyond the original offence of taking a car, for which they will be punished and will be liable under the ordinary legislation. What is at issue here is whether the offence is aggravated. That is what we seek to clarify in the amendment.

The amendments arise from the real anxiety in the legal community that the Bill will create great difficulties. I hope that the Government will consider the amendments without prejudice.

9.15 pm

Mr. John Patten: One travels hopefully in legislating. I had hoped that, after my crystal-clear exposition of the wrecking element in the first group of amendments, the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) would have had a quick look and seen that what he was attempting to do in the second group was again to wreck.

The amendments ask the Committee to turn the clock back to the legal position on reckless driving, before the thorough review of the subject by the principal of Jesus college and the consequent decision of the House in the Road Traffic Act 1991 during the previous Session of Parliament to substitute a new concept, that of dangerous driving, with a new statutory test to go with it. That report and the subsequent legislation were welcome.

The amendments also invite the Committee in effect to convert our objectively determined aggravating circumstances all over again into subjectively determined acts committed by a particular person. The amendments are misconceived and wrong-headed. It is as plain as a pikestaff that, if we return to subjectivity, the central core of the Bill will be completely wrecked and the vessel will be sunk.

I had better go on to explain that it is important to recall why we took the decision in the Road Traffic Act 1991 to change the reckless driving offences—"reckless" is the word that the hon. Member for Huddersfield used. In the words of the principal of Jesus college, the Welsh college in Oxford, the background was the "widespread dissatisfaction with the present state of the law on reckless driving".

That dissatisfaction was rooted in the difficulty in securing convictions in England and Wales under the then reckless driving offences. Professor North's committee had put its collective finger on the problem: that reckless driving as previously defined by the courts referred to the accused's state of mind—whether he was reckless—and therefore required some proof of the state of mind of the offender to bring a successful prosecution.

Professor North recommended that the offences should be based much more firmly on the observable standard of driving, not the state of mind of the person who committed the offence. We should focus on the nature of the conduct, not the state of mind of the person involved. The nature of the conduct is the dangerousness of the driving, not the recklessness shown by the driver.

Mr. Sheerman: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Patten: I give way to the hon. Gentleman. I hope that he has understood.

Mr. Sheerman: I have understood. I should like to bring the Minister down to earth and ask him to consider not states of mind but what happens when such crimes are committed. Will he answer on the point which worries us?

A person may not have taken part in any reckless behaviour. He may merely have driven a car without doing so recklessly. He may have stolen a car and then stopped or even parked the car and got out of it. If the car is damaged, whether severely or not, after they have left the car, what will be the position? Could such a person be guilty of reckless driving? Under the Bill, he will be considered to be reckless when at no stage did he take part in any reckless behaviour.

It is not the state of mind but what the person did that will count. The person took a car without the owner's permission. Yes, that is against the law, and the law will have him for that. If he drives the car for three miles and when he stops at the traffic lights someone crashes into the back of the car, will he be guilty of reckless driving? I should appreciate it if the Minister would confirm that.

Mr. Patten: I should appreciate the chance to do so after that intervention, which was longer than normal from the hon. Gentleman, who is usually succinct.

It is clearly the intention of the Bill that a man, or more rarely a woman, who takes and drives away a car and as a result causes injury or damage, can be tried for the aggravation of the offence, and that anyone travelling in the car with them should be tried in exactly the same way.

[Mr. Patten]

There are two defences in the Bill that a person can use, and it is up to the courts to decide whether those defences are valid.

To complete my argument, we should focus on the nature of the conduct—the dangerousness of the driving—not the degree of recklessness shown by the driver. The new offences in the Road Traffic Act 1991 follow that form. They will allow more drivers who drive badly to be convicted of more serious offences with proper punishment, and quite right too.

Subsection 7 of the new section 12A of the Theft Act, 1968—which would be inserted by clause 1 of the Bill—follows the concept and definition of dangerous driving in the Road Traffic Act. Therefore, having heard my exposition of what the amendments would do to the Bill, I believe that the hon. Member for Huddersfield will seek to withdraw it immediately from the consideration of this Committee.

Mr. Sheerman: We shall withdraw our amendments in the hope that they will emerge somewhere else and be debated more fully.

I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Donald Anderson: I hope that the Minister can help with clarification of one matter. Perhaps he will set on record why the words "mechanically propelled vehicle" are used and not the word "conveyance", as in section 12(7) of the 1968 Act. Would he confirm that the definition, as set out, is sufficient to cover speedboats? In many of our coastal resorts, there is a problem because young people, in particular, take boats and drive them to the danger of people who are bathing or who are in those waters. Will the Minister give an assurance that the term as used is sufficiently wide to include speedboats?

Mr. Patten: I suppose that the advice given by a senior and ancient Home Office or ex-Home Office Minister, or a Department of Transport or ex-Department of Transport Minister to a junior Minister just taking up his or her post would be, never to forget to cover oneself for the old skateboard question—does this piece of road traffic legislation deal with skateboards? I never go into the arena in this place without that information.

Luckily, thanks to the excellence of those who advise me, I am fully conversant with the speedboat issue, which is a derivation of the skateboard question, but is a serious issue. The hon. Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) is right—boat theft has been a problem. People have been using twin-screwed diesel boats, which are very powerful and are used for towing water skiers, in an extremely dangerous fashion.

This stand part debate is useful to discuss subsection 1(a) of the Bill, which provides that the new aggravated offence arises in relation to "mechanically propelled vehicles", as the hon. Member for Swansea, East pointed out. That term, which is used in road traffic legislation, has a wide meaning and covers tractors, mechanical plant, mobile cranes, bulldozers, as well as motor cars and motor cycles. However, it is narrower in meaning than "conveyance", as defined in section 12(7) of the Theft Act, 1968, which I dare say the hon. Member for Swansea, East has in front of him. "Conveyance" includes non-mechanically propelled vehicles, such as rowing boats and horse-drawn carriages.

Ultimately, the question whether "mechanically propelled" covers speedboats is for the courts to decide. My view is that it does not, for Theft Act purposes. Certainly, the policy with which I have been concerned in drawing up this Bill relates to motor vehicles on roads. That was the policy impetus behind the Bill. Therefore, the legislation as drafted would probably not be of much use for speedboats, but I undertake to consider the hon. Gentleman's point if he is happy with that undertaking.

Mr. Anderson indicated assent.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2

Offence to be tried only summarily if value of damage is small

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Anderson: I have a brief point in respect of the summary offence. It is said that clause 2 provides that the aggravated offence is to be tried summarily if the only aggravating circumstance is damage, the total value of which is below a specified amount, which is the same as for the substantive offence of criminal damage. The point that I wish to put to the Minister, again for consideration later by the Home Office, is this. Magistrates courts have a problem with summary jurisdiction in respect of this matter. Although a jury may convict a defendant charged with theft under section 1 of the Theft Act 1968 of taking a vehicle without authority under section 12, a magistrates court cannot do so unless the defendant has been specifically charged in the alternative. It may well be that, in this or related legislation, the Government might deal with that point to give magistrates courts greater jurisdiction in this matter.

Mr. John Patten: That is an interesting point, which had not occurred to me. The hon. Gentleman speaks with some knowledge of the criminal law. Certainly, I should like to consider the point and take advice on it at a later stage. I doubt whether we could do anything about it during the passage of the Bill in this or another place. It may well be a sensible piece of tidying up in subsequent legislation and I am grateful to him.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3

Obligatory disqualification

Mr. Sheerman: I beg to move amendment No. 9, in page 4, line 21, leave out 'Obligatory' and insert 'Discretionary'.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 10, in page 4, line 21, leave out first 'Obligatory' and insert—

'(a) Obligatory where the vehicle was driven or the damage was caused by the offender or by another person incited by the offender.

(b) Discretionary in any other case.'.

Mr. Sheerman: The purpose of the amendment is to make disqualification discretionary rather than obligatory. One is even more in danger of repeating the arguments that one made on Second Reading on a short Bill such as this, especially given the time scale, so I shall be brief.

As it stands, the Bill requires all those convicted of the new offence to be mandatorily disqualified for at least 12 months, even when they were a passenger rather than the driver or where the consequences which aggravated the offence were neither intended nor foreseen by the accused personally. That could lead to a great feeling of injustice, perhaps rightly.

Most of us involved in criminal justice want offenders to cease offending as soon as possible, to learn the error of their ways as soon as possible and to return to society as fully law-abiding citizens as quickly as possible. Therefore, it is important that we do not introduce barriers to that process. The purpose of the amendment is to ensure that we encourage young people to become law-abiding, fully operating young citizens as soon as possible. Discretion should be exercised in those circumstances where the aggravated factors are outside the control of the defendant.

In some cases, a juvenile will be banned from driving two years after the offence was committed. A ban on driving imposed on a 15-year-old obviously will not come into force until that person is eligible to drive at the age of 17. However, two years is a long time. The individual may have paid his debt through some form of treatment or participation in a scheme. He may have become a model citizen. As the Minister acknowledged, young people change a great deal in a short time. They may mature and grow out of such a ghastly fashionable crime. If such a person is barred from driving for a year at the age of 17, that could hamper the process of making that young person a law-abiding member of society. The frustration felt may provide the spur for further offending.

9.30 pm

The magistrates courts and other courts are better able to make the relevant decision. They should have the discretion to decide whether a ban should be enforced. In many cases, disqualification will be the right course of action, but the courts should have the ability to exercise that discretion. The amendment aims to provide such flexibility.

We had similar arguments when considering the Criminal Justice Bill last winter. The amendments have been tabled in a positive spirit, and there are two reasons why they should be supported. The first is one of principle, because justice requires that the courts should have the ability to tailor their penalties to provide the just deserts to the individual offender. That principle underpinned the Criminal Justice Act 1991. Local magistrates and judges should have the option not to disqualify if the offender had no personal responsibility for the aggravating factors.

This argument will be repeated when we consider those found guilty of an aggravated offence who were not driving. Other offences which carry mandatory disqualification require bad or drunken driving on the part of the offender. It cannot be right to provide for mandatory disqualification for an offence with no such requirement.

The second argument in favour of the amendments is a practical one. Disqualification will often hinder the work of motor projects, which hon. Members have identified as a positive step. They divert offenders and potential offenders away from car crime and they are extremely effective.

I recently visited a motor project and was told that, to have maximum impact, that programme must consist of five essential elements. First, auto offenders should be confronted with the reality of their behaviour, and their attitudes should be challenged. That is no soft option, because the young people were made to meet victims and also relatives of those who had been killed or seriously injured. Secondly, offenders should receive education and training in the legal use of motor cars. Such training is a carrot to encourage young people. They are taught how to drive a car and to pass a test, which is a positive incentive.

The third element in any programme should obviously be practical hands-on driving experience with a view to taking a driving test which requires a full driving licence. Much of the preparatory work in many such projects is done off the road, but it is important to have some experience on the road when getting ready for a test.

Fourthly, a programme should contain a range of activities which are equally, if not more, exciting than driving illegally. Such programmes should provide excitement to young people. I know of programmes which involve climbing and other outdoor pursuits as well as difficult tasks to be completed with cars and motor cycles. They were challenging, got the young people on their mettle, tested their skill, and consumed a lot of their energy.

The fifth element in most courses is training in basic auto mechanics. I have been impressed by the enthusiasm shown by instructors and young people. All that is very good.

The sixth, unscripted, element that I would throw in is that many young people find themselves, for the first time in their lives, involved in something that interests them, and able to share their enthusiasm with a group of people who care about them. That is a very positive aspect. I wish motor schemes every success, and I would not want the Bill to harm the chances of those who run them working successfully with young people.

The opportunity for a young offender to obtain a driving licence is important. Project workers say that one of the most powerful incentives that they can offer young people is the prospect that they will eventually be able to drive legally and safely. As the Bill stands, that incentive could be eliminated in many cases because of disqualification, and because insurance companies require high premiums of recently disqualified drivers, in addition to those that they already require of drivers under the age of 25. If we stop young people who very much want to drive from doing so by that combination of factors, we might edge them into reoffending.

The courts must have flexibility in such cases, and the amendments provide alternative ways of providing it. Amendment No. 9 would make disqualification discretionary in any case, and amendment No. 10 in cases where the accused was not personally responsible for the aggravating behaviour. They are not wrecking amendments, but positive amendments which will improve the Bill, and they are sensitive to the real situation.

Mr. Anderson: I am against mandatory penalties in principle, but there are probably some cases in which they would work in justice. We should perhaps concede from the start that, in the overwhelming majority of cases, there must be disqualification, but the Minister must accept that, in a small number of cases, mandatory disqualification would not work in the interests of justice.

For example, a young man of good character may enter a vehicle, then learn that it has been taken without the owner's authority—and after travelling just a few hundred yards, it might collide with another vehicle in such a way that the gravity of the incident makes it an aggravated offence.

The Bill would impose disqualification for at least one year on such a person which would have the insurance repercussions that my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) mentioned. In a number of cases, that could be viewed by the bench or the judge as working against the prospects of rehabilitation. There must be some scope for discretion in a limited number of cases. I hope that the Government will reconsider.

Mr. John Patten: The young offender cited by the hon. Member for Swansea, East might not, in the circumstances that he described, fall foul of the law, because he might not be convicted of the basic offence under section 12 of the Theft Act 1968. He could be found not guilty, because an individual could not be found guilty of the aggravating offence unless he was found to have transgressed in respect of the basic offence.

I do not disagree with the hon. Member for Huddersfield about the value of motor projects. Any sensible programme aimed at dealing with car crime committed by young men should address prevention and punishment. Those schemes are valuable on the prevention side—as, in my opinion, are the adequate punishment and deterrence measures proposed in the Bill.

Disqualification will begin to take effect at the moment of conviction: that is, when the hands of the clock will start moving. There will be no delay, even when the offender is only 15 or 16. That may seem peculiar, but I believe that it is in the interests of justice. Between the ages of 15½ and 17, the offender might go straight, in which event it would be entirely wrong for any part of the punishment—the driving ban, for instance—to come into effect on his or, more rarely, her 17th birthday.

The ban would be recorded at an early stage. When the person concerned obtained a driving licence on, say, his 17th birthday, the endorsement would still be on that licence and it would remain there for up to four years.

Mr. Sheerman: I was under the impression that the disqualification of a person aged 15½ would not become meaningful until that person became eligible, at 17, to obtain a licence. I would take a rather different view if the Minister meant that the disqualification would be spent by the time the person reached the age of 17.

Mr. Patten: It could well be spent by that time if the offender was younger than 16 when convicted and if the driving ban was for less than 12 months. That, of course, is merely the mandatory minimum; the bench could impose a ban lasting five or 10 years or longer—although I understand that the Court of Appeal has advised against long bans, because people find it difficult to keep to them and may reoffend. That is a guideline judgment which has been handed down in a leading case.

What is the point of disqualifying a person who is not yet old enough to drive, the hon. Member for Huddersfield asks? I have given one answer: any punishment should happen from the moment of sentence. I believe that it flies in the face of natural justice to delay punishment. Secondly, if a person offends while banned from driving —even if he is still only 15 or 16; at any time before his 17th birthday—he will have committed a serious offence, as the hon. Member for Swansea, East will testify. Driving in defiance of a ban carries a sentence of six months' imprisonment, even if the offender is not yet old enough to hold a licence. The courts are free to impose a period of disqualification that extends beyond the offender's 17th birthday, if they see fit.

Surely it is right for every offender who commits and is found guilty of the more serious offence to be kept away from the wheel of a vehicle for at least 12 months. Similarly, the Bill is not concerned with who was directly responsible for the specific aggravating event; it is concerned with the illegal taking of a vehicle and its consequences. It is not relevant that a person who was a willing participant in the crime was not driving the vehicle at a particular time, or that he had not incited the driver —if I may revert to the language of an earlier set of amendments. Passengers and drivers will be equally liable, as they are for the basic section 12(1) offence in the Theft Act 1968. It makes no sense to differentiate between them for the purposes of endorsement.

This is a serious offence. The Government view it seriously and so, I believe, do the public. All who become involved should be equally liable for the penalties incurred by their criminal behaviour. I hope that, following that explanation, the hon. Member for Huddersfield will see fit to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Sheerman: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

9.45 pm

Mr. Sheerman: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 4, line 26, leave out subsection (2).

The First Deputy Chairman: With this, we shall take the following amendments: No. 12, in page 4, line 29, leave out 'subsection' and insert 'subsections'.

No. 13, in page 4, line 34, at end insert—

'(1AA) Where a person is convicted of an offence under section 12A of the Theft Act 1968 (aggravated vehicle-taking), a special reason for the purposes of subsection (1) above may relate either to the offence or to the offender'.

Mr. Sheerman: The Committee will be pleased to know that this is the last group of amendments. Like the previous group, they are designed to provide the courts with greater flexibility over disqualification. They approach the issue in a different way, through the use of special reasons for not disqualifying a person. The effect of the amendments is to permit the courts to regard the fact that the offender was not driving as a special reason for not disqualifying him. However, the court could still disqualify, if it thought that that was appropriate. The amendment would also enable a court to take into account special reasons relating to the offender as well as the offence.

The last group of amendments builds on the main thrust of trying to make the Bill more reasonable and effective. We strongly believe that if the Bill eventually becomes an Act retaining some of its present imperfections, it will not address the very real problems that it should address.

Mr. John Patten: It is important to be clear about what the special reasons are, for the purposes of the legislation. Special reasons must relate to the offence, not to the offender. Special reasons do not include and have never included ill health and loss of employment. They might —I say "might" with a heavy emphasis on that word— cover an accident victim being carried to hospital in an emergency after a crash has been caused where special reasons could be pleaded, although not necessarily accepted. The courts are loth to find special reasons. The hon. Member for Huddersfield will find that section 34 of the Road Traffic Offenders Act 1988 is the legislation that governs special offences.

Amendment No. 11 would allow a court not to impose obligatory disqualification if it felt that there was a special reason—I have tried to explain, I hope to the Committee's satisfaction, what a special reason is—for not doing so: the fact that the offender was not driving the vehicle at the particular time. That runs entirely counter to the point of the Bill, which is that all those involved in the offence of illegally taking a vehicle are guilty and should be treated as such.

I can see no reason why this offence should be singled out in a way that would allow people to have taken into account the fact that inconvenience would be caused at work, when it is a long-established legal principle that special reasons do not relate to an offender's circumstances. To do so would seriously weaken the effectiveness of obligatory disqualification. I can see no reason for it.

In the light of what I have said, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. Sheerman: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 3 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 4

SHORT TITLE, COMMENCEMENT AND EXTENT

Question proposed, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

Mr. Anderson: Again I raise the question of Scotland. How can the Government justify this Bill in respect of England and Wales only? The Government say, properly, that the offence is prevalent in England and Wales and argue that there is considerable public concern about it. They say that it merits urgent attention and that the present law is inadequate in terms of its scope and penalties. What, therefore, makes Scotland different?

Is it said that the offence is less prevalent in Scotland and that degrees of latitude make the offence less frequently committed in Scotland? Is it said that there is less public concern in Scotland and that there is less urgency about the matter? Or is it said that the relevant legislation, as applied to Scotland—the 1988 Act—is such that there are no lacunae in the law as it applies to Scotland? I do not think that the Government can argue that there is a serious difference between England and Wales and Scotland, so will they assure the House that legislation for Scotland will be introduced with the same urgency?

Mr. John Patten: We are often told that Scotland is different, that it is a nation and that it has its own laws. Home Office Ministers are often lectured by Scottish Members that we should import decent bits of the Scottish law into the English and Welsh legal code. I see the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) nodding in agreement.

In Scotland, aggravated taking is dealt with under section 178 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 and under other statutory or common law offences, some of which were described graphically by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) in his brief intervention earlier this afternoon.

Measures suitable for one area of the United Kingdom may not be equally applicable to another.

Mr. Anderson: Surely the common law offences that the hon. and learned Member for Perth and Kinross (Sir N. Fairbairn) related in respect of Scotland are equally applicable in England. The Minister will be aware that the penalties available under section 178 are lower than those in England and Wales—three months imprisonment or a fine, but not both. On indictment, I believe that the maximum penalty is 12 months imprisonment. Surely the Minister is not arguing that the offence is less prevalent, or that there is less public concern, in Scotland, so why is there a difference?

Mr. Patten: I recognise that the penalties available under section 178 of the Road Traffic Act 1988 are different. The maximum penalty north of the border is 12 months imprisonment. I am not arguing that there are no differences between us. On the contrary, I am arguing that there are substantial differences between us, but all that I can say is that these are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, not for the Home Secretary or myself.

Question put and agreed to.

Clause 4 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported without amendment; not amended, considered.

Order for Third reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, That the Bill be now read the Third time.

9.53 pm

Mr. Jim Lester (Broxtowe): I support the Bill because I know that this serious offence was drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Minister of State by the chief constable of Nottinghamshire two years ago. I rise simply to ask whether it is possible for the Home Office to publish a pamphlet on the change to the law that can be widely distributed to sixth forms and to many others who commit this offence—many of whom have been charged once but have repeatedly offended—so that our young people understand how serious it is to steal a car, to drive it dangerously and in some cases to set it on fire wilfully? We want to ensure that they understand the way in which the law has changed and how it can be reinforced. I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to find out whether that can be undertaken as early as possible on completion of the Bill's passage.

Mr. John Patten: My hon. Friend the Member for Broxtowe (Mr. Lester) makes a constructive suggestion. I know how long he has been concerned about the aggravated taking of vehicles and the mayhem caused by young men in parts of Nottinghamshire over the past couple of years. His concern has been reflected by the chief constable.

I have not contemplated production of the type of leaflet to which my hon. Friend referred, but it is a good idea. We shall try to do more about car crime during 1992, and I shall reflect on my hon. Friend's comments to see whether we can accommodate his request.

My hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science—the Member for Darlington (Mr. Fallon)—is on the Front Bench with me. We know how important it is to educate children, sometimes even those in their late primary school years, about the offending temptations with which they may be faced. Last week, I was at a Salford school, having visited one of those motor projects to which the hon. Member for Huddersfield referred. I was struck by one of the comments of the primary school headmistress. She said that she felt that children aged between seven and 11 were at particular risk of being cloned by their elder brothers or elder friends into people with the same offending habits. We may well want to follow my hon. Friend's suggestion.

I believe that the Bill, as it goes to another place, has been properly and fully scrutinised on Second Reading and in Committee—as will be shown in Hansard. I hope that this excellent measure will receive not only the assent of the House but the strong support of everyone who has been so concerned about this issue during 1991. I commend the Bill to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Teachers' Pay and Conditions

9.56 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Michael Fallon): I beg to move,

That the draft Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987 (Continuation) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 20th November, be approved.

In each of the past two years, Parliament has approved continuation orders extending the life of the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987. Last year, an order was needed to ensure that the recommendations of the Interim Advisory Committee on School Teachers' Pay and Conditions in 1991-92 could be given effect. The IAC reported for the last time in January this year and, under the terms of the 1990 continuation order, the 1987 Act is due to expire on 31 March 1992.

During the debate one year ago, my hon. Friend the Minister of State assured the House that new arrangements for deciding teachers' pay would be in place by 31 March 1992, and so they are. The School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1991 received Royal Assent on 25 July. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has appointed the eight members of the schoolteachers' review body under the chairmanship of Sir Graham Day. On 20 September, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science asked the review body to submit its first report in January 1992, making recommendations on teachers' pay and conditions in the year commencing 1 April 1992.

There is, however, a need for a further continuation order, for entirely technical reasons. Before my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State makes the order giving statutory force to the 1992 schoolteachers' pay and conditions document, he is required under the 1991 Act to consult interested parties on the review body's recommendations on the Government's proposals for implementation. He has also agreed, following the practice adopted in previous years and as specifically requested by the employers and the teachers' unions, to consult the same interested parties on the details of the draft pay document giving effect to the Government's recommendations. We will, of course, move as quickly as possible, but it is most unlikely that my right hon. and learned Friend will be in a position to make the first pay and conditions order under the new Act immediately upon the expiry of the 1987 Act on 31 March 1992.

Until the first new pay and conditions order is made under the new Act, the 1987 Act needs to be kept in being for a very short time for a very specific and limited purpose—to ensure that all teachers continue to be covered by the existing pay and conditions order made under that Act. Section 6(3) of the 1987 Act provides for statutory conditions of service to continue to apply to existing contracts until new provision is made.

Teachers who enter with new contracts of employment after the Act expires will not, however, be covered. Therefore, we must ensure tonight that there is a smooth transition between the old and new pay and conditions orders and that the provisions of the 1991 pay document will continue to apply in the case of contracts of employment entered into after 31 March 1992, but before the new order giving effect to the 1992 pay and conditions document comes into force.

That is why we are obliged to take the House's time to seek approval for the final continuation order. I commend the order to the House to afford continued statutory protection to the very small number of teachers taking up new contracts of employment during any hiatus between the current date of expiry of the 1987 Act and the coming into force of the first pay and conditions order under the 1991 Act. The 1987 Act will finally be repealed alongside the making of the first pay and conditions order under the 1991 Act.

The continuation order has no bearing on arrangements for next year's pay settlement. The new schoolteachers review body is hard at work. It has received evidence from the teachers' associations, the employers and the Department of Education and Science, and has listened to the representations of all those bodies. As I have already explained, it will present its first report to my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister around the end of January next year. That report will make recommendations on the pay increase to be given to schoolteachers next year, with particular regard to any modifications which might be introduced to the system of selective payments to increase the flexibility of employers in meeting the needs of recruitment and retention. It will also consider how the pay of schoolteachers might be more closely related to their performance, in line with the principles of the citizens charter.

The review body will recommend precisely as it sees fit. The Government for their part have given a firm commitment to implement the recommendations of the review body unless there are clear and compelling reasons to do otherwise. I am confident that the work of the review body will reinforce teachers' professionalism and raise still further the esteem in which society holds our teachers.

In the meantime, this order is required simply to ensure a smooth transition between the old and new statutory arrangements and to ensure that there are no gaps in the statutory provision for the pay and conditions of schoolteachers. As such, I commend it to the House.

10.2 pm

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): I thank the Minister for the way in which he introduced the debate and set out the technical reasons for the order. We shall certainly not oppose the order because, as the Minister rightly explained, it deals with a particular provision relating to new teachers and their contracts of employment. While we have had our differences with the Government about the interim advisory committee and the way in which it has worked, it might be worthwhile at this stage, in what might be our final debate on the work of the interim advisory committee, to thank its members for the work that they have done in the past few years. They may not always have turned up with what teachers would have wished, but I am sure that there has been a great acceptance of the way in which they have carried out a very difficult task. We wish those who worked on the interim advisory committee well and we look forward to the next phase in the determination of teachers' pay which is the work of the pay review body under the chairmanship of Sir Graham Day.

As the Minister knows, we had our disagreements on the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Bill and on the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions (No. 2) Bill last year. To get to the pay review body involved an interesting and long gestation period by Ministers. It would not be appropriate to go through the arguments again today, but I suspect that teachers will judge the effectiveness of the pay review body not by our arguments on the Floor of the House or in Committee last year, but merely by the way in which it delivers. We expressed our reservations about the conditions attached to the pay review body—both the preconditions and the ability of the Minister or the Secretary of State to interfere at a later date. We look forward with interest to what the pay review body will report in January. We note that the Government are asking that organisation to bear in mind an increase in line with inflation, and feel that that may well not be sufficient, but we await the outcome with interest.

I agree with the Minister that there is a need for a consultation process. It is almost unique to hear a Minister —particularly, perhaps, the Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science—talk about the need for consultation. It has not been a characteristic of the Department of Education and Science in the past few years —[Interruption.] The Minister seems not to accept that, but if he talked to teachers about one or two recent arbitrary changes in education provision, he might well hear the view that there could have been more consultation. We welcome the promise of consultation on the report of the pay review body and hope that when that consultation takes place the Government will listen to the views expressed. It is no use having a one-way consultation process: the Government must listen.

We recognise the need for and the purpose of the order, and we shall not oppose it today.

10.7 pm

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I begin by echoing what the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) said about the interim advisory body. I have always felt a little uncomfortable about the interim stage. The Government cannot say that because, by definition, the Government have to be comfortable with everything, but it has not been a profitable period for teachers in terms of their pay.

It seems that it is impossible—or should be impossible —to discuss any aspect of teachers' pay, however technical, without relating it to the quality of teachers' performance and teaching methods. If my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State does not object, I should like to pay tribute to the Government's overall strategy. While the Government are rightly pursuing the pay review body, which I believe and certainly hope will result in a substantial rise in teachers' pay, they are simultaneously engaged—not before time—in asking serious questions about some of the methods used in our schools, most recently in primary schools.

I hope that you, Mr. Speaker, will agree that there is a fundamental connection between teachers' pay—and the mechanics of it—the esteem in which teachers are held and the methods that they use. One of the main reasons why teachers have fallen in public esteem is that the public have lost confidence in teaching methods, which, in turn, seem to have lost contact with common sense as perceived by the man on the Clapham omnibus.

In supporting the order—one could scarcely do otherwise—I should like to stress that the way forward does not lie merely in improvements in teachers' pay, necessary though they are. The way forward must also lie in a two-track policy by which we continue to promote a public debate on some of the catastrophic failed philosophies of the past. Last week, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science said that he was not going to tell teachers how to teach in primary schools or pre-empt the outcome of the inquiry that he had just announced. He then proceeded to make some characteristically common-sense comments which might seem to carping critics to pre-empt that inquiry, but who cares about that, provided his comments made good sense, which they did?

I commend the Government's handling of the pay review body and their general approach of marrying this policy, which will lead to higher pay for teachers, with a determined critique of the elements of teachers' performance which need to be discussed and openly and rigorously criticised.

10.9 pm

Mr. Fallon: This has been a brief but interesting debate. I thank those who took part in it, and I echo the gratitude that they expressed to the interim advisory committee as the end of its days draws nigh.

I was a little surprised to hear the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) looking forward to the review body's recommendations. We should not forget that his party voted against a review body. Even though tonight's debate has been reasonably even-tempered, we shall lose no opportunity when the time comes next year to remind teachers who supported a review body and who opposed it.

The hon. Member for Leeds, Central suggested that we wanted the increase from the review body to be in line with inflation. That is not quite what we suggested, which was that it should have regard to affordability. The hon. Gentleman has read one too many union submissions to that body.

My hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) must be right to say that pay should increasingly be linked to performance. That idea is in the Secretary of State's remit letter to the review body. I look forward to that beginning to apply to the teaching profession. It is long overdue and it will be warmly welcomed by senior and successful classroom teachers, who can look forward to seeing the additional efforts and successes that they have achieved in the classroom being properly rewarded in their pay structure.

In general, we look forward to the recommendations of the review body——

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): Does my hon. Friend agree that it would be wrong for a local education authority to pay teachers and others to go around and interfere when a ballot has taken place for a school to opt for grant-maintained status? The headmaster of a school in my constituency, Alan Bentley, says that people claiming to represent the LEA are calling on parents and trying to persuade them against voting to give their school grant-maintained status. Is that not wholly wrong?

Mr. Fallon: That is an extraordinary allegation and it sounds a disgraceful state of affairs. If my hon. Friend will send me the details, I will have the matter investigated.

We are confident that the review body will do much to enhance the status and professionalism of the teaching profession. I commend the order to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved.

That the draft Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987 (Continuation) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 20th November, be approved.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Mr. Speaker: With the leave of the House, I shall put together the next seven motions on the Order Paper.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101 (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

DOUBLE TAXATION

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Isle of Man) Order 1991 be made in the form of the draft laid before this House on 4th November.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Morocco) Order 1991 be made in the form of the draft laid before this House on 4th November.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Papua New Guinea) Order 1991 be made in the form of the draft laid before this House on 4th November.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Czechoslovkia) Order 1991 be made in the form of the draft laid before this House on 4th November.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Iceland) Order 1991 be made in the form of the draft laid before this House on 12th November.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Finland) Order 1991 be made in the form of the draft laid before this House on 12th November.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Double Taxation Relief (Taxes on Income) (Denmark) Order 1991 be made in the form of the draft laid before this House on 12th November.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101 (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

VAT (BUILDINGS AND LAND)

That the Value Added Tax (Buildings and Land) Order 1991 (S.I., 1991, No. 2569), dated 13th November 1991, a copy of which was laid before this House on 14th November, be approved.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101 (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

CUSTOMS DUTIES

That the Customs Duties (ECSC) (Amendment No. 6) Order 1991 (S.I., 1991, No. 2583), dated 15th November 1991, a copy of which was laid before this House on 18th November, be approved.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

Question agreed to.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101 (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

CRIMINAL LAW

That the draft Criminal Justice Act 1988 (Designated Countries and Territories) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 25th November, be approved.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

Question agreed to.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 102 (European Standing Committees).

INDIRECT TAXATION

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 6762/89 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by H. M. Customs and Excise on 15th July 1991, relating to completion of the Internal Market and approximation of indirect taxes, 6641/90 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memoranda submitted by H. M. Customs and Excise on 12th November 1990, 17th May 1991, 15th October 1991 and 25th November 1991, relating to the common system of Value Added Tax, 6642/90 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by H. M. Customs and Excise on 12th November 1991, relating to administrative co-operation in the field of indirect taxation, and 9670/90 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by H. M. Customs and Excise on 12th November 1991, relating to the general arrangements for the holding, movement and control of products subject to excise duty; and congratulates the Government on negotiating an agreement on indirect tax rates, which in particular safeguards the Government's right to continue its existing zero rates for VAT and an agreement on the VAT technical system which provides for the effective operation of the intra-Community VAT system after 1992, and includes provision for the continuation of intra-Community tax-free shopping for a transitional period, together with an agreement on enhanced administrative co-operation arrangements which will help to combat fraud; supports the proposals on the movement and control of excise goods, which in particular include provision for the continuation of intra-Community duty-free shopping for a transitional period, and for minimum indicative limits to distinguish between commercial and private cross-border transactions in alcohol and tobacco; and welcomes the significant progress which these agreements and proposals represent toward the abolition of fiscal frontiers and the creation of the single market.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

Question agreed to.

Ex-Service Men

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

10.14 pm

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): I am delighted to have the opportunity briefly to raise the subject of Government policies affecting ex-service men. It is particularly apposite that I should do so, because I believe that my constituency of Gosport contains more service men and probably more retired service personnel than any other, and a very fine contribution to the constituency they make too, although, of course, the subject is one of general application throughout the United Kingdom.

The Royal British Legion, which deals with more cases of ex-service men's welfare than any other organisation, draws on its experience to say that it would be extremely helpful if, in dealing with issues, it could deal with one Government Department. The Royal British Legion finds that, as it deals with 15 or 16 Government Departments, there can be problems of complication in dealing with different Departments, there can be duplication of information provided to the Ministry of Defence, the Department of Social Security, the Department of Health and the Department of the Environment, and there can be delays arising from that duplication.

In the case, for instance, of an invalided service man, there can be a special problem with the individual's health, there can be a problem with his housing if he is living in service accommodation, there can be a problem with the Department of Employment if he is seeking a job, and there can be a problem with the Department of Social Security.

The suggestion of the Royal British Legion is that there should be a Department for ex-service men's and ex-service women's affairs—a Department which would be comparable with departments of veterans' affairs in other countries. In other countries, such departments are found to be extremely helpful. For example, in the United States, Canada and Australia, the structure operates to provide one department in which one Minister can answer for all matters relating to all veterans' and ex-service men's affairs and can co-ordinate the work that is required in dealing with their special problems.

Why do we need a special Department? Why should ex-service personnel be treated differently from any other group of people? There are 18 million service men and women and their dependants, and their experience and service exposes them to special strains and pressures. Much is demanded of service personnel, as we all know. Service life provides its own framework, which is of great assistance to individuals when they are in their service occupation, but some people find that, on withdrawing from service life, the loss of that framework provides them with special problems. Most, of course, adapt very well. They are capable, adaptable people and in most cases there are no problems. However, I know from my constituency experience that when there are problems, they tend to be multiple ones. There would be great benefit in having one Department.

It is not a new suggestion, nor is it a party political suggestion, that there should be a Department for ex-service men's affairs. The hon. Member for Knowsley, North (Mr. Howarth), with all-party support, presented a ten-minute Bill on 26 February 1991. My hon. Friend the

[Mr. Peter Viggers]

Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey), in a written question to the Prime Minister which was answered on 13 June, again asked whether there could be a separate Department for ex-service men's affairs. The Prime Minister answered that he did not consider that such a Department would be appropriate. I respect the fact that the request was rejected on that occasion, but I hope that the idea will be borne in mind by Ministers.

If Ministers consider the matter further, it is suggested—this view would be shared by the Royal British Legion and by the Officers Pension Society—that it is the self-evident responsibility of the Ministry of Defence to defend this country and that it is the responsibility of the Department of Social Security to deal with pensions and social affairs generally. The general view, therefore, would be that it would be better to include a separate Department and a separate Minister within the Department of Social Security if that idea should find attraction.

In dealing with service pensions, it would be wrong and churlish of me not to pay respect to what the Government have already done in respect of service pensions. The Government's pay and pensions record is quite outstanding. One of the very first actions of the Government when they were elected in 1979 was to rectify the problem which had been created by the previous Labour Government, who held back service pay as part of their pay restraint policy, in an attempt to contol inflation.

One of our first acts in government was to increase service pay by a massive 32·1 per cent. That in itself was of great assistance in rectifying the problems of service pensions, because pensions are calibrated against pay. As a Government, we have consistently held service pay and pensions at a reasonable level for those currently serving and now retiring.

On a separate issue, I am proud to have been personally associated with a five-year campaign to win pensions for the first time for a completely different group of women, the pre-1950 widows who, until 1979, had no service pension at all. That anomaly has also been rectified by the Government. I am proud that more than 20,000 pre-1950 widows are or have been enjoying service pensions because of the Government's actions in introducing such pensions in November 1979.

It was also this Government who recognised the special problems of the war widows whose husbands had served before 1973. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence introduced a new extra ex-gratia war widow's pension of a further £40 per week, making that payment tax-free so that it would not count against income-related benefits. The Government's record is therefore a proud one.

Nevertheless, there are anomalies, and the Officers' Pensions Society has been assiduous, as always, in pointing them out to the Government. I could recite a long catalogue of them, but the first major one relates to the disparities in retired pay, which depends on the level of remuneration of the individual officer or man at the date of his retirement. There are serious pension troughs. Those who retired under the 1956 code of pensions, for instance, are worse off than those who retired under the 1950 or 1945 pension codes. Similarly, those who retired in 1976 or 1977 are in a serious pension trough. The amounts can be substantial.

I should like my hon. Friend the Minister to give serious consideration at the earliest opportunity to introducing a floor—a minimum level of pension—for each rank. It is wrong that an individual of one rank can be paid a lower pension than an individual in a lower rank simply because the individual in the higher rank happened to retire in the wrong month or year and is thereby disadvantaged.

My second major point relates to a subject that I have been pursuing for many years. I raise it this evening because I fear that there is a grave risk that the Government are going seriously wrong on one point which, although it affects only a tiny number of people, is extremely important. The war pensions scrutiny report was due to be discussed by the Central Advisory Committee on War Pensions on 5 December. It is interesting that that report is being considered by a committee which is chaired by our noble Friend, Lord Henley, who is a Minister at the Department of Social Security, not the Ministry of Defence. That is a good example of the problem of the multiplicity of Departments to which I drew attention earlier.

The war pensions scrutiny report highlights the surprising point that whereas the Ministry of Defence is responsible for defence pensions, the Department of Social Security is responsible for war widows' pensions. At the moment, an officer's war widow has the right to have her pension restored if she remarries and is then bereaved a second time. However, the opposite is true for a widow of an other rank. If that widow remarries, she receives a gratuity but does not have the right to have her pension restored. This is a serious issue: I know from my constituency experience that as, fortunately, people are living longer, it is becoming increasingly likely that elderly ladies will wish to remarry, but they are faced with an agonising choice, knowing that, if they remarry, they will forfeit the service pension. That is an extremely serious point.

It worries me that the scrutiny committee may be moving towards taking the view that the pension arrangements that apply to other ranks should apply in the case of officers' widows as well. That would be wrong. To deprive war widows of the right to have their pensions restored at the time of second bereavement would be socially wrong. All widows in receipt of pensions should be in a position where it is advantageous and attractive for them to remarry, recognising that they will forfeit their pension during the period of remarriage, but that they have an automatic right to have the pension restored should they be bereaved a second time. That will encourage second marriages, which is socially desirable. It is proper and fair for us to encourage remarriage in that way.

I could mention a catalogue of other anomalies in the treatment of service pensioners and their widows, but I hope that I have given enough examples to persuade my right hon. Friend the Minister that problems exist which could be diminished by creating a single Department to deal with the affairs of ex-service men and women.

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Archie Hamilton): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Gosport (Mr. Viggers) on securing this debate. I am sure that the issues that he has raised are of interest to many

hon. Members. I am aware that, for several years, he has taken a particular interest in the provision made for service personnel and their dependants after retirement.

My hon. Friend suggested that a separate Department of ex-service men's affairs should be established within Government. I understand that such departments exist in several countries. However, there is a tendency for the interest to centre on medical programmes for veterans. Such programmes are unnecessary in the United Kingdom, because ex-service personnel, like other citizens, have access to the national health service. In the particular case of those who have disabilities which are attributed to their service in the armed forces, or of the dependants of those who die as a result of their service, special provision is made in the Department of Social Security through the war pensions scheme. Associated with that scheme is the war pensions welfare service, which is available to assist war pensioners and their families.

As my hon. Friend said, in the United Kingdom several Government Departments are involved in matters which have an impact on ex-service personnel Major social and welfare provision for them is rightly integrated with that for the population as a whole, as is the case with the national health service.

My hon. Friend referred to service pensions. As the House will be aware, we have in place a pension scheme for the armed forces which is specially designed to recognise and provide for the type of careers that are available to service personnel. For those who are able to serve for a full career, which will normally end at the age of 55, the scheme provides benefits at a level which in most types of employment are not available until the age of 60 and possibly 65.

The armed forces scheme provides for those who retire at 55 a pension at approximately half the rate of the military salary that they received at the date of retirement and a lump sum of three times the rate of pension. However, the career of many service personnel must end much earlier than the age of 55, so the pension scheme must be flexible. For those who have to retire earlier, a pension is awarded for immediate payment after as little as 16 years' service for officers, counting service from the age of 21. For other ranks the minimum requirement is 22 years' service, counted from the age of 18.

Not only are those pensions brought into payment immediately, but, in addition to taking account of the length of reckonable service given, they include a further element to allow for the early termination of the service career. Those pensions are also accompanied by a lump sum of three times the annual rate of pension awarded.

On the relationship between the rate of pay earned on the last day of service and the amount of pension which will be awarded, I confirm that the appropriate annual rates of military salary in force at the date of retirement, not those enforced earlier or later, are used as the basis for calculating pension scales. That is one aspect of what is known as the "code system" under which service pensions are awarded.

Another aspect of the code is that pensions are based on what is known as a "representative" rate of pay for each rank, rather than on the rate received by each member. Thus, although service men of the same rank may receive different rates of pay, perhaps because they need specialist skills, they will be awarded exactly the same rate of pension provided that they retire on the same date and have given the same length of reckonable service.

The representative rate of pay for each rank is taken from the military salary payable to those who have a combatant role, and I am sure that the House would accept the logic of that.

I recognise that, although the arrangements achieve uniformity of awards within each "code" period, they also have the effect that those who retire on either side of the date on which pay increases come into effect will receive different awards of pension. Those differences may be appreciable if the pay award is large. That is not an ideal situation, but it is only one aspect of a pension system, which is recognised as having many advantageous features for service men.

The impact of increased living costs on those who rely on a service pension as their primary source of income in retirement is not overlooked. Service pensions are protected against inflation by index linking. In common with other public service schemes, that takes the form of annual increases, which reflect in full previous movement in the retail prices index.

While the purchasing power of pensions is maintained in that way, the increases awarded are likely to differ from those which occur in the rates of pay over a corresponding period. The difference can be in either direction. Under conditions of high price inflation, pensions in payment may move ahead at a faster rate than is the case for levels of pay. At other times, pay rates may increase at a faster rate than the level of price inflation then being experienced.

The two different mechanisms—the award of pensions according to the current rates of pay and the subsequent protection of those pensions against inflation by index-linking—do not achieve a perfect balance. Each is generally accepted as appropriate to its purpose, but, when viewed over an extended period, variations in the pensions received by individuals who retire at different times are likely to occur.

Only one other factor can have that effect. Pension schemes are not static, and the armed forces pension scheme is no exception. Particularly in the period since the end of world war two, there has been an increasing emphasis in this country on financial provision for retirement. That has been reflected in the increasing development of occupational pension schemes. Consequently, the nature and structure of the scheme for members of the armed forces has been subject to review and significant improvement on a number of occasions. Improvements have also been introduced at other times, as the scheme keeps pace with general developments, especially those adopted by other public service schemes, in line with the main thrust of Government policy on provision for retirement.

In making such improvements, a particular and important principle has to be taken into account—that of non-retrospection. Improvements are available to those who are serving at the time that a change is implemented and who retire subsequently. Eligibility is not extended to include those who had already retired. The reason for that is well understood. Any improvement increases the future costs of the scheme, but those will normally arise progressively, as people who are eligible for the improved terms retire, or otherwise qualify over an extended period. If all existing pensioners were also made eligible, there would be an immediate and, by comparison, disproportionate escalation in cost. In those circumstances, worthwhile improvements would be difficult to achieve.

[Mr. Archie Hamilton]

I have gone into these matters at some length because it is important to make three points. There are a variety of reasons why the pensions of individuals who have similar rank and length of service, but who retire at different times, may differ. The general considerations and principles which give rise to that for retired members of the armed forces are potentially applicable to the generality of occupational schemes, both within the public service and outside.

Action which was specifically designed to modify existing pensions in payment, so as to diminish differences which may exist today, would be contrary to long-established principles and practices.

My hon. Friend mentioned minimum rates of pension. I note the suggestion that minimum rates of pension should be established and that all service personnel whose pension is below such a minimum should have it increased accordingly. To decide what those minima should be would, in itself, be an arbitrary exercise. More important, it would be contrary to normal principles to proceed in that way. All existing pensions were correctly calculated in accordance with the provisions in force at the time of retirement. They have subsequently been increased through index linking. I acknowledge the attraction for those at the lower end of any comparison to levelling-up process, but I cannot agree that we should undertake it. The implications are widespread and extremely costly.

My hon. Friend mentioned the case of war widows who marry again and subsequently lose their pensions on being widowed for a second time. He pointed out that other ranks are treated differently from officers' widows. As he said, the whole question is being considered by my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, who is well aware of the problem and is addressing it. It is basically the responsibility of the Department of Social Security, and it would not be appropriate for me to comment on how its work is progressing.

I shall now spell out the main provisions of the armed forces pension scheme as it applies to service widows. The widows of service men who retired before 30 March 1973 generally receive a pension which is one third of that received by their husband. Service given from 31 March 1973 onwards generates widow's pension at one half of that received by the husband. On subsequent remarriage, entitlement to a widow's pension ceases, except to the extent that there is an entitlement to a widow's guaranteed minimum pension.

Except for some small variations in the effective date of the change from one third to one half rate, these provisions correspond with those of other public service schemes. As with other improvements, the increased proportion of a husband's pension payable to his widow was not extended to include those who had already retired.

The point has been made that the relatively lower rates of pension received by those men who retired at various times in the past also result in lower pensions for their widows. I acknowledge that that is so and that there is a direct proportional relationship between the two. However, I cannot accept that that is in some way wrong.

In each case, the pensions that result are a reflection of the entitlements of the scheme at the time when the service was given. Of course, they have the significant benefit of being fully index-linked. I recognise that it would be attractive for those concerned if their pensions could be made greater, but, as I said earlier, it is a basic principle in the management of occupational pension schemes that improvements are not made retrospectively. Without it, we would not have been able to achieve the benefits that are available nowadays.

Mention has been made of the position of widows who lose their pension on remarriage and who are unfortunately widowed again. The position under the armed forces scheme is that an entitlement to a widow's pension ceases, or is restricted to the guaranteed minimum pension, in the event of remarriage. That applies also in other public service schemes, although I am aware that it is not always the case in the private sector. In public service schemes, however, the view is taken that the effect of remarriage is to terminate the condition of widowhood.

I am aware of the concern that, under these arrangements, the former widow may find herself in difficult financial circumstances if she is widowed for a second time. I believe that it is widely known that my Department has discretionary powers to restore the original service widow's pension to payment, if circumstances are felt to be appropriate. Indeed, it has been made clear that restoration will normally be agreed if a widow is worse off on second widowhood than when she was receiving her widow's pension.

It has been suggested that restoration should be automatic, thus enabling widows to remarry with absolute confidence that, whatever may happen, they will have a service pension to fall back on if they are again left on their own. My hon. Friend referred to such circumstances. However, to operate in such a way would be to make assumptions about future events. The result of remarriage may enhance a former widow's pension as her second husband may provide for her in the event of his death. Other events may also affect her financial circumstances. There are factors that could be sensibly allowed for if and when the need for a decision on restoration arises.

Under our current arrangements, I accept that there is no guarantee that a widow's pension will be restored once entitlement has ceased. However, there can be a reasonable degree of assurance that it will be restored if there is a need. There is no real prospect that a widow will be left worse off than she had been originally. I believe that that is fair to both sides.

We are talking about public money. It would be wrong to restore a war widow's pension if she was widowed the second time and her second husband was a man of financial probity who was able to leave her in comfortable circumstances. In that event, restoration would mean that that widow was being paid out of public funds when she did not have an obvious need for that money.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising the matter and for the opportunity to explain my Ministry's position on it.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Pupil-teacher Ratio

1. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will state the current pupil-teacher ratio, and that of May 1979; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Michael Fallon): In January 1979 there were 18·9 pupils per teacher in maintained nursery, primary and secondary schools in England. By January this year the ratio had fallen to 17·2 pupils per teacher.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend accept the congratulations and thanks of parents, children, teachers and all concerned with education on the great improvement on the 1979 figures? Will he also confirm that overall teacher vacancies have improved by 30 per cent. in the past year? Will he consider conducting an inquiry into what the optimum pupil-teacher ratio should be for each age of children, because that ratio will differ? Some people could not teach five children very well, while others can teach 75 perfectly well.

Mr. Fallon: The situation today is a big improvement on the 1970s. What is most important is how classes are taught and how a school manages its teaching staff, rather than the actual number employed or the number of pupils per class.

Mr. Fatchett: Will the Minister confirm that since the previous election in 1987 the number of youngsters in primary schools who are taught in classes of more than 30 has increased by 100,000? We now face the disgraceful situation of nearly 1 million children in primary schools being taught in classes of more than 30. Are those figures unacceptable even to the Government? Is it not true that Ministers would not accept such class sizes for their children in the private sector?

Mr. Fallon: Primary class sizes were much bigger in the 1970s under the last Labour Government. I cannot confirm the figures that the hon. Gentleman has given. I repeat that what is important is how a school deploys its teaching staff, not the number of people it happens to have on its books.

Mr. Anthony Coombs: I welcome the significant improvement in teacher-pupil ratios since the last Labour Government were in power. My hon. Friend should be aware how much we welcome his statement and that of the Secretary of State, which concentrate on how children are taught in schools rather than on the number of teachers employed. In that regard, does my hon. Friend agree that the commission that the Secretary of State has set up under Professor Alexander to look at the way in which primary school children are taught is particularly welcome? In that way we shall be able to improve standards of education in primary schools.

Mr. Fallon: The statement that my right hon. and learned Friend made about primary education has been warmly welcomed by parents right across the country who are increasingly concerned about the methods and organisation of delivering primary education in our schools.

City Technology Colleges

2. Mr. Grocott: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how much money has to date been contributed by the private sector to city technology colleges.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Tim Eggar): By the end of the colleges' last school year on 31 August, nearly £19 million had been contributed to city technology colleges by the private sector. More than £30 million has been committed in all.

Mr. Grocott: Can the Minister confirm that in the last financial year, 1990-91, no less than 88 per cent. of the capital costs of the CTC programme, including those of the Telford college in my constituency, were paid for by the taxpayer? Industrialists have been notably unwilling and unforthcoming in responding to the Government's requests. Can the Minister allay my suspicions about this by assuring me that as a result of a few industrialists having contributed to the programme we shall not find the names of certain chairmen and managing directors appearing in the new year honours list? Since we the taxpayers are having to pay for the programme, can the Minister at least listen to the taxpayers on this and spend these huge sums of money on all our children and not just a few?

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman should be doing the listening. He should be listening to parents in his constituency who have opted overwhelmingly for the CTC, with more than 500 applications for 248 places last year and with 660 applications for next year. Before he makes wild aspersions about other people, he should visit the school in his constituency, where he will find excellent education going on.

Mr. Brandon-Bravo: Will the Minister pay tribute to the generosity of Mr. Harry Djanogly, who gave £1 million of his personal money to see that Nottingham has a CTC? Will he confirm that the capital cost of the school is no different from the cost of building a new school anywhere, that the funding per pupil is no different compared with any other state pupils and that the evil campaign by Nottingham county council would deny the most deprived children in our inner city a first-class education?

Mr. Eggar: I completely agree with my hon. Friend. Nottingham CTC is extremely attractive to parents and is very well supported. The attitude of Nottinghamshire local education authority has been quite disgraceful by any standards. Why should it be seeking to deprive children of a first-class education? I wish that Labour Members would make their position clear. Do they really want to deprive parents of the kind of choice that their policies would mean in Nottingham, Telford and elsewhere?

Mr. Flannery: Why does the Minister not talk reality about the city technology colleges? He knows as well as I do that, like the assisted places scheme, they are another step towards privatisation of the education system. The inspectorate is another example. The hon. Gentleman knows full well that the CTCs were intended to be paid for by private employers. That failed, so the Government are taking money from the taxpayer to the tune, with the assisted places scheme, of more than £500 million— [Interruption.] That is what it is costing, based on the Government's own figures. That is why I ask the Minister to admit the reality of the situation, with that amount of money being removed from the state system of education.

Mr. Eggar: The Labour party will simply never understand the position. Parents want choice. Whether they live in the inner cities or elsewhere, they want choice to send their children to independent schools with the benefit of an assisted place, choice to send their children to grammar schools and choice under the new technology schools initiative. Choice is hated by the Labour party because it cannot control what parents and children want if choice is offered. That is the old-fashioned type of socialism that the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) has always pursued, and unfortunately the occupants of the Labour Front Bench have taken a lead from him rather than from more sensible parents.

Teachers' Pay

3. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the proposed independent pay review body for teachers.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): The school teachers' review body has been asked to make recommendations on the pay and conditions of school teachers in 1992-93. It will report to the Prime Minister in the new year.

Mr. MacKay: Parents in my constituency are anxious that teachers should be properly remunerated because teachers with low morale are bad teachers, and they are particularly concerned that there might just be a slight possibility of a Labour Government next year, with a resultant cut in teachers' real pay, as happened when Labour was last in office. Will my right hon. and learned Friend confirm that under Conservative rule there has been a 30 per cent. increase in real terms in teachers' pay and that there was an increase of only 6 per cent. during the last Labour Government?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend is correct. There has been a substantial advance in real-terms pay under our Administration, and this year the pay award that has been made for the current year is increasing the teachers' pay bill overall by 11·3 per cent. I agree with my hon. Friend that raising standards requires having a good quality teaching force, properly rewarded and encouraged. The public welcome the way we are treating teachers as a professional body by taking the advice of the independent review body, and we look forward to Graham Day and his colleagues producing the kind of advice that we require about how our teachers should be rewarded. The fact that Labour Members voted against the review body approach to teachers' pay should provide the warning that my hon. Friend described.

Mr. Skinner: Why should teachers have to submit to an incomes policy when the bosses made a 22·7 per cent. average increase last year? What is good enough for the bosses should be good enough for the teachers.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Gentleman has just been reminded of the shabby teachers' pay record of the Labour Government whom he supported some years ago— [Interruption.] It was his Government then, although their successors may not be represented on the Front Bench in quite the way that the hon. Gentleman would wish.

We have set up a review body to advise the Government on the proper remuneration for teachers. It is a status that we give to very few public servants, but we are giving teachers a special status because we realise that their professionalism and commitment are essential to a good teaching service.

Examination Results

4. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the relationship between spending by local education authorities and examination results.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: There appears to be no direct relationship between the level of education spending and examination results. Some authorities obtain good results at much lower cost than others.

Mr. Butterfill: Can my right hon. and learned Friend confirm reports in The Guardian earlier this year that the 12 local authorities with the worst record in English, mathematics and modern language results were all controlled by the Liberal Democrats or the Labour party?

Mr. Clarke: I am not sure whether I can confirm that off the cuff, but The Guardian sometimes gets it right. The figures that I have before me certainly show that the highest spending authorities comprise almost entirely Labour and the occasional Liberal authority and that those have some of the worst results. There is an enormous gap between inner London boroughs, which spent £2,745 per pupil in 1989-90, under the old Inner London education authority, and Kent, which spent £1,570 per pupil in a comparable year and achieved much better results.

Mr. O'Hara: Will the Secretary of State confirm that local authorities that perform badly in the league tables, which cover a very narrow spectrum of examination results, often spend more on pupils with special educational needs? A local authority that spends less on special educational needs does so either because it has less incidence of such needs or because it is in dereliction of its duties to pupils with those needs. If it has less incidence of such needs, does it not follow that it should score highly in the narrow spectrum of examination results for the most able pupils?

Mr. Clarke: I am aware of no evidence that pupils with special educational needs are distributed unevenly across the country. Special educational needs include pupils with physical disabilities or particular difficulties in learning. It is simply not true that those needs correlate with high spending local authorities. There are great discrepancies in the amount spent by one authority compared with another, and in the amount that local authorities spend on central administration, but there is little correlation with the results. When we produce the seven-year-olds' test results local authority by local authority, good results will be shown for some authorities serving comparatively deprived urban areas, while shockingly poor results will be shown for others serving similar areas. The quality of education rather than the amount spent is what counts.

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: Is it fair for young pupils in an area controlled by a Labour council to have their prospects of good examination results considerably reduced? Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that, year after year, the examination results of Wolverhampton education authority—a high-spending council—are in the bottom half of the national league? Is it any wonder that I now plead with my right hon. and learned Friend to intervene on behalf of pupils and parents who wish to move their children over the border to Staffordshire because they are fed up with their own high-spending council and they want that council to take responsibility?

Mr. Clarke: I agree with my hon. Friend's point. The figures for 1989-90 show that Wolverhampton was about 20th in the list of spenders but 83rd in the list of GCSE results.

Mr. Straw: Is the Secretary of State aware of the serious threat to standards in schools caused by his spending decision in the Prime Minister's county of Cambridgeshire, where the Cambridge branch of the Secondary Heads Association has said that impending cuts will cause "larger classes . . . fewer books, less equipment, reduced sixth form provision and serious difficulty in providing the national curriculum"?

When will the Secretary of State accept responsibility for the crisis in education provision in Cambridgeshire, or does he believe that it is just another scare got up by pupils, parents, teachers and Conservative county councillors in that county?

Mr. Clarke: In fact, Cambridgeshire will enjoy an increase in real terms in resources next year. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I publicly criticised the so-called cuts announced by Cambridgeshire a short time ago. Cambridgeshire is planning substantially to increase spending on education, but has chosen, for some reason best known to itself, to make more money available by imposing sharp reductions in its secondary school budgets. I am prepared to criticise that action when taken by a Conservative council. The hon. Gentleman supports high spending and progressive teaching methods but seems indifferent to the results, which he does not want to give the public in any comprehensible form. He should not intervene in little local difficulties in Cambridgeshire which, sooner or later, will be sorted out when the authority spends its additional resources sensibly by devoting them to raising the quality of education.

Second Degrees

5. Rev. Martin Smyth: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will review the operation of the present system of discretionary awards for those undertaking courses for second degrees.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Alan Howarth): Detailed arrangements for postgraduate student support are kept under review, but we have no present plans for major changes.

Rev. Martin Smyth: Does the Minister expect that while the award system is kept under review and resources are scarce, some consideration should be given to students who come from poor backgrounds and achieve high marks but are turned down because of a shortage of places? Does he accept in particular that there is a problem involving students from Northern Ireland who have attended English universities and been recommended for further degrees and second awards, but are turned down because they are from Northern Ireland?

Mr. Howarth: The hon. Gentleman raises two points. He recently raised two cases on behalf of his constituents. I appreciate his concern that the practical operation of the system for conferring postgraduate awards on Northern Ireland residents can be confusing and may create difficulties. I am grateful to him for drawing my attention to that. The practicalities are being considered by the research councils in the Department of Education in Northern Ireland. I hope that arrangements will be introduced which will be more convenient for Northern Ireland residents. As for the criteria for granting postgraduate awards, postgraduate study and research are academically demanding and candidates should be selected by competition to ensure that the resources available are used as effectively as possible.

Sir John Farr: Will my hon. Friend look at the issue again? In England there are cases where degree holders cannot get jobs and are therefore forced to attend further education courses to try to improve their qualifications. Will my hon. Friend look at the matter in light of the present strained position in the jobs market?

Mr. Howarth: The overall number of postgraduate awards has considerably increased over the years. Between 1979-80 and 1990-91, the total of new studentships awarded by research councils rose by almost 28 per cent. We must consider priorities for public expenditure on education, as elsewhere. It is questionable whether it would be a topmost priority for us in the context of present economic circumstances to urge a substantial increase in the overall funding of postgraduate study.

Sport Funding

6. Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will discuss with the chairman of the Sports Council when next they meet the long-term funding of sport in the United Kingdom.

9. Ms. Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next plans to meet the chairman of the Sports Council to discuss funding for sport.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Robert Atkins): The funding of sport in the United Kingdom is one of many issues that I discuss regularly with the chairman of the Sports Council.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: The Minister will know that the Sports Council is funded on a year-by-year basis whereas, by contrast, the Arts Council receives its funding on a three-year rolling programme. Does the Minister agree that three-year funding for the Sports Council would allow it to plan better for development and expansion? Will he undertake to achieve a three-year funding programme for the Sports Council?

Mr. Atkins: That is an interesting point. There are differing views about whether three years or a single year period would be better or worse. Three years provide some degree of continuity, but they also build in a degree of inflexibility, making it difficult to react to change. I have no hard and fast views on the matter and I undertake to consider it, but there are no immediate plans to do as the hon. and learned Gentleman suggests.

Ms. Hoey: Has the Minister seen the Sports Council report on projected capital investment by local authorities? Does he realise that it shows huge decreases for the next five years, especially in London, with up to 95 per cent. cuts in inner London and 85 per cent. cuts in outer London? Does he share my view and that of the Sports Council that, with local authorities providing nearly 90 per cent. of all participatory sports facilities, unless we get more capital for our local authorities they will be able to spend money only on basic repairs?

Mr. Atkins: The most up-to-date figures that we have on these matters show a continuing increase in capital provision, but I recognise that there has been some indication of a downturn in the most recent, as yet uncompleted, year. Our view is that we should let local authorities make their own decisions about their priorities. We shall have to watch and see whether that will mean a cut in sports provision. I have my eye on the subject; the hon. Lady's point is well taken and, in so far as I have control over these matters, I shall make certain that local authorities concentrate as much of their resources on local sport and recreation provision as they should.

Mr. Cormack: On the point made by the hon. and learned Member for Fife, North-East (Mr. Campbell), does my hon. Friend agree that funding both for sport and the arts could be far higher and much more in line with demand if we had a national lottery? Will he undertake to support the Bill to be introduced by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Burton (Mr. Lawrence)?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend knows full well that there are differing views on that subject. My own are well known. If my hon. Friend wants to hear them, I shall be more than happy to tell him afterwards.

Mr. Gregory: Will my hon. Friend agree, when considering the long-term funding for the Sports Council, to look sympathetically on its application for relocation expenses for its planned move from London to the city of York?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend represents his city with as much assiduity as my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo) represents his, and both are keen on a move by the Sports Council to one of those two great cities. There are no plans at present for such a move. Any request for costs would have to go to my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. Denis Howell: When the Minister met the nine regional chairmen last week they regarded his statement that he sought to achieve no more funding for sport in this country—Wales received 8·5 per cent., Scotland 15 per cent. and the Arts Council 14 per cent., but the Minister went for only 4 per cent.—as a craven surrender to the Treasury. Is it not time the hon. Gentleman did the job he is paid for and stood up for British sport?

Mr. Atkins: The right hon. Gentleman is as wrong about that as he was in his assertion during the recent debate that I had refused to meet the regional Sports Council chairmen, which he knows to be untrue. In my discussions with the regional councils for sport and recreation—[Interruption.] There is a football hooligan shouting from the Opposition Benches——

Mr. Speaker: Do not stir it up.

Mr. Atkins: Wot me, guv?

The right hon. Gentleman's contention is quite wrong. We went for the rate of inflation, and that is what the Sports Council got. Adding to that all the other money that the Government have provided for sport, sport can reckon that it has had a pretty fair deal from the Government.

Mr. Dickens: Would my hon. Friend, the excellent Minister for Sport, agree that those who play and train for sport are the least likely to get involved in offences? Does he agree that sport is one of the most character-building of activities? Will he pursue sports within our schools?

Mr. Atkins: My hon. Friend is living proof of his own contention.

Student Loans

7. Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many applications for student loans have been processed since their introduction.

Mr. Alan Howarth: More than 245,000 students have received loans since the introduction of the student loans scheme in autumn 1990.

Mr. Pike: Does the Minister accept that the Secretary of State was mistaken when he said that the initial slow and small take-up of student loans showed that there was no widespread poverty and hardship among students since all the evidence of citizens advice bureaux, Members' mail and so on shows clearly that, because of the reducing value of student grants and the attack on student benefits, there is real and widespread hardship and poverty among the British student population?

Mr. Howarth: The rate of applications for student loans this year is almost double what it was a year ago, recruitment to higher education is soaring and student numbers have increased by 10 per cent. this autumn for the third year running. We are giving more public support to more students than ever before. During the 1980s the participation of 18-year-olds in higher education doubled from one in eight of the population to one in four. That is a widening of personal opportunity, a lifting of the nation's educational attainments and a sharpening of our competitive skills which will stand us in good stead for the future.

Mr. Batiste: Does my hon. Friend agree that the real problem facing students, particularly those from areas such as my own in Leeds, is that the local education authorities have been extraordinarily late in supplying their mandatory grants? For example, some eight weeks after the term began students in Leeds still had not had their grants. How long will it be before the Student Loans Company will be able to administer mandatory grants as well as cut out the middle man?

Mr. Howarth: My hon. Friend rightly draws attention to a deplorable state of affairs that applies in a limited number of authorities—about seven—of which his own in Leeds is a conspicuous example. We have a system of student support as generous as any in the world, but, under long-established arrangements, local education authorities administer the award system and students depend on their playing their part. I am concerned at the failure of Leeds in that regard. We wrote to the Leeds authority at the end of October but no one replied. We sent a reminder letter but received no reply. I am told that the authority is not answering the telephone and that is not good enough.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: The Minister will nevertheless be aware of the real hardship this summer and of the queues at the soup kitchens on the campuses. Does he believe that the loans plus grants system covers the full year or does it cover only the terms after the Christmas and Easter vacations and, if so, what does he recommend to students who cannot find work during the summer in the present employment conditions and who had to resort last summer to the soup kitchens?

Mr. Howarth: We introduced the new system of student support last year. We uprated the grant and introduced a top-up loan, the effect of which was that publicly provided support for students rose by 25 per cent. Most students became ineligible for social security benefits, but the loan that was made available was well above the average benefit claimed. To ensure that individual students were not losers under the system, access funds were distributed to higher education institutions for them to use at their discretion to help students in particular need. That is a soundly based principle. More students than ever before are entering higher education. It is important that colleges and universities use the access funds sensitively and target them on those who need them. If students do not take up the publicly provided loans that are available for them, they are neglecting an important element of the student support system.

Grant-maintained Schools

8. Mr. Shersby: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many secondary schools in the London borough of Hillingdon have now been approved for grant-maintained status and how many applications are still outstanding.

Mr. Eggar: Eight schools in Hillingdon have now been approved for grant-maintained status. There are no outstanding applications. That number, which is almost half of Hillingdon's secondary schools, is both a testament to the support shown by Hillingdon to GM status and a rebuke to those local education authorities that remain hostile to the policy.

Mr. Shersby: Is my hon. Friend aware that Hillingdon is leading the country in recognising parents' wishes? Does he agree that grant-maintained status plays a significant role in raising the morale of the teaching profession, raising education standards and improving the fabric of buildings?

Mr. Eggar: I agree completely with my hon. Friend. The move to grant-maintained status has been overwhelmingly supported by the parents of pupils at the Hillingdon schools that opted to go grant-maintained. When I visited Bishopshalt school with my hon. Friend, I saw for myself the superb improvement in equipment and facilities that it has managed to achieve only shortly after attaining grant-maintained status.

Adult Education

10. Mr. Latham: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he will make a statement on his replies to representations which he has received regarding the future financing of adult education.

Mr. Eggar: In reply to representations on that matter, my right hon. and learned Friend and I have made it clear that funding will continue to be available from central Government for all types of further education for adults. There is no question of courses being discontinued, or of fees rising, as a result of the Government's reforms.

Mr. Latham: Is my hon. Friend aware that, despite his welcome answer, deep concern is still felt by Leicestershire community colleges—which have a proud and long-standing record of providing adult education—that they will be squeezed out by the new proposals? Will he reconsider the matter in the interests of the widespread rural provision of that essential and popular service?

Mr. Eggar: I am aware of the concern felt by community colleges in Leicestershire, Devon and Cambridgeshire. My right hon. and learned Friend and I met several delegations and held discussions with a number of our right hon. and hon. Friends. We believe that the Further and Higher Education Bill's provisions meet the concerns expressed by my hon. Friend the Member for Rutland and Melton (Mr. Latham) and by others, and we can categorically reassure those colleges that they have nothing to fear.

Mr. James Lamond: Is the Minister aware of the deep concern felt also by those who attend non-vocational classes in the evenings and at other times who, I am sorry to say, do not believe a word that the Minister says about continuing those classes? They have read earlier statements by the Minister and by the Secretary of State, which convey a completely different point of view.

Mr. Eggar: Before making such statements, the hon. Gentleman should take the time and trouble to read the Further and Higher Education Bill that is going through another place. If he does, he will find that, among other things, it makes no division between vocational and non-vocational adult education. The hon. Gentleman should do his homework.

Mr. Haselhurst: Does my hon. Friend accept that the fears raised in some people's mind by the White Paper have not been entirely quelled by the reassurances that he and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State have given? There is anxiety that there will be rationalisation and that some colleges and available classes in rural areas will cease to exist. Can my hon. Friend the Minister give any reassurances in that respect?

Mr. Eggar: I can reassure my hon. Friend that nothing in the Bill will make that sort of rationalisation necessary. Furthermore, both I and my right hon. and learned Friend have made it clear that we want more education provided locally for adults than is currently available. We believe that the Bill will make that possible.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Why does the Minister think that —as the hon. Member for Saffron Walden (Mr. Haselhurst) said—those having a close knowledge of adult education, including the voluntary sector, women's institutes and members of the Conservative party, are so deeply unconvinced by the Minister's replies that there were half a million signatures to a petition opposing the Government's proposals? Is it not the case that the decision to split adult education between a further education funding council and local education authorities is a recipe for disaster for an important sector of education, which has already been cut to the bone as a consequence of the Government's failed policies?

Mr. Eggar: In the context of the Bill, we will ensure that more adult education is available locally, and that it is of better quality. That is increasingly being recognised by many interested parties. I wish that the political posturing promoted by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities and by Mr. Stephen Byers in particular would cease.

Mr. Patrick Thompson: Is my hon. Friend aware that, despite what has been said, there is continuing concern in Norfolk—as represented by those involved in Wensum Lodge in Norwich? Will my hon. Friend do all that he can to persuade local authorities to play their full part in ensuring the continuation of adult education?

Mr. Eggar: Undoubtedly, some local education authorities are now spending less on adult education than we think that they should be spending. It is important for those who are rightly keen to ensure the provision of plenty of adult education of an appropriate standard to address their concerns to the education authorities. They should make certain that the authorities are spending a suitable amount on adult education, and that it is available locally as well as centrally.

Youth Organisations

12. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he will next meet representatives of youth organisations to discuss youth matters.

Mr. Atkins: I met representatives of the National Association of Youth and Community Education Officers yesterday. I shall be meeting the representatives of the Standing Conference of Principal Youth and Community Officers for the London and south-east Region on 17 December, and I am meeting representatives of the British Youth Council and the Scout Association in the near future.

Mr. Hughes: I welcome that news. When the Minister meets those representatives—if not before—will he be able to tell them that the Government support the amendment to the Further and Higher Education Bill, which has been promoted by the National Youth Agency and the British Youth Council and backed by hon. Members from all parties? That amendment would put the youth service on a proper statutory basis.

Mr. Atkins: I cannot make any such commitment at this stage. It is, I think, generally felt that the youth service is already a statutory requirement under various education Acts. I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of my hon. Friends who will serve on the Standing Committee on the Bill. However, I do not encourage the hon. Gentleman to entertain high hopes in that regard.

Mr. Rowe: In recent years, there has been a welcome elision between the definitions of the responsibilities of the youth service and those of the community as a whole. Will my hon. Friend join me in paying tribute to the imaginative experiment that the Lord Mayor of London is supporting this year, in which young people go into schools to help pupils with learning difficulties and those who are quicker than the rest of the class? That experiment has had a remarkable effect on the performance of both pupils and helpers.

Mr. Atkins: I defer to none in my appreciation of the work done by the youth service all over the country. The idea to which my hon. Friend refers strikes me as excellent, and I am happy to support it.

Arts and Humanities

13. Dr. Bray: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what steps he is taking to improve support for research in the arts and humanities.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Government provide grant in aid for the British Academy to support postgraduate research in the humanities and social sciences. New financial arrangements introduced this year give the academy greater control over its resources, and enhance its discretion and determine spending priorities across the range of its activities. The Universities Funding Council provides substantial funding on research-based criteria for the humanities.

Dr. Bray: Is the Minister aware that, while the science research councils have fared badly under the present Government, the humanities have fared a good deal worse under the direct rule of his Department? Is he aware of the part played by the humanities in preserving and developing our national heritage? Why is the Department pussyfooting around, extending the role of the Economic and Social Research Council—which does an entirely different job—instead of accepting the original recommendation of the British Academy for a humanities research council?

Mr. Howarth: Public provision for the research councils in support of the science budget has already increased by 23 per cent., and will have increased by more than 25 per cent. next year. I therefore cannot accept the hon. Gentleman's opening proposition. Like him, I attach enormous importance to humanities research. I regard the existence of flourishing humanities research as an index to the civilisation of our society; Labour, however, has committed itself prematurely to the establishment of a humanities research council.

A debate is in progress among scholars in the arts and humanities about whether it would be right to establish a humanities research council or a humanities, economic and social research council, or to continue with no research council at all. Such issues must be considered thoroughly and carefully; every scheme has its pros and cons.

The British Academy and the ESRC have agreed to establish a working party. I think that it would be best to listen to what it has to say before reaching a decision.

Special Needs Education

14. Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what improvements there have been in the education provision in primary schools for children with special needs since 1979.

Mr. Fallon: Among the major improvements, The Education Act 1981 provided a coherent framework for identifying and assessing children with special educational needs. The introduction of the national curriculum and schemes for the local management of schools will build on that framework and bring about further improvements in provision for such children, not just in primary schools but throughout the state system.

Mr. Battle: Given the Government's stress on education selectivity and exclusivity in the national curriculum and in the league tests, did the Secretary of State insist on a special emphasis on educational special needs when he commissioned his report into primary education last week?

Mr. Fallon: The inquiry that my right hon. and learned Friend has commissioned into primary education will, of course, encompass the needs of children with special educational needs. I point out to the hon. Gentleman that the 1981 Act is now steadily being made more effective, that more resources are being made available every year and that parents are becoming more and more aware of their rights under that Act.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Ward: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 10 December.

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John MacGregor): I have been asked to reply.

My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister is attending the European Council in Maastricht.

Mr. Ward: I am sure that my right hon. Friend will join all his right hon. and hon. Friends in wishing the Prime Minister well in his important negotiations.

Has my right hon. Friend seen a recent public opinion poll which says that 66 per cent. of the people asked believed that taxes under the Labour party would be increased?—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I know, but the hon. Gentleman must relate his question to the Government's responsibilities.

Mr. Ward: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, in contrast, the Government have been responsible and does he further agree that the policies of the Opposition seem to be—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not very good, you see, on Government responsibility and this takes up a lot of time. The hon. Gentleman must bring his question to a conclusion, please.

Mr. Ward: Will my right hon. Friend further agree that the only hope of keeping low taxation is to return the Conservative party to Government?

Mr. MacGregor: I am sure that not only hon. Members on this side of the House but the majority of people in this country wish my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister and my other right hon. Friends well in their very important negotiations in Maastricht.

As for my hon. Friend's other question, I confirm that it is as a result of this Government's economic policies and the growth achieved over the years that we have secured not only higher public spending but a substantial reduction in direct taxes. I saw the report to which my hon. Friend referred and I am not at all surprised that the Opposition tried to shout him down, for the simple fact is that the report revealed that the majority of people in this country recognise that the Labour party has now promised to increase spending on just about everything under the sun, which would mean higher borrowing, higher inflation and much higher taxes.

Mr. Kinnock: The British people will also note that all that came from the spokesman for the Government who have raised the tax burden to its highest level in British history.

The right hon. Gentleman will be aware that the draft of the treaty at Maastricht today provides for the improvement of employees' working conditions, for legal protection and for entitlement to consultation and to information. When other Community Governments are prepared—[Interruption.]

Mr. Dickens rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not need any help from the hon. Member.

Mr. Kinnock: When other Community Governments are prepared to extend those rights to their people, is not it completely wrong for the British Government to refuse to do the same for the British people?

Mr. MacGregor: I am not surprised that the right hon. Gentleman avoided the first point, because the report to which my hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Ward) referred produced the following answer within the Labour party:

"Some argue it will highlight one of our weaker points".

It certainly does.

On Maastricht, we are opposed to a number of the points in the social charter because in practice it would damage employment and prosperity. That is why my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has been arguing against the social text. It will put a huge burden on industry and will cost jobs. Another point is that it offends the important principle of subsidiarity. I agree with the point made by the right hon. Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) in today's edition of The Guardian. He said:

"It provides for an expansion of treaty-based Community competence into areas of wage bargaining and social security that should rightly remain with member states".

That is right and that is why we oppose so many elements in the social charter.

Mr. Kinnock: Is the right hon. Gentleman trying to tell us that other Community Governments, many with economies more successful than ours, do not care about employment, about costs and about competitiveness? Of course they do. Why is it that those countries can accept basic, decent minimum standards for their people whereas this Government will not accept them for the British people?

Mr. MacGregor: In trade union legislation and in other ways, there are different practices in different countries. The plain fact is that some elements of the social charter would run the risk—indeed, would make it a real possibility—of this country returning to some of the trade union practices that did so much damage during the 1970s. What is more, my right hon. Friend's position in Maastricht has the support of the Confederation of British Industry and of the majority of British industry which recognises the increasing burdens that the charter could impose on it, which would damage our competitiveness in relation to countries outside the Community which are not so burdened.

Mr. Kinnock: When it is obvious that the other 11 Governments are prepared to accept the draft before them at Maastricht today and that this Government are not, the Government are confessing to a unique combination of political prejudice and economic weakness which marks them out from the rest of the Community and which marks Britain down in the Community.

Mr. MacGregor: There is no question of marking Britain down. My right hon. Friend is right to draw attention to the dangers which lie within the social charter of making European industry uncompetitive in relation to Japanese industry and to others. It is no wonder that the right hon. Gentleman wants to support elements of the social charter being imposed here. That would result in a return to the period when 29 million days were lost to strikes and when substantial burdens were imposed on British industry. That is why we oppose the proposals.

Q2. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 10 December.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Stevens: Will my right hon. Friend today find time to join my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science in condemning Labour and Liberal Democrat councils, such as Nottingham, Derbyshire and Richmond, which have blocked the distribution of the parents charter? Does not that hostility to the charter give the lie to the Opposition parties' request for freedom of information?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree with my hon. Friend and I condemn those authorities. He is right to draw attention to the hypocrisy of those local authorities, as he has described it. They have advised schools not to make copies available to parents. It goes further than that. The Government's education policies in schools are designed entirely to raise standards, to increase choice and to improve information to parents. The parents charter is an important part of that and I am glad that most schools have ignored the attitudes of those Labour authorities.

Mr. Blunkett: In 1909, Winston Churchill, talking about workers' rights, said that there were necessary laws to be passed to ensure that the bad employer was not undercut by the very worst. Is not that why other Governments and employers across Europe understand well today that the Government are reneging on that and wish this country to undercut others by treating workers in the worst way possible?

Mr. MacGregor: This Government have implemented all 18 of the social measures that have so far been agreed under the social charter, which is more than can be said of a lot of our Community partners. We do implement such measures where we believe that it is right to do so, but we have opposed the working time directive, for example, because it could have added an extra £5 billion to British industry's costs. We believe that that would destroy jobs and make industry uncompetitive. We have been successful in going in the opposite direction—in increasing the number of jobs and in making British industry more competitive in the past 10 years.

Q3. Mr. Gill: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 10 December.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave a few moments ago.

Mr. Gill: Does my right hon. Friend accept that the majority of my constituents believe that what they voted for in the referendum on Europe was a single market, not a single currency? Does he further accept that the failure of the common agricultural policy, coupled with doubts about the realisation of the level playing field for goods and services by the end of next year, mean that this is a singularly inappropriate time to extend the competence of the European Community? Does—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is enough.

Mr. Gill: Would my right hon. Friend——

Hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Gill: Does my right hon. Friend agree—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. In fairness to everyone else, the hon. Gentleman should sit down.

Mr. Gill: Does my right hon. Friend agree—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is very unfair to other hon. Members.

Mr. MacGregor: I am afraid that I could not catch the last part of my hon. Friend's question, but I agree with him about the importance that he attaches to the single market. That, of course, is why the United Kingdom Government have been in the lead in pressing for the completion of the single market and that is why, in the current negotiations, we are arguing for steps to strengthen the observance of Community law to ensure that a level playing field is included in the single market.

As to the steps that are now being taken at Maastricht on the development of the Community, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has made it clear that if he gets an agreement that is right for Britain and for Europe, he will sign, but if he cannot, he will not.

Q4. Miss Lestor: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 10 December.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave a few moments ago.

Miss Lestor: Will the right hon. Gentleman confirm that Britain was one of the countries that ruled against the inclusion of the role of overseas development and co-operation as part of the discussions at Maastricht? Was that because it could mean that Britain would have to increase the amount that we spend on overseas aid and development to match the contributions of other European countries?

Mr. MacGregor: I cannot comment on details of the negotiations—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]—because I do not know the details of what is actually happening today, but it is quite clear that we have been arguing that matters affecting foreign policy should continue to be decided under the auspices of intergovernmental co-operation. On overseas aid, the hon. Lady knows that this year we have yet again increased the amount of money that is spent on that.

Q5. Mr. Butterfill: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 10 December.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave a few moments ago.

Mr. Butterfill: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the courageous efforts of the European Community observers in Croatia? Does he share my concern that they have found almost universally that the aggression has been initiated by Serbia? Does he agree that it is desirable that today's events in Maastricht might lead to future improved co-operation on such matters by the European Community which may, in the end, lead to a reduction in the genocide in that country?

Mr. MacGregor: Like my hon. Friend, I pay tribute to the efforts of Lord Carrington and others within the Community who have been endeavouring to obtain a ceasefire, and to the efforts made by Mr. Cyrus Vance. My hon. Friend rightly draws attention to the benefits of Community co-operation. We have already seen much of that in the lead that has been given by the Community, which has taken special steps to limit the damage and the fighting to enable the parties to come together. Britain has played a large part in that. We have set up a peace conference, sent in monitors and have established ceasefires. I very much hope that that co-operation and the Community's continued efforts will produce the results that my hon. Friend seeks.

Q6. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Tuesday 10 December.

Mr. MacGregor: I have been asked to reply.

I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Griffiths: Does the right hon. Gentleman think it right that under the Tory council tax every millionaire who lives alone will be entitled to a 25 per cent. rebate while the majority of pensioner couples with modest savings or occupational pensions will have to pay the full council tax? Is this the classless society but only open to millionaires?

Mr. MacGregor: The council tax will produce about 40 per cent. of total local authority revenue and people on higher incomes will contribute to local authority expenditure much more through the taxes that they pay.

Mr. Brazier: Will my right hon. Friend join me in congratulating the Prime Minister on his initiative yesterday with President Mitterrand on the Soviet Union? Does he agree that it is a sign of considerable leadership that, right in the teeth of the complexity of the negotiations at Maastricht, the Prime Minister should have recognised that the awesome events on the other side of Europe may have an even larger say in the history of Europe?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree with my hon. Friend. Indeed, I pay tribute to all the work that my right hon. Friend has done throughout the year with regard to events in eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. Yesterday he drew attention to the three matters of concern to which I have no doubt that he will turn, in co-operation with other countries who are equally concerned, as soon as the Maastricht negotiations are complete.

Reserve Forces

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Tom King): With permission, I should like to make a statement on Britain's reserve forces for the 1990s.

Earlier this year I set out the structure of Britain's defence for the 1990s and in particular, in July, I announced the new structure for the Army and its role in NATO's new Rapid Reaction Corps. I referred to the vital contribution that reserves make to our defence effort, and said that we were studying the best mix of regulars and reserves, and would make a further announcement about this later in the year. I now turn to the details of our proposals.

In July, I set out the approach taken by the Royal Navy to rationalise the Royal Naval Reserve and Royal Naval Auxiliary Service and to develop naval reserves that are streamlined but more closely integrated with the Royal Navy.

We have also been looking for opportunities for the wider employment of reserves in the Royal Air Force. Two of these are Royal Auxiliary Air Force personnel in our Rapier anti-aircraft missile force, and as support for our mobile air defence radar convoys in the new United Kingdom air defence system. We are also looking to employ auxiliaries in mission planning for Nimrod maritime patrol aircraft. We intend to retain all the six current Royal Auxiliary Air Force Regiment field squadrons for the area defence of airfields. We are also aiming to increase the number of Royal Auxiliary Air Force defence force flights for the perimeter defence of other vital installations.

I turn now to the Territorial Army. We need to adapt its roles to support and complement the new roles of the regular army. Under the previous strategy, it had important roles defending positions close to the previous West German border in support of the substantial British stationed forces. Clearly this task is no longer relevant in a unified Germany and under the new NATO strategy of greater flexibility and mobility. Instead, new opportunities arise to be part of the Rapid Reaction Corps and in national defence, and it is for these new roles and responsibilities that the Territorial Army units must now be structured and trained.

In some of those roles they will take over from regular units. A TA Yeomanry Regiment will provide reconnaissance for the Rapid Reaction Corps with tracked armoured vehicles. Two TA Royal Artillery regiments will be equipped, for the first time, with 155mm FH70 towed howitzers. Three Air Defence regiments will be equipped with the new Starstreak surface-to-air missile when it enters service. The TA Royal Engineers will have wider roles and take on greater responsibility for airfield damage repair and support of the RAF Harrier force. Some TA Royal Signals units will be equipped with the Ptarmigan communications systems for both ARRC and national deployments.

Elsewhere, the TA will also take over from the Regular Army greater responsibility for the direct defence of the United Kingdom. It will not be limited to the more static tasks previously associated with military home defence. Longer warning times mean that that role will increasingly be seen as that of a more flexible general reserve for national defence.

The strength of the infantry will reduce by around 18 per cent., but the Royal Engineers, Royal Signals, Intelligence Corps and Army Air Corps will all need to attract substantially more volunteers to meet the new roles which they will be taking on. As with the Regular Army, the TA will in future be properly funded and trained to take on the roles required of it. There will be even closer links between the Regular and TA parts of what we see as 'one army'.

The main changes are set out in a briefing pack which will be available in the Vote Office at the end of this statement.

Mr. Peter L. Pike (Burnley): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Why should these be available in the Press Gallery now, as they are not available to Members of Parliament in the Vote Office now?

Mr. Speaker: I do not disagree.

Mr. King: I agree with the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Pike), and I apologise if that is the case.

In summary, the changes will be as follows. Although reorganised, there will continue to be five yeomanry regiments. There will be 36 infantry battalions, compared to 41 today. With one exception, all will adopt a three-rifle-company organisation, compared with four companies today. In respect of the Parachute Regiment, 15 Para will amalgamate with 4 Para, and the new battalion will include one company based in Glasgow with its headquarters there and detachments where the battalion is currently based in Scotland.

In the Royal Artillery, two Air Defence regiments will amalgamate. Royal Signals and Royal Engineers will also reorganise for their new and expanded roles. A second Army Air Corps Squadron will be formed, building on the success of the first, which was raised in 1987. The Royal Army Medical Corps will be reorganised as smaller self-contained units, although its overall size is being studied further as part of a wider review of the defence medical services.

The Home Service Force was formed in 1985 to guard selected key points in the United Kingdom. Its members were permitted more flexible age and medical standards. Given the increased warning time, we no longer need a separate organisation. The HSF will therefore be absorbed within the mainstream TA and its members given the opportunity to transfer initially on their present terms of service. I would like to take this opportunity to pay tribute to those who have served during those years in the Home Service Force.

The current facilities are established for a paper strength of the TA of some 91,000, significantly above the figure recently achieved, currently some 74,000. We have therefore been keeping a much larger infrastructure of regiments and buildings than the manpower justified. I said in July that we expected the long-term future strength of the TA would settle at between 60,000 jand 65,000. The force structure that we have developed, based on our future operational needs, requires a peacetime strength of around 63,500. It would be reinforced in war by the addition of regular reservists to a fully mobilised establishment of over 71,000. In particular while many units are presently under strength, we intend that the units in the new structure should be fully manned.

I have made it clear that, in the changes, we would not wish to turn away willing and suitable volunteers, and the changes proposed will be achieved by natural turnover. Where units move or change their role every effort will be made to offer volunteers an alternative opportunity to serve, if not in the same TA centre then in another unit in the vicinity. Where necessary, local units will be allowed to keep a higher strength than their paper establishment.

In developing these proposals, we have consulted widely among those with an interest in the TA with senior serving volunteers, with regimental colonels, the Council of Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations, the TAVRAs, and, most recently, local associations. I am most grateful to all those who have contributed for the positive and consultative approach they have taken. Further consultation with local TAVRAs will now begin to determine the implications of the changes I have described for individual TA centres. The proposals will result in some modest reduction in the support staff of the TA. Every effort will be made to help those affected.

The highly successful Army Cadet Force often relies on the use of TA facilities. In restructuring we will ensure that this important and successful national youth movement is safeguarded. The current strength of the Army Cadet Force is around 40,000, supported by some 7,000 adult instructors. This has been recently reviewed, and there are no plans for further changes.

Detailed work will proceed in the new year to plan the implementation of these proposals and to enable decisions to be taken on regimental titles, affiliations and local estate matters, so that restructuring can begin from 1 April 1992.

To underpin the more flexible and responsive role which reserves can play in future, we shall seek in the next Parliament to amend the Reserve Forces Act 1980 to ensure their most effective use.

The whole House appreciates the commitment of those who give up their time to serve in the volunteer reserves, including a number of hon. Members. At a time of considerable change, when the structure and role of reserves is changing as well, this statement makes it clear that we see a continuing and important role for them, working as fully manned units in support of our regular forces and taking on a number of important and challenging roles in our future defences.

I commend my statement to the House.

Mr. Martin O'Neill (Clackmannan): I thank the Secretary of State for his statement. The whole House recognises the contribution made by the reserves—the Territorial Army, the Royal Naval Reserve, the Royal Naval Volunteer Reserve and the Royal Auxiliary Air Force—to the defence of these islands and beyond. The review has provoked a flood of correspondence from our constituents. The high regard in which the forces are held is clear.

This is only an initial statement, and the information pack, which will add a great deal more meat to the bones of the Secretary of State's statement, will require close study. I hope, therefore, that the House will have the opportunity for a debate when we have had time not only to digest the information pack but to get the reactions of constituents to the important and wide-ranging statement.

The Secretary of State has missed an opportunity to be more explicit about attempting to secure the employment prospects——

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The documentation is not available in the Vote Office.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me, but I share the concern that is expressed. If the press have been issued with the information, it would be appropriate for it to be made available also to hon. Members. Perhaps the Minister will do something about it.

Mr. O'Neill rose——

Mr. Donald Anderson (Swansea, East): On a further point of order, Mr. Speaker. You have already said that you have a certain sympathy because the documentation was not available before, and is not now available, in the Vote Office. Are we not left in an impossible position? We shall be forced to ask questions in the dark and we cannot properly probe on behalf of our constituents. Should there not be a period of reflection, an adjournment during which we can find out the facts to equip ourselves to ask appropriate questions?

Mr. Speaker: This is not a matter for me. However, hon. Members would be able to ask more pointed questions if they had the information available to them. I agree with the shadow Minister that perhaps the best thing would be to have a brief exchange today, especially in view of the business before the House, and to have a debate later.

Mr. O'Neill: I appreciate your remarks, Mr. Speaker. The Secretary of State has adopted a high-handed approach, either by accident or by intent. This issue will not go away, and doubtless we shall return to it—I hope in Government time and at mutual convenience.

The Secretary of State made an oblique reference to the Reserve Forces Act 1980. Can he confirm that that Act covers possible changes to employment protection legislation? That will ensure that the jobs of those members of the Territorial Army with less than two years' service with the company or firm will be guaranteed when they return from their summer camp. The voluntary scheme now in operation does not cover all members of the TA. We all know of TA members who went on summer camp and returned to find that their jobs no longer existed. They do not have recourse to employment tribunals to make an appropriate appeal against unfair dismissal.

How many pilots are there in the Royal Auxiliary Air Force? Can the Secretary of State tell the House whether there are plans to make use of flight simulators to train those pilots who have left the RAF and who are now working with commercial airlines? Those pilots have been trained at considerable cost to the taxpayer, but their skills are then lost to the armed services, because there are no means to enable them to keep up to scratch.

Can the Secretary of State confirm that the references he made to the 15 Para amalgamations and the location of the company in Glasgow will, nevertheless, mean a reduction in strength from a battalion to a company? How many people does he expect will be based in Scotland and the north of Britain, because 15 Para covers the area north of a line from the Wash to the Mersey?

What will be the significance of the contribution of the territorials to the Rapid Reaction Corps? The right hon. Gentleman gave an undertaking to NATO that that contribution would be equivalent to no more than 20 per cent. of our forces in the second corps. Will the right hon. Gentleman guarantee to adhere to that figure?

Would the right hon. Gentleman also take account of the concern about the reductions in the infantry? Will he make every effort to ensure that those who are made redundant as a result of reductions in the infantry have an opportunity to volunteer for the other services where the right hon. Gentleman expects an increase in numbers? What does the right hon. Gentleman anticipate will happen to those members of the Home Service Force who are over the right age and whose fitness may not be the same as that of the members of other forces? Will they be discarded, or will they be able to continue in uniform as part of the reserve?

Finally, what savings will be made as a consequence of today's announcement?

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for a number of his comments. He referred to the flood of correspondence, and that is testimony to the degree of consultation that has taken place. People have had ample opportunity to make their comments.

It is fair comment to say that I made this statement in general terms deliberately. It is backed up by a number of documents. I know that hon. Members will want to read those documents, and I apologise for their absence. However, I do not believe that their availability now would have helped hon. Members enormously in making an immediate response to my statement. Those documents deal with a huge amount of detail, because we are talking about the locations of more than 600 different units around the United Kingdom. That involves the exact location of individual drill halls in towns and cities across the country, the catchment areas and the way in which different units operate their pattern of recruitment and service, which is special to the TA.

The fact that I have been able to make the statement now means that, during the recess, hon. Members will have an opportunity to hear the views of those who will be affected. They will also have an input, because from now on it will be for the local TAVRAs and TA associations to become involved in determining the most suitable pattern for the future in their areas.

The hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) spoke about the job protection legislation. I am sure that he would want me to pay tribute to a distinguished Scot, Mr. Tommy MacPherson, who plays an outstanding part as chairman of the National Employer Liaison Committee, and to all the members of that body for the work they do in encouraging employers to be ready to assist their employees and give them support for playing their part, and giving up their time, in support of the volunteer reserve. I take note of the point that the hon. Gentleman made.

He asked for details and numbers of pilots. I will check on that and let him have the information. I will also answer his question about our NATO contribution.

The hon. Gentleman questioned me about the cost. Our best estimate, for manpower and equipment, is that the cost of the TA will be about £250 million a year. It is difficult to make a more precise estimate, but I would see the savings as being approximately proportionate to the reductions in numbers, which are about 17 per cent. So, whether it is £40 million or £45 million a year, it is a significant figure.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. In relation to points of order that have been raised with me, it may help the House if I say that this might provide an admirable subject for a debate on the Consolidated Fund Bill, subjects for which should be submitted to my office by the rising of the House this evening. I hope that some hon. Members may take that opportunity.

Mr. Neil Thorne (Ilford, South): On behalf of a large number of territorial soldiers who have asked me to make representations to my right hon. Friend, may I thank him for listening so carefully to the representations that have been made, and for undertaking to listen in future to representations?

Can my right hon. Friend confirm that, when units are allowed to recruit extra personnel above establishment, they may do so in all ranks and not just in the junior ranks? He will appreciate how important it is in the TA to have sergeants, warrant officers and more senior officers—captains and majors—in post and ready for an emergency. That is much more important than just allowing them to recruit extra riflemen.

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his opening remarks. In general, I can respond positively to his question, although he will understand what I mean when I say that it should not be abused. We are seeking to overcome the difficulty of having an establishment and, because of the scale of the turnover in the TA, there is a great gap between what we think the number is—the number for which we have provided—and the number actually recruited.

The figure that I have given—of 63,500 as the number we think we can recruit—is genuinely the strength we want to achieve and is not so far below the present level; in the future, with the demographic trends we face, it may prove to be quite a challenging target. In general, I seek to respond positively to my hon. Friend, because he understands the purposes for which I have agreed that units can keep a higher strength than their paper establishments, but it should not be abused.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): The Minister will appreciate that there will be great sadness at the apparent demise of 15 Para, not least in the battalion but also among those who have an interest in airborne forces. However, I welcome the apparently discriminatory approach which the statement reveals—not least, for example, in the enhanced role which is to be given to the Royal Engineers. If there is, in general, to be an enhanced role for reserve forces, does that not, however, create a continuing obligation to see that they have the best equipment and best training opportunities? Can the right hon. Gentleman guarantee that, so far as it lies within his power, that training and those opportunities will be available?

Mr. King: I understand the hon. and learned Gentleman's concern about 15 Para, and we sought to respond constructively by making an announcement. Incidentally, Scotland will have a new yeomanry regiment, which we have based on the Ayrshire Yeomanry, and a new engineer regiment, which will work on airfield damage repair not far from the hon. and learned Gentleman's constituency, so developments have been made. As the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, the measure seeks to complement effectively the structure of our regular forces, so it discriminates in that there is some reduction in infantry, a significant increase in the Royal Signals—an increasingly important part of modern warfare and communications—in the Royal Engineers and in the Army Air Corps. That shows how we have sought to approach the matter.

One of my concerns was to maintain a substantial range of regular forces but to give them support and backing in terms of spares, equipment and training capability. My slogan, "smaller but better", is directed precisely to that point. If we expect people to volunteer and to give up their own time to serve, it is our duty to see that they have the support, equipment and training that they deserve.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that those members of 15 Para who wish to pursue their activities can do so through the company based in the other units throughout Scotland? Will they be given an opportunity to serve in, for instance, other specialist units like the Royal Marine Reserves? Will my right hon. Friend also confirm that his comments about the Royal Auxiliary Air Force show that the Scottish component of that reserve activity is enhanced and increased, and is thus seen as more important, in keeping with the increased assets of the Royal Air Force deployed in Scotland?

Mr. King: I can confirm that the Royal Auxiliary Air Force and the Royal Air Force Volunteer Reserve will be increased in absolute terms for the whole country. There are opportunities, for members of 15 Para who wish to pursue their activities either within the company in Glasgow or in the other detachments that form part of that company. There are also opportunities in 15 Para—there is a commando detachment in Greenock and there are TA SAS units in Glasgow. Scotland suffers no amalgamations in terms of infantry regiments, so opportunities exist. I do not want any willing volunteers to be turned away.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): May I congratulate the Secretary of State on the wisdom of his decision to retain all 16 squadrons of the Royal Air Force Regiment? With regard to the TA, the Secretary of State will remember that he and I had an exchange on 14 October about the lack of proportionality. At that time, the TA in Northern Ireland was to be cut by 40 per cent. but by only 19 per cent. in Great Britain. Does the Secretary of State's statement redress that imbalance?

Mr. King: It is slightly better than that, but there will be greater reductions in Northern Ireland. In reality, however, Northern Ireland will still have a higher percentage of volunteers per head of population than in all but two other TAVRA areas in Great Britain, and all cap badges now represented in the Province will be retained. However, there will be reductions because of the much higher percentage of volunteers in the TA in Northern Ireland in the past.

Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith (Wealden): We all have a great respect for and pride in our TA, and I should like to join my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) in thanking my right hon. Friend and my hon. Friend the Minister for the Armed Forces for listening to our representations so patiently and for dealing with a difficult problem with such sensitivity and understanding.

Will my right hon. Friend take advantage of his proposals by making them known to a wider audience through an intensive recruitment campaign, which would be of much value? On a more parochial note, will he reassure me that the Surrey and Sussex Yeomanry has a future?

Mr. King: I think that "re-roled" is the answer to my hon. Friend's latter point. I think that it does have a future. I am grateful for my hon. Friend's initial comments. I can confirm the importance of continuing recruitment. We shall be looking to recruit 20,000 to the TA this year in recognition of the substantial turnover —30 per cent.—in the TA every year. Although hon. Members may hear about what appear to be reductions, we shall be launching a significant recruitment advertising campaign immediately to ensure that the TA is kept at the necessary strength.

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): Tomorrow I shall receive a 25,000-signature petition in support of the 4th battalion the Royal Regiment of Wales, based at Swansea. Is the Secretary of State aware that his objective of finding alternatives within the vicinity will not apply if that battalion is closed, as the alternative is Cardiff, which is itself due for a 25 per cent. contraction? There will be considerable resentment in Wales if the contractions are imposed on us when the south-west, to which we lost our district headquarters, is to receive 5,000 full-time civilian defence posts.

Mr. King: As the right hon. Gentleman says, it is proposed that the 3rd and 4th battalions the Royal Regiment of Wales TA will amalgamate and adopt a three-company organisation. The local TAVRA has been considering plans that involve detachments in different locations, which will help those who serve in the regiment. We do not want to turn aside any willing volunteers—as the right hon. Gentleman may know, there are significant differences between the recruiting abilities of those two regiments. We hope that the new arrangements and the local agreements on the locations and drill halls of the new regiments will be helpful.

Mr. John Farr (Harborough): Will my right hon. Friend say something about the Royal Navy? In his sensible restructuring of the reserves, he rightly said that the Army and Air Force would have opportunities to modernise the equipment that reservists use, but the Navy is in a difficult position because the old purpose of the NATO exercise—to provide an opportunity for reservists in the Royal Naval Reserve to go to sea—is out of date. Will my right hon. Friend say something about the future role of the Royal Naval Reserve?

Mr. King: I referred to the statement made in July on the overall structure. We are reconsidering the regular-reserve mix of the Royal Navy. I cannot go further today, but I can say that we are keen to ensure that both the Royal Naval Reserve and the Royal Fleet Reserve are used as effectively as possible, as well as the Royal Naval Auxiliary Reserve, which also plays an important part.

Mr. John Cartwright (Woolwich): Does the Secretary of State accept that the new roles and responsibilities to be given to our reserve forces mean that high-quality training becomes even more important? Will he give an assurance that adequate resources will be invested in training, and guaranteed for training? Will he assure us that, whenever money runs short, training will not be the first activity to be cut?

Mr. King: As the hon. Gentleman has a close interest in the matter, he will know that, while introducing the changes, one of my objectives has been to ensure that those changes were fully funded. I think that it is generally accepted that the public expenditure announcements recognise that the resources allocated to defence enable us fully to fund our programme. That applies both to the Regular Army and to the reserve forces.

I stress what I said earlier: there has been a tendency to keep too big a structure which is too widely spread. We have been keeping an infrastructure—a capability—way beyond that used, which is a waste of money. I would much rather that the money was used for proper training and facilities for the people who serve and are able to train, than wasted on buildings which are not used.

Sir David Price (Eastleigh): Is my right hon. Friend aware that his declared intention to integrate our reserve forces more closely with the regular forces will be widely welcomed? With that in mind, will he assure the House that he will try to integrate training between reserve forces and regulars far more than in the past?

Mr. King: That is very much one of our purposes. Integration and complementary roles are necessary for effectiveness in the new strategic dispositions of our forces, not least for the Rapid Reaction Corps. In training, twinning the work of the regulars, the TA and the volunteer regiments is also the way to use them most effectively. It is important to ensure that the reserve forces reach the highest possible standards, and I shall certainly concentrate on that.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): The Secretary of State has told us once again that the whole package, including the Scottish element, is based on the assumption that there will be longer warning times of any conflict—up to a year instead of a matter of weeks or a month. Will the right hon. Gentleman remind the House how much warning time he had of the conflict in the Gulf, how much warning he expects to have from the IRA before any outrage and how much warning he expects of the consequences of the disintegration of the Soviet Union and the activities of extremists like Mr. Le Pen in France?

Mr. King: Warning time is a NATO concept to do with the situation on the central front and the threat of aggression from the east. It has nothing to do with warning time for the invasion of Kuwait, which has no relevance to my statement. We do not envisage using the TA to respond immediately to outrages in Northern Ireland or to make it the first wave of our assault for the repossession of Kuwait.

Mr. Robert Boscawen (Somerton and Frome): Does my right hon. Friend accept that there is much to be commended in general in his decision to reduce the infantry battalions by only 12, 13 or 14 per cent., which is a great deal better than what he did for the Regular Army? Will he ensure that these infantry battalions are more swiftly available in future? Will he give us an idea of the future role of the Royal Corps of Transport? Will it, like other forces, merge with the Regular Army?

Mr. King: The role of the Royal Corps of Transport will take account of the lower overall force levels and hence its new scale of responsibility. It will also take account of the successful introduction of DROPS—the demountable rack offloading and pickup system—which has made a significant contribution to the capability of the Royal Corps of Transport, given the quantity of stores that can be shifted with the available resources.

When hon. Members read the fact sheet attached to my statement, they will see that it is difficult to compare like with like. Many of the units are not fully manned units, and hon. Members will see that the number of regiments, squadrons or batteries that we propose to keep in future show the truth of this. We will, for instance, keep the same number of signals regiments, but that will involve a 20 per cent. increase in manpower—a reflection of the fact that many of the present units are not fully manned.

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I was pleased to hear the right hon. Gentleman's remarks about the Army Cadet Force. Over the years, many children from underprivileged families have been able to join youth clubs from which they were able to go away on camps during the Glasgow fair fortnight and at Easter and in September. I am encouraged to learn that TA companies will be expected to offer support, because I know that, when cadet units have been based with TA units that supported the Army Cadet Force, the boys got more training and help.

Finally——

Mr. Speaker: Briefly, though, please.

Mr. Martin: Sorry, Mr. Speaker.

If the force is to be linked with the Regular Army, legislation must come before the House to make employers give leave of absence. It was ridiculous that highly trained personnel were prevented from going to the Gulf because of their jobs.

Mr. King: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for what he says about the Army Cadet Force, with which many hon. Members will agree. I have referred to the complicated question of administration, which will require careful drafting, but we want to try to ensure that those who serve in the voluntary reserve forces are available when they are needed and that their position is properly protected.

Dr. Charles Goodson-Wickes (Wimbledon): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on his enlightened proposals for a revised and enhanced role for the TA in these uncertain times. I particularly welcome the close relationship between the TA and the regulars. Will my right hon. Friend add a new dimension to the debate by commenting on whether any studies have been carried out on how the TA could provide relief in the event of natural disasters, which would have the agreeable effect of combining military efficiency with humanitarian benefits?

Mr. King: As my hon. Friend knows, the TA already does do that on occasion, and I am interested in the ways in which it could be developed. I do not wish to comment further now, but I am sympathetic to his point.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): The Secretary of State has clarified the position on savings, but will he give us some idea of the savings which will result from a reduction of effectiveness in Scotland? Can he clarify the position in relation to 15 Para and talk in terms of numbers rather than amalgamations? What will be involved in the reduction from a battalion to one company in Scotland? Are we to take it that the company headquarters, not the battalion headquarters, will be in Glasgow? What will be the cost-effectiveness of having four subdivisions of a company? How can that possibly be cost-effective in terms of the operation of a paratroop battalion?

Mr. King: I am not sure that I can give the hon. Gentleman the first information that he requested. The picture is complicated because there are a number of changes—pluses and minuses—in the situation in Scotland. Until the further consultation to which I referred in my statement takes place, it is difficult to know which drill halls will continue and where the detachments will be based. When the hon. Gentleman sees the full details for the range of different places involved, he will realise that there are some complicated plans for north of Inverness —for example, at Dingwall, Kirkwall, Stornoway, Thurso and Wick—and it is not yet possible to determine how they will work out. Fifteen Para will be a company with a company headquarters, with the option, if it wishes, to have detachments in places where the paras are presently located.

Mr. Colin Shepherd (Hereford): Does my right hon. Friend recall that, at one time, considerable concern was expressed that the Marches, including Herefordshire, would not have the opportunity to contribute fully towards the defence of the realm in terms of reserve activities? Can he confirm that 5 Light Infantry will continue its activities in that part of the world, which, if so, will be welcome? Will he confirm that the disposition of companies is not yet set in tablets of stone, and that circumstances relating to premises and recruitment records will have a distinct bearing on where those will be finally located?

Mr. King: On the first point, I can confirm that 5LI will continue and will include a company from the 4th battalion the Worcestershire and Sherwood Foresters Regiment. I can also confirm that it is for the TAVRAs and for the local people to determine the most appropriate location for the individual company headquarters.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): Fifteen Para, which has its headquarters in my constituency, was being marched to oblivion until public opinion brought itself to bear on the Ministry, and I am grateful that it has taken a step backwards, but we still do not know what size that step is. For the fourth time of asking, what will be the impact on 15 Para of the change from battalion to company status, where will the battallion headquarters be, why is it being taken out of Scotland, and, at a time when the Secretary of State says that flexibility and mobility are the key attributes of Britain's Army, why are we making major reductions in a force which is the most flexible and mobile in the British Army?

Mr. King: I think that the hon. Gentleman knows that the TA parachute regiments are not charged with a parachute role, but serve mainly in an infantry and national defence role—as do ordinary infantry regiments. Unfortunately, 15 Para was significantly not as well recruited as the other two parachute regiments. It had four companies with only a 67 per cent. level of recruitment. Although the hon. Gentleman accepts that my announcement represents an improvement over the previous situation, I am anxious to see that those who want to serve have an opportunity to do so. I believe that the arrangements that we have announced give the best chance of ensuring that that will be the case. The hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas) sought to undermine that, but he will see how far we have gone.

Sir Charles Morrison (Devizes): My right hon. Friend reminded the House that the Territorial Army is currently under-recruited in comparison with establishment. Is he aware that the Royal Wiltshire Yeomanry Squadron at the Royal Yeomanry Regiment, based in Swindon, is notably, if not extravagantly, over-recruited? Will he confirm that that squadron will continue to enjoy old and new opportunities?

Mr. King: I should like to check on that before replying specifically to my hon. Friend, but I will certainly write to him. I know of his close interest in that matter.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): As a demob-happy Member of the House, may I ask the Secretary of State whether he realises the absolute shambles that he has made of Territorial Army recruitment? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware, for example, that when my wife and I were strolling along Blackpool promenade during the recent summer, I was accosted by a Territorial Army recruiting sergeant and put under enormous pressure to join the TA? Is the Secretary of State's announcement of a reduction in the age, health and fitness qualifications for membership of the Territorial Army meant as a calculated insult to me, or to the TA?

Mr. King: The hon. Gentleman will know—although the House may not—that, if there is one person who greets the news of his demobilisation with a particular sense of grief, it is his old pair. I cannot accept it with any great tranquillity. However, I am not sure that even any relaxation of more flexible age and medical standards could quite accommodate the hon. Gentleman in his present seniority.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): Does my right hon. Friend envisage the creation of a Territorial Army element in the Household Division, which would go some way to alleviating the greatly increased overstretch that the 40 per cent. cuts in the regular Household Division have caused? That would maintain the dual role that is vital to recruiting to the Household Division itself.

Mr. King: That suggestion has not been made to me.

Rev. Martin Smyth (Belfast, South): The Secretary of State will remember my exchanges with the Prime Minister in respect of volunteering, so he will understand my regret at the reduction in opportunities for those who want to volunteer for the TAVR in Northern Ireland. It seems rather strange that, if one does one's job well, one's opportunities are reduced.

Having said that, I welcome the retention of the Ulster Air Defence Regiment. However, is it to be reduced to two batteries—one in Coleraine and the other in Belfast—as originally planned, bearing in mind the tremendous tradition that regiment has? When may we expect a statement on the medical services aspects which are so important to the Northern Ireland situation? Will there be protection for those who have served in the Territorial Army for some 10 years, so that they may be allowed to complete their service and receive their TA decorations?

Mr. King: I will need to consider the hon. Gentleman's latter point, and I cannot comment on it now. I appreciate the disappointment felt in Northern Ireland, because I know the willingness to serve that exists there. It is striking how many more people proportionally have served in the TA in Northern Ireland than in other parts of the United Kingdom. I make that point with proper sensitivity. Those who wish to continue to serve can volunteer to do so on a part-time basis in the Ulster Defence Regiment. We are maintaining a significant presence in Northern Ireland: there will still be a higher percentage of volunteers per head of population there than in all but two of the other TAVRA areas.

We are moving on with the medical services. All the services are involved—the regular medical services of the RAF, the Navy and the Army. The question then arises of the most suitable arrangements to be made for the Territorial Army. In the past, the TA has been responsible for massive field hospitals; the current approach is to make such hospitals much smaller and more flexible, and to increase their number. Work is now in progress, although I cannot give an exact date for its completion. I have noted the hon. Gentleman's interest in the matter.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must protect our subsequent business, on which there is considerable pressure. I will allow questions to the Secretary of State to continue for 10 minutes; if hon. Members ask brief questions, they will all be called.

Mr. John Wilkinson (Ruislip-Northwood): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend particularly on the formation of a second Territorial Army Air Corps squadron? Is it not a little perverse that, while the Army seems to recognise the value of flying reserves, the Royal Air Force is not yet convinced—unlike the air forces of the United States, Switzerland and Israel?

Would it not be more cost-effective to use auxiliary jet pilots who have come out of the service under "Options for Change" than to train women as fast jet pilots, however keen they may be? Most of them will probably go off and get married.

Mr. King: In that interesting contribution, my hon. Friend has probably managed to offend two distinct groups. He has expressed some fairly pungent criticisms, but his point is interesting, and I take note of it.

Mr. David Marshall (Glasgow, Shettleston): Is it not astonishing that the Secretary of State, having made a decision on 15 Para, cannot or will not answer the pertinent points put to him by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Hillhead (Mr. Galloway) and the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars)?

Cannot the right hon. Gentleman accept that the Para battalions should have been the last to be cut, and that, if cuts must be made, they should be made on the basis of operational effectiveness, not political expediency? Is not this the worst possible decision for both 4 and 15 Para? For how long can the right hon. Gentleman guarantee the existence of a 15 Para based in Glasgow? Why did he not decide to reduce the three para battalions to the new standard size?

Mr. King: I am interested to hear what the hon. Gentleman has to say. I am sure that that announcement will be greeted with great interest by the 1st and 2nd battalions the 52nd Lowland Volunteers and the 1st, 2nd and 3rd battalions of the Highland Volunteers. They happen to believe that they, too, make a pretty pertinent and effective contribution to the Territorial Army from Scotland.

Of course the paras make a valuable contribution. That is why we have sought to respond to representations, and to continue to give people in Scotland who wish to serve in the parachute regiments the opportunity to do so. There will be a number of such opportunities, whether they be among the commandos or the Marine commandos, or in the SAS, the new Royal Engineers Regiment—whose headquarters will be in Scotland—or the new Scottish Yeomanry Regiment which is to be set up. Certainly, it is no secret that, in proportional terms, Scotland has done rather well out of the arrangements.

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): Is there any message of consolation that I can take to the very bruised people in Staffordshire, who watched with pride as the 3rd battalion received its new colours in September? Will that battalion be allowed to survive?

Mr. King: I am not sure which battalion my hon. Friend means, but I shall look into the matter and reply later.

Mr. John McFall (Dumbarton): The Secretary of State's catchphrase "smaller is better" has now given way to "so small that it is almost non-existent" in regard to 15 Para. With only one company left in Glasgow, is it not a fact that numbers will fall from over 600 to 150? That will do nothing for morale and recruitment in Glasgow.

Does not the Secretary of State agree with one of my constituents, Brigadier Alastair Pearson, who was the regiment's honorary colonel until 1989? In a letter to me, the brigadier said, "It is nothing but political. It is Treasury-led. It is not based on military criteria, and it will do nothing whatever for Scotland."

Mr. King: Sadly, that comment is completely uninformed. I do not know when it was made, but it is incorrect. The hon. Gentleman serves on the Select Committee on Defence, and he knows that a settlement has been made. The Select Committee has taken an interest and has recognised that we have fully funded the programme that we set out. Far from being Treasury-led, it is defence-strategy-led, and the Treasury has now agreed to fund the programme, so the comment was uninformed. I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman cannot see the broader picture of what is happening to the other units and that it is not an unfair arrangement.

I apologise to my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) for not responding to him. I confirm that the 3rd battalion will continue.

Mr. Ian Grist (Cardiff, Central): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the dismay that his proposals have caused in Wales? Why have the cuts been so disproportionately heavy there?

Mr. King: When my hon. Friend has a chance to read the full details, he will see that, although there is an amalgamation of regiments, other units will be moving into Wales and there will be new opportunities for serving in Wales. Proportionately, the reduction in Wales is less than the average for the United Kingdom as a whole.

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): Has the Secretary of State made any advance in redressing the ridiculous situation of the Scottish soldiers in the territorial units who served in the Gulf for 51 days and who were constantly under attack by Scud missiles? They have been informed that they do not qualify for their bounty because they have spent insufficient days at summer camp, despite serving 51 days in the Gulf. Are not 51 days in the Gulf more of a training exercise than running around the sand dunes at Barry with thunderflashes?

Mr. King: I know that my right hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces is considering the issue, having given an undertaking to the House to do so. I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's interest is drawn to his attention.

Mr. Peter Viggers (Gosport): As to the background, does my right hon. Friend agree that, such is the high level of unit loyalty, any change will be greeted with apprehension by the Territorial Army community and the reserve community? However, does he agree that the news that he has announced today is good news for the reserve forces, because the units will be well equipped and will have an important role, and there will be full support for good recruiting areas such as Hampshire?

Mr. King: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. He has summed up the issue much better than I could. That is precisely the point—the new reserve forces that we have announced will have important roles, will be relevant to our new defence strategy and will be well supported and equipped. That is our absolute intention. It is also our intention—this differs from what has been the case for a long time—that they will be fully manned units.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): Is it likely that the changes and related developments will lead the Ministry of Defence to release land in Scotland which it presently owns and leases for training purposes?

On a more parochial basis——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Only one question, please.

Dr. Godman: The Secretary of State mentioned "Grennock"—was he referring to a detachment in Greenock?

Mr. King: That pronunciation is a mistake that I made all the time that I worked in Scotland and I know the sensitivities which it aroused. I apologise.

There will be some rationalisation of the estate, but not in terms of training areas, of which there is, if anything, a shortage. Following the changes under "Options for Change" and the withdrawal of our units from Germany, there will be considerable pressure on our training areas. However, there may well be some rationalisation in terms of drill halls and buildings, and some buildings may become available.

Mr. Patrick Thompson (Norwich, North): Although I welcome the way in which my right hon. Friend has responded to pressure from those of us who are concerned about the future of the volunteers in the Territorial army and elsewhere, and I especially welcome his statement about the future of the Army Cadet Force and the support it receives from the reserves, what are his particular plans for the three reserve battalions of the Royal Anglians? I understand that the changes are fairly limited, and I should be grateful if he could give me any further information.

Mr. King: I think that there was concern that, under the previous proposal, one further Royal Anglian Regiment battalion would be disbanded. I can confirm that the 5th, 6th and 7th volunteer battalions of the Royal Anglian Regiment will continue. That should deal with some of the problems about which my hon. Friend is concerned.

Mr. Robert Banks (Harrogate): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the structure and military role that he has announced today? Will he consider the historical importance of many units, especially in Yorkshire, which have provided reservists for emergencies? Will the 8th (Yorkshire) battalion the Light Infantry Regiment be maintained?

Mr. King: I am grateful for what my hon. Friend says. I give him that assurance.

Mr. Conal Gregory (York): Will my right hon. Friend take the opportunity of the review of the Territorial Army to commend to the Confederation of British Industry, to the Institute of Directors and to others the training that is given by the TA so that greater public recognition can be given to it? For the TA's members in Yorkshire, can my right hon. friend give any reassurance to the House in connection with the Yorkshire Volunteers, which will next year celebrate its silver jubilee? Are there any plans to re-badge the Yorkshire Volunteers?

Mr. King: The 1st and 2nd battalions of the Yorkshire Volunteers continue, and the 3rd and 4th will be amalgamated. My hon. Friend also has an interest in the Light Infantry, which is relevant to Yorkshire.

In respect of the role of the CBI and of employers, I pay tribute to the work done by employers and by the National Employers Liaison Committee. What my hon. Friend said is profoundly appreciated by those who have employees who serve in the TA. The quality, calibre, extra capability and extra commitment that they give are well worth any time that may be given up to volunteer reserve service.

Mr. David Marshall: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. When I put my question to the Secretary of State for Defence, I referred to the hon. Member for Glasgow, Govan (Mr. Sillars). I should have referred to the hon. Member for Dunfermline, West (Mr. Douglas), who comes from Govan. I apologise for the error.

Points of Order

4.31 pm

Mr. Robert G. Hughes (Harrow, West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will recall that, over a week ago, I raised with you the fact that an hon. Member had clearly used the free post improperly on behalf of Islington, North Labour party. I have been sent another example, which is rather more serious.

The hon. Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) is specifically identifiable on this occasion. It seems that he has been using the free post to send out quantities—I do not know how many—of his so-called "Annual Report". It has been sent back with a frosty message from one of his constituents, who is unidentified. There is plainly an abuse.

I seek your guidance on two further matters, Mr. Speaker. The royal crest is used on the front of the annual report, which I should have thought was improper. I know that the hon. Member for Leicester, East thinks that he is important, but he is not that important. The crest of Parliament is used on the inside of the report. I thought that that could not be used, so I seek your guidance, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I asked the hon. Member before to bring the matter to my office. I will look into it. From what he says, there appears to have been an abuse.

BILLS PRESENTED

Amusement Machines (Protection of Children)

Mr. Patrick Thompson presented a Bill to empower local authorities to prohibit in their areas the use by children of amusement machines:

And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 7 February 1992 and to be printed. [Bill 39.]

Established Church

Mr. Michael Latham presented a Bill to abolish the General Synod of the Church of England, on a date to be appointed; to provide for the creation of a Church of England Assembly, consisting of a house of all diocesan, suffragan and assistant bishops, and a joint house of clergy and laity, to be directly elected by all Church of England clergy and lay persons on parochial electoral rolls; to make provision for the Diocese of Sodor and Man; to empower the Assembly to decide on all appropriate matters, except those within the legal responsibilities of the Church Commissioners, without further reference to Parliament; to provide for the election of new bishops by members of the house of bishops, saving the right of final approval of the chosen candidate by the Crown; to abolish the Ecclesiastical Committee; to abolish the automatic places of bishops in the House of Lords; to permit ordained clergy of the Church of England, with the consent of a diocesan bishop, to seek election to the House of Commons; and for connected purposes:

And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on Friday 7 February 1992 and to be printed. [Bill 40.]

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(3) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.),

Representation of the People

Ordered,

That the draft European Parliamentary Constituencies (England) (Miscellaneous Changes) Order 1991 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Wood.]

Question agreed to.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure what you referred to just now as "an abuse". You have not yet seen the document out of which the tell-tale hon. Member for Harrow, West (Mr. Hughes) is making a career day in and day out. Before you consider the document, may I remind you of a letter that you received from the convenor of Stirling district council? The hon. Member for Stirling (Mr. Forsyth)—I am not complaining about him, so I do not apologise for not having given him notice that I should raise the point—uses the crest of the House of Commons on his parliamentary report. He also uses the crest of the House of Commons on his advertisements for his constituency advice bureau.

I honestly do not see anything wrong with that, and I am not complaining about it. However, with respect, Mr. Speaker, I have seen your reply in which you said that using the crest of the House of Commons on such material was not an offence, so I hope that you are not referring to that aspect of the issue that the tell-tale Member has just raised with you.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. Gentleman is quite right. I am constantly enjoined not to give my reasons, but I did. When I said that I must look into the matter, I was referring to the franked envelope, not its contents.

CLASS XIV, VOTE 1

[Relevant documents: The fourth report from the Social Security Committee of Session 1990-91 on the Financing of Private Residential and Nursing Home Fees (House of Commons Paper No. 421) and the first report from the Health Committee of Session 1991-92 on the above report (House of Commons Paper No. 28).]

Residential Homes

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a further sum not exceeding £1,680,076,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1992 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on non-contributory retirement pensions, Christmas bonus payments to pensioners, pensions etc., for disablement or death arising out of war or service in the armed forces after 2nd September 1939 and on sundry other services, on attendance allowances, invalid care allowance, severe disablement allowance, mobility allowance; on pensions gratuities and sundry allowances for disablement and specified deaths arising from industrial causes; on income support, transitional payment, child benefit, one parent benefit, family credit, and on the vaccine damage payment scheme.—[Miss Widdecombe.]

4.35 pm

Mr. Frank Field (Birkenhead): It is my privilege to open the debate on the report of the Select Committee on Social Services into the financing of private residential and nursing home fees. It gives me the opportunity not only of placing on the official record the Committee's thanks to its staff for their work, not only of drawing to the attention of the House what I think is the first debate on community care to be initiated in the Chamber which is not part of a debate on another measure, but also of drawing attention to the number of firsts that we score with this report and debate.

This is the first joint report to be submitted to the House by the Select Committees on Social Security and on Health. This is the first time, speaking in this capacity, that I have welcomed my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) to the Opposition Front Bench. Anyone who knows my hon. Friend's track record before he became a Member of the House will know how well deserved that promotion is.

This is also the first time that the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), has been allowed out to speak from the Treasury Bench in the Chamber. We heard from the hon. Lady several times in Committee, but the Secretary of State for Social Services has kept her firmly muzzled on other occasions. Hon. Members can draw an important lesson from the hon. Lady's rise to office as a junior Minister in the Department. She got the post because she proved such a thorn in the Government's side on this very issue. Those hon. Members who are told by the Whips that their loyalty, obedience and voting record will all be taken into account may rest assured that those things are, indeed, taken into account, but in a totally different way from what one is led to believe if one wants to speak in the House from either Front Bench.

With those introductory remarks, I hope that I have drawn attention to the firsts that we celebrate in this debate, but although those matters are important, matters of far greater importance form the substance of our debate. I refer to what has been, is and will be happening to the financing of some of the most frail and vulnerable members of our community who live in residential or nursing homes.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) wishes to contribute to the debate if he is able to catch your eye, Mr. Speaker. From the many written questions that my hon. Friend has tabled on this matter, I note not only that the numbers of people in residential and nursing care have increased substantially, as we all know, but also the surprising fact that there has been only a modest fall in the numbers of people in local authority care. I had thought that there had been a really massive shift from what one might call the public sector into the private sector. Although there has been a slight fall in the numbers of people in local authority care in the past 10 years, there has been a remarkable increase in the numbers of people cared for in what is described as the private sector—in the homes run as nursing or residential care homes.

I know that criticisms will be made as a proper part of our deliberations today about whether that is the best use of the money. My hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield raised such criticisms in Committee and may well do so again later. However, on behalf of many of my constituents—I am sure that this is true for many other people around the country—I should like to stress that, although none of us thought in 1979 that we would be discussing this situation today, as a result of it many of our constituents have received a quality of life far superior to that which they might otherwise have had.

I certainly recall visiting residential and nursing homes in my constituency of which one could genuinely say that one would be pleased to be a member of that community. We are called upon to make such statements in all sorts of circumstances in our constituencies and sometimes we do it slightly with tongue in cheek, but I can genuinely make such a statement about many homes. I do not want any criticisms that we may have of some home owners or some trends to detract from that important fact.

We all agree, however, that there are some real problems with the current provision. Many of us share some deeply felt worries about what will happen under the current procedures until the changeover takes place in 1993. While our minds may boggle at the difficulties which exist now, goodness knows what the scene will be after 1993. We welcome to our debate the Minister for Health, who is in her place on the Treasury Bench.

First and foremost, there has been a remarkable and outstanding growth in the social security budget for residential care. This is one of the few occasions in the House when I can say that many hon. Members on both sides of the House told the Government that that would happen if the Government allowed the policy to develop in the way it has. Hon. Members made a plea in the early stages of the 1979 Parliament that the Government should allow local authorities to appoint gatekeepers who would judge whether people qualified on not only income grounds but more general medical needs grounds for the care that they sought.

Every time hon. Members put that point to the Treasury Bench, the Government knocked it aside. One of the consequences of that is a high level of provision, from which many of our constituents benefit. But if some of our constituents had been offered other options, they would not have chosen residential or nursing care.

It is because the Government would not allow local authorities to appoint a couple of gatekeepers that we face a bill probably in the region of £1·9 billion. Undoubtedly, the Under-Secretary of State will bring us up to date on that. I think that it is fair to say that, if hon. Members on either side of the House had realised 10 years ago that we would be debating a sum of almost £2 billion, none of us would have recommended the one-track community care solution that has been adopted. To some extent, that is water under the bridge.

I do not say that to score a cheap point. It is not a party point but a House of Commons point against the Treasury Bench. I make the point because, in the report that we are debating, we make several recommendations and we wish the Government to take them more seriously than those that we made in the past. The fact that the Government disregarded our recommendations largely accounts for the debate that we are having today.

The next problem that the Government face is the fear of evictions. If I were the Secretary of State for Social Security, which I am not, my nightmare would be the early morning phone call from the Department's press office saying that an eviction is taking place that day, that the media and particularly the television cameras will be there and asking whether I would be there and what were the Government's comments. It is because that fear exists that some home owners know perfectly well that they have the Government over a barrel. When they want to see fees generally jacked up, we get talk of impending evictions.

The Under-Secretary of State said in her discussions with the Select Committee that she did not have any examples of evictions, yet the Association of Metropolitan Authorities told us that 24 per cent. of its members had reported evictions to it. It added a phrase so extraordinary that I quote it directly:

"although these were felt to be isolated incidents."

All that I can say is, thank God that they were isolated incidents. Even so, a quarter of the authorities reported to their central body that such incidents had taken place. It is a real worry that evictions might take place.

It is because we wish to strengthen the Government's hand against a fairly well organised industry which seeks universal general increases that we make a series of recommendations in the report, to which I shall come in a moment. The Government are vulnerable at any time, but especially in the run-up to a general election, to the prospect of evictions of people who are no longer able to pay the full fees for which the home owner calls.

The Committee has highlighted two other problems. When the policy was first implemented, there was no question but that those who were then on supplementary benefit and are now on income support gained a first-class service from the homes. Indeed, many of the homes said that the fees from supplementary benefit were so adequate that the people who came in on that ticket were given some of the best accommodation in the establishment. That is not so now. There is not only a form of filtering within homes of the rooms offered to those on income support, but homes sometimes put up a bar against those whose only contribution is up to the ceiling laid down by the Government. Within homes, a two-tier system is developing.

More importantly, a different tier system is developing in different parts of the country. I see the hon. Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) in his place and I know that he hopes to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker. He is a member of the Select Committee on Health and played an enormously valuable part in our proceedings. We were given evidence by Age Concern England. It quoted a Health Advisory Service report on Bromley, which said:

"Frail, elderly people face exile in private residential homes far from Bromley".

In other words, the rates that the Government lay down are such that one must be extraordinarily lucky in Bromley and many other places to obtain a place near one's home. It gives a new and cruel twist to community care that people may have to be shipped perhaps as far as Birkenhead to find a community home. That provision will cut a person off from all that he or she most values—family and friends. That is the background to some of the problems that the report has highlighted.

I come quickly to our recommendations. I stress that we have made them in the most constructive vein possible. I sought to score points earlier on the cavalier way in which previous Ministers dismissed the suggestions from the then Select Committee, by which we sought to limit the rate of increase in the residential care part of the Government's budget. We did so not because we did not want money spent on community care, but because we did not necessarily believe that a one-track policy was the best way to ensure the ideal form of care. We want the Government to think carefully and respond positively to our recommendations, because we are anxious that the rate of increase in the Budget from now on should not be jacked up by the powerful lobby of the industry and the influence that it can exert on the Government.

Therefore, our recommendations were tailored to some selective targeted measures which the Government could implement to avoid conceding increases across the board. We emphasise in our report that we do not see those measures as a way of dealing with the shortfall. We are interested in how to make good that shortfall. That is what our recommendations are about, but we also aim to help the Government to limit the rate of increase in the budget.

I wish to touch on three proposals. First, the Secretary of State told the Committee and the House that the new form of community care, which will be run by local authorities, would have the extraordinary advantage that people in the locality who knew the scene would make the decisions. Why cannot that proposal be brought forward, so that the local offices of the Department of Social Security could make the decision about topping-up arrangements?

Secondly, as new residents in homes will be able to claim housing benefit under the new proposals, why cannot housing benefit be claimed as a way of helping to make good the shortfall? Thirdly, as the Government are turning a blind eye to many of the disregards being allowed for people on income support and in residential and nursing care, could that be codified and made safe for all forms of disregard?

We hope that the Government will respond to other priorities and suggestions in the report, which I shall list as headings because I know that other hon. Members wish to speak and will doubtless develop many of those arguments. We are worried about the date on which local authorities will know the size of their budget. Will the Government issue clear guidance on which responsibilities will fall to health authorities and which to social services? How far down towards the locality will the decision on housing benefit be made?

One more issue, which I often return to from these Benches, although I hope that before long I shall be able to support those on the Treasury Bench from the other side of the House——

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Is the hon. Gentleman crossing the Floor?

Mr. Field: When I am ready for residential care, I may totter over to that side of the House, but until then I am happy to stay on this side.

Finally, on the proposals in our report about extending freedom, many of us fear that, after the changeover, people's freedom will be limited under the Government's proposal, although so much of their rhetoric suggests the opposite. We have three proposals. First, as we wish to encourage carers and strengthen families—even the extended family—if a person who is caring for someone loses them to a home, the person's home should not have to go on the market to meet the cost of fees.

We are not saying that taxpayers should not be able to claw back some of the costs at a later stage, but the carer's position should be protected. Under the new system, we want people to have rights to choose the sort of care that they receive, rather than be directed to it. We all have too much experience of what it is like for council tenants trying to exercise their supposed freedom for us to lie easily with the Government's assurances on that matter.

The most important issue regarding freedom is that we fear that, far from more people being given control over their lives, when the new system comes into play, fewer people will have control. Our plea to the Government is that they take a leaf out of their own book on the independent living fund, which was set up in haste and has played a role that it was never meant to play. It has been a noble role, as it has allowed people grants and cash to fix the level of care that they want. They have been in control. Under the new system, we want an increasing proportion of the budget to go into a pot of cash, which local authorities will be able to give out. That cannot happen in year one, but as the years went by, it would enable people to build their own packages of care rather than having to take care designed by others for them off the shelf, as in a supermarket.

As I have emphasised three times, the previous Select Committee on Health and Social Services made a number of pleas to the Government not to get us into the position that we are in now. I am being polite about the way in which the Government have behaved when I say that they have dealt with our recommendations in a cavalier fashion. When the Under-Secretary of State responds, I hope that we will know that the joint recommendations from the Select Committee on Health and the Select Committee on Social Services will be taken more seriously than previous recommendations.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): My contribution will be brief. I support everything said by the Chairman of the Select Committee on Social Services, the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). I am sure that all those who participated in the report—in his Committee or in my Select Committee on Health—endorse the responsibile recommendations and conclusions in the report.

The hon. Gentleman presented the case for the Committee and introduced the debate in a measured and responsible way. Like him, I welcome my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security to the Front Bench to respond to this important debate. As the hon. Gentleman said, she made a substantial reputation for herself by the stand that she took in seeking to represent the best interests of the elderly and others who would be looked after in private residential or nursing homes.

Having endorsed—on behalf of the Health Committee—all the recommendations made by the Social Services Committee, I wondered precisely what my contribution to the debate could be. I need not have worried. Following the appearance that I made with the hon. Member for Birkenhead on a Channel 4 programme, which generated quite a volume of correspondence, I received a letter from the proprietor of a private nursing home in Chesterfield. The letter precisely sums up the remarks that I would have wished to make in this debate.

The gentleman concerned—the proprietor—decided to establish the home after he had cared for his father-in-law in his own home until he died. He described that as a traumatic and difficult experience, following which he and his wife pledged to find a better way to look after the elderly and people who need residential or nursing care.

In his compassionate letter, he advised me that, after 12 years research and work, they opened their present nursing home. He told me that they have about 50 residents, cared for in a purpose-built home by about 100 staff. That is a measure of the cost of looking after the elderly and those who need residential and nursing care properly. The 100 staff include 25 state registered nurses.

Like the hon. Member for Birkenhead, I have taken considerable time during the years that I have represented Macclesfield in the House to visit private residential and nursing homes and part III county homes in my constituency. I have not given notification but have dropped in.

The proprietor says in the letter that the facilities that he is able to provide are a better way to look after people who are among the most vulnerable in our society. The kernel of the argument is that, because of the costs he incurs by running a highly staffed, well-motivated and caring establishment, he has to limit the number of income-supported residents that he can accommodate. The fees that he can get back from the Department of Social Security are inadequate to cover the costs that he incurs.

In his letter, he gives one or two examples:

"May I give Margaret as an example of costs. This lovely lady has suffered extreme arthritis for many years, and her skeleton is crumbling away. Three of my staff take 1 hour to wash and dress her, morning and night—cost £210·00 per week.

Treatment, laundry, food, room and other overheads raise the true cost of her care to £400·00 per week. Income support for this lady is £255·00 per week, or £1·55 per hour."

The cost of £210 is the fee that he currently charges the lady.

He asks me to consider another case whose Christian name is Jennie:

[Mr. Nicholas Winterton]

"This delightful lady is frail and confused, requiring a lot of care and attention. At night her bed linen is changed 6 times to keep her warm, dry and comfortable. her bedroom carpet has been shampooed daily for the past 2 years. Yet Jennie is charming, retaining dignity and pride, and is loved by all of us.

Not one of our residents could live on their own now. Many have spent years in their own homes, coping with frailty, loneliness, poor diets, falls, fear, burns and hypothermia."

Perhaps the most serious of those is loneliness. Sadly today, the extended family is not as caring and is perhaps too extended to enable them to take care of their elderly relatives.

The gentleman who runs the home advises me that the only alternative environment for the residents would be a hospital. Of course, that would not be so homely or comfortable and it would go entirely against the policy of successive Governments, which is to have these people looked after in a much more caring way, hopefully within the community. In addition, the cost of a hospital bed is extremely high.

The proprietor of the home in Chesterfield says that they cannot reduce costs. He thinks that the Government's regulations are reasonable, but says that they demand only minimum standards, while he seeks to establish standards which are higher than the minimum. He says that his charges are well below those of local hotels which "do not offer skills to reduce the pain, or reassurance and a cuddle when you are afraid."

He continues:

"Recently I spoke to a chairman of a health authority, who confirmed that substantial economies are being made by closing 'Grannie beds' and transferring patients to private nursing homes."

We all know that that is happening. I am making no announcement that is not well known to the Government. If the Minister of State and the Parliamentary Under-Secretary are determined that community care should work and that the more vulnerable groups within society should have a better life in their declining years, they will ensure that the level of income support for those who need to rely upon it is as high as is necessary to enable them to be looked after in a private residential or nursing home which can provide the proper quality of care that the House would wish them to receive.

Those examples are not untypical of what is happening throughout the country. I have not mentioned Southfield Manor, just outside my constituency, which I brought up during our deliberations in Committee, where Mr. McCabe looks after 94 infirm, confused, mentally ill and mentally handicapped patients with serious behavioural problems. That nursing home requires a high level of qualified staffing. He may have to close at the end of the year unless many of the patients, most of whom rely upon income support, have an increase in their benefit.

I take the examples of top-up and housing benefit recommended in the report by the hon. Member for Birkenhead. If something like that is done, we can stagger through to 1 April 1993, but a very serious position will develop then. I hope that the Government of the day—my own Government, I trust—will pay serious attention to the matter and make better plans.

5.4 pm

Mr. Clifford Forsythe (Antrim, South): In 1982, as mayor of Newtownabbey, I took the opportunity to visit all the residential and nursing homes, in addition to the hospitals, in the borough. Since then, I have visited many homes in the rest of my constituency. But it was the visits that I made as mayor in 1982 that gave me my first insight into the running of such establishments. I saw at first hand the facilities which were being offered to the disabled and elderly residents.

I should explain to the House that most of the homes were under the control of the Department of Health and Social Services, because in Northern Ireland the local government set-up means that district councils have no function in the delivery of social services to their ratepayers. The position remains the same today for the public provision of care, and many private residential and nursing homes now exist in the Province.

Returning to 1982, I was generally pleased with the lay-out and surroundings of most of the homes; unfortunately, some fell far short of the standards of comfort and homeliness that many people, including the residents, would have liked. What impressed me greatly in all the homes was the dedication, hard work and helpfulness of all the staff, each working to overcome, in a minority of homes, adverse conditions of overcrowding and unsuitable, ancient buildings, in order to ensure that the residents were kept comfortable and contented.

I was made aware by those in charge of the homes that, because of better health provision and the demographic trend, a large rise in demand for places in residential and nursing homes was inevitable and that major changes would occur as a result. I am sure that those staff members, like me, have been startled by the huge increase, not only in the number of residents in the homes but in the vastly increased number of homes, particularly private homes.

It is revealing to compare the figures for 1982 and 1990. In 1982, residential homes in Northern Ireland totalled 246; in 1990, the number was 337, a rise of 37 per cent. In 1982, there were 12 nursing homes; in 1990, the number was 164, a rise of 1,250 per cent. Recently, I asked the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to supply me with up-to-date figures for residents. The total number of residents in all homes in 1987 was 2,382; in 1990, it had grown to 4,489, a rise of 85 per cent. in just three years.

The figures for different categories are interesting. Residential homes had 85 mentally ill and 1,321 other residents over 60 years of age; 41 mentally ill and 203 other residents were under 60. The nursing homes had 80 mentally ill residents and 2,533 other residents over the age of 60, seven mentally ill residents and 219 other residents under the age of 60.

All those residents received income support. That means that, according to the 1991 benefit rates, approximately £1 million per week is paid in Northern Ireland for those in residential homes and nursing homes. That figure does not reveal how many of those residents are supported by their relatives, who cover the real cost of the residential care in many homes.

The principal demographic change in the 1990s will be a rapid expansion in the number of pensioners over the age of 85. By 2001, the proportion of elderly folk living alone in the United Kingdom will have increased by 600,000 over the number living alone in 1986. We are already aware that living alone is the second greatest demographic risk factor, other than age, that necessitates admission to hospital or to residential or nursing care homes.

Those figures put into context the conclusions and recommendations contained in the report of the Select Committee on Social Security. They reinforce the vital importance of agreeing on an effective policy for such specialist care.

I support the report, and commend it to the House. I am not a member of either major political party, and I was impressed by all my Committee colleagues, under the excellent chairmanship of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field). I have been impressed by their industry and obvious concern when investigating this important subject. I was also impressed by the manner in which they laid aside party preferences—except on one occasion—to arrive at conclusions aimed to be beneficial to residents and fair to people who have taken on the task of caring for those who are no longer able to manage in their own homes. We must not forget those who undertake that work.

I welcome the extra finance that will be provided by the Secretary of State for Social Security next April. However, I wonder whether various hidden expenses in running a home have been taken into account. In Northern Ireland, it appears that the Rates Amendment (Northern Ireland) Order could lead to some residential and nursing homes being rated by the valuation department. It also appears that, as a result of the new council tax, some of those homes will have to pay that tax. I do not believe that that hidden expense has been taken into account when deciding on the finance to be provided next April.

I sympathise with, and understand, the argument of those asking for a general uprating. However, I also sincerely believe that that would create a situation in which fees could be raised to absorb that extra cash. I am also concerned that, on occasions, a resident's personal allowance is used to top up their care home fees. The personal allowance belongs to the individual, and it must remain his property.

Recommendation (x) in the report asks that residents' homes should be exempt

"from consideration as capital assets in connection with Income Support claims in those cases where a carer remains living in the home or where there may be a reasonable possibility of the resident returning to live at home."

It also states that, should the resident's spouse sell the home to raise extra money, that money should be excluded from the calculations of income support entitlement.

I should like that concession extended to family smallholdings or farms where a similar problem can arise, with the result that land that has been in a family's hands for centuries is sold to pay for the former owner's residential or nursing home fees. That deprives his spouse not only of her home, but her livelihood. Such a sale places the land and the house in the hands of speculators who care nothing for history, tradition, or, indeed, farming.

In the future, we face the prospect of more and more pensioners taking on the responsibility of looking after their even older parents, as well as themselves, on a fixed and, in many cases, inadequate income. Therefore, it is obvious that we have a short time only in which to resolve the problem. It is up to us to ensure that those who created the wealth of the nation in the past are properly looked after without the pressures, tensions and worry to which many are unfortunately subject now.

5.16 pm

Mr. Roger Sims (Chislehurst): The House is indebted, not for the first time, to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) for the manner in which he chairs the Select Committee on Social Security and for the way in which he introduced the debate today. The report from the Select Committee is a valuable one on an important subject. As the hon. Member for Birkenhead mentioned, the report also creates a precedent by being as near as possible a joint report of two Committees, the Select Committee on Social Security and the Select Committee on Health, of which I am a member.

Government is divided into different Departments, but life is not. There are bound to be overlaps in the work of different Departments, and therefore of different Select Committees. There are circumstances in which it is useful to conduct joint inquiries. I hope that it will be possible to amend the Standing Orders to produce joint reports, instead of having to follow the rather odd procedures which we did.

People are expected, not unreasonably, to try to make some provision for their old age, but some are better able to do so than others. Some are able to live in their own homes and look after themselves, with or without help from relatives, literally until their dying day. Others—none of us know what the future holds—need to go into residential homes or nursing homes to receive care. In both cases, the costs can be substantial, but they are especially great in the case of nursing homes. Where such costs can be met from a person's resources, it is right that that should be done. When that is difficult or impossible, the state, through the payment of social security benefits, should step in.

I recall a case in my constituency of a lady who had to go into a home. Her son wrote to me from an address that suggested that he was not too badly placed. He protested that his mother's application for income support had been refused because she owned a home. He said that that meant that he would have to sell that home and therefore deprive himself of his inheritance. I am afraid that he got a rather dusty answer from me, because I did not see why the taxpayer should pay to support his mother when there was such a property in the family.

Any benefit system involves rules and regulations which are almost bound to produce anomalies. Some people will be covered, others not. Some will get benefit who perhaps should not have it. We must try to build in some flexibility and consider cases on their merits. That, without going into a detailed argument, is a feature of the social fund.

Income support for people in homes is not flexible. The rules specify the circumstances in which it shall be allowed, and the sums are fixed. On the Minister's admission, income support is not intended to meet the full cost of fees of residential and nursing homes. So how is the gap to be filled between the fees charged and the income support provided? Sometimes it is met by relatives, and that is not unreasonable if they are people of means. Sometimes charities are asked for assistance to fill the gap. But some people do not have relatives, while others have relatives who do not have the means to help.

Many examples were quoted to the Committee and are recorded in the evidence. They include a letter which I received about a 102-year-old lady in a modest residential home in my constituency for whom the difference between income support and fees is met by her son, aged 80, from his pension. That cannot be right. Similarly, there is the case of a lady in a nursing home in my constituency who receives retirement pension, war widow's pension, attendance allowance and a grant from the Soldiers, Sailors and Airmen's Families Association, her husband having fought in two world wars, plus income support. But that is still not sufficient to pay the nursing home fees. The difference must be paid by her son, an ex-POW pensioner turned 70.

I urge the Minister seriously to consider the recommendations in our report, which would enable local offices to top up in individual cases, thus providing the flexibility that I have advocated. The arguments against a general increase in income support levels are rehearsed in the report, but I suggest that the alternative, of individual top-ups, would be less costly and a far more effective use of resources.

Reference has been made to carers. I cite the case of a lady in my constituency who, since her father died in 1975, has lived with her mother, sharing household costs and maintenance, and latterly has combined a full-time job with looking after the mother in failing health. The mother is now 82, her Alzheimer's disease has reached the stage where she needs 24-hour care, and she has moved into a nursing home. The daughter's entire net salary, plus the mother's pension, are insufficient to meet the nursing home fees, so an application has been made for income support. That benefit will be issued for six months, but not for longer, because the house was in the names of the father and mother and since the death of the father has been in the name of the mother only. So she is not eligible for income support after six months, the period which is given to enable her to dispose of the house.

That means that the daughter, now aged 52—she does not fall within the bracket of being either disabled or over 60—will be obliged to sell the roof over her own head. She is, in effect, being penalised for spending those years caring for her mother by having to sell her home of 20 years, on the proceeds of which she will apparently have no claim. The irony is that if, on the father's death, the home had been transferred not to the mother but to the daughter, there would have been no problem for the mother or daughter.

I urge the Minister sympathetically to consider our recommendation that in those circumstances the Government should exempt homes from consideration as a capital asset. I invite the Minister to look at the practicability of the ingenious solution mentioned by the Chairman of the Committee, by which social security might have a claim at a subsequent date on the estate or on the estate of the carer.

Some of those problems will cease to arise when the new community care schemes are introduced in 1993, and I emphasise the importance of the Government transferring sufficient funds to local authorities to enable needs to be met in full. We recommend that some research be undertaken to ascertain what the figure is likely to be. I suspect that, when assessment gets under way, we shall find much of what might be described as hidden need.

While, as I say, the problems should cease to arise, the existing problems will remain, because those at present on income support, and on support in April 1993, will continue under that system and at the rates then applying. We could therefore find after 1993 that in the same home will be people receiving income support because they were there before April and others who were put in the home at a later date by the local authority having their costs met in full.

The impact on residential and nursing homes of the new council tax is causing concern. It seems clear from the Local Government Finance Bill that a person will be exempt from the council tax if "his/her sole or main residence is in a residential care home, nursing home, mental nursing home in England and Wales, and is receiving care or treatment in the home."

Miss Sheila Scott, secretary of the National Care Homes Association, sought clarification from the Department of the Environment, which said in a recent letter to her:

"The Government proposes that the landlord or the owner of a residential care home should be liable to pay the council tax. It will be for that person to decide whether to seek a contribution from residents through fees and charges as he would with any other overhead".

Rather confusingly, the letter went on "Occupants of residential care homes will give rise to a discount. A maximum of two discounts will apply if there are no liable adults resident in the home."

While people on income support will not be liable, in any event, to the council tax, there is concern about what the implications will be for owners of residential and nursing homes, for if those charges are substantial—and in the past the rates did not apply—and if now a substantial, council tax is to be imposed, the tax will have to be passed on to the residents and will increase fees even more.

I hope that the Minister, either when replying to the debate or by letter, will clarify the misunderstanding, if it is a misunderstanding, because it would be unfortunate if life were made unnecessarily more difficult for people in residential and nursing homes whose position our report endeavours to assist.

5.29 pm

Mr. David Hinchliffe (Wakefield): Having served on the Select Committee on Health and been involved in the joint inquiry, I endorse the report's conclusions and recommendations. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) for his role in engineering the joint working of the Social Security Select Committee and the Health Select Committee, and to the Chairman of the Health Select Committee, the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), for his role in the process. It was a useful exercise and we all have a right to feel proud of the end result—the content of the report.

There has been a broad consensus in the debate so far, but I hope that I can break it as I take a different view from some of those that have been expressed. Some would say that my view is more politically partisan. I apologise for the fact that my argument may be familiar to most hon. Members present. The two Ministers present have certainly heard me take this line before, and my hon. Friends and most Back Benchers have heard it on a number of occasions. Furthermore, any similarity between the speech that I made to the Doncaster trades and Labour club a couple of weeks ago, when you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, were in the Chair, and the speech that I shall make tonight, is purely coincidental.

We have heard comments about the Government's community care programme and have debated the matter in the House on numerous occasions. None of us would argue with the broad political consensus that community care is desirable, and we all support the processes in which successive Governments have been engaged in the past 20 or more years. We all support the break-up of the large old lunatic asylums and the movement of people from geriatric wards into the community, but we may raise questions about how those changes were handled. The number of children who have been introduced into institutional care has also been reduced, and community schools have been broken up. Anyone who knows people who have lived in such institutions will support such measures. Alongside that process, however, there has been an alarming growth in the movement towards private institutional care. We have now reached a stage where community care is in a horrific mess and we have to unravel it. The report that we are discussing tonight is one contribution toward unravelling the mess that—let there be no mistake—has arisen because of the Government's policies alone.

The hon. Member for Antrim, South (Mr. Forsythe) spoke of the huge explosion in the number of care homes in his part of the world. The official figures provided by the Library show that, in the past decade or so, the number of places in local authority care homes have been reduced by some 4 per cent., while the number of private residential care beds has been increased by 316 per cent. It is not possible to obtain reliable estimates of the number of private nursing home beds, but I am reliably informed that, in my area of Yorkshire, the increase in the past decade has been some 1,000 per cent. That is a massive increase in the number of people in private nursing home care.

It may be argued that the reason for that is the explosion in the number of elderly people, but the figures provided by the Library show that that simply does not justify the explosion in the number of people in private nursing home care. The increase in the number of elderly in the same period is 9·5 per cent., and the increase in the number of very elderly who might be expected to end up in care is only some 20 per cent. Therefore, the actual increase in the number of elderly people in society in no way justifies the increase in the number of private care beds in the nursing home and residential care sectors.

The Government's policies have pushed into residential care people who do not need to be in such care. I say that not just because of what I see when I visit care homes in the public and private sectors in my constituency, as I frequently do. The Audit Commission said recently that 25 per cent. of the people whom it saw in care homes could have been cared for in the community and had no need to be in institutional care. That point was picked up by the previous Social Services Select Committee.

The Health Select Committee recently took evidence from directors of social services who said that their registered care homes officers reported that 50 per cent. of the people whom they saw in private care homes in their areas need not have been in those homes but could have been accommodated in the community. That is an indictment of the Government's policy in the past decade, and we must do something about it. Because of the Government's policy, people who do not need to be in institutional care are being placed in it. Whatever Government are in power, that is wrong, and I hope that the report will be a starting point for a change in direction.

The reasons for a revival in the institutional model of care are clear. The Government have pursued policies that have directly led to people being forced into accepting—they have no doubt had a resigned attitude—the need to enter care because the preventive services have sometimes been pulled from under their feet.

We can argue all day whether the Government have funded the national health service properly. There is plenty of objective evidence that there has been large-scale cumulative underfunding since the Government have been in power. However, I have seen cases in my area—I have mentioned them in the Chamber before—of people who have had basic services such as bath nurses withdrawn, resulting in their having to be forced to leave their homes, to give up the ghost, and to enter care. If the Minister wants details, I can name cases in my area where that has happened.

The Government are committed to a reduction in public spending, which has affected the availability of preventive, caring services—alternatives to institutional care. It is ironic that, although the Government are committed to reducing public spending, huge amounts of money—some £1·7 billion in the current financial year—have been thrown willy-nilly at the private care sector. If one looks at that in detail, one finds that it is a gross and highly irresponsible misuse of huge amounts of public money, which could be used far more effectively elsewhere.

My local authority has experienced major difficulties in attempting to provide the basic services that are required by people who did not want to enter care but wanted to remain independent and who had carers prepared to support them, with a little help from outside and from local authorities. Yesterday, I received a note from the deputy director of my local authority about its present financial position. I asked about the position of the local authority with regard to its standard spending assessment in the next financial year. He said that the local authority had experienced problems in the past few years and added:

"For 1992-93 the Standard Spending Assessment for Wakefield District Social Services excluding specific grants is £26·3m.

Current expenditure plus inflation, if carried forward into 1992-93, will be £28·6m. The SSA is therefore £2·3m less than we need to maintain current expenditure plus inflation.

However, the letter from the Department of Health dated 26.11.91 giving details of the Standard Spending Assessments for the personal Social Services states that 'In setting the 1992-93 figure the Government has taken account of demography and inflation and has allowed for the implications of Community Care and the Children Act 1989. Also included are the revenue consequences of the specific grants'."

Mr. Cullinan, the deputy director, then said:

"In round terms I would estimate that we need an extra £2m to allow for the minimum implications of the Community Care Act, Children Act and the revenue consequences of the specific grants.

This means a shortfall of £4·3m between the Standard Spending Assessment and what we need as an absolute minimum in 1992-93 to meet legislative requirements."

This is the reality for my constituents who want assistance with home care and the variety of levels of provision such as day care and respite support, which enable people to remain independent or semi-independent.

In the period since the Government came to power, the pattern of expenditure on personal social services has been changed. By virtue of the Government having reduced the rate support grant, they have taken some £6 billion out of the budget of personal social services. That money should have been spent on preventing people from having to enter the hugely costly care programmes that we are discussing today. I do not want to expand that point, but it is important for the Government to accept that their local government policies have greatly damaged the prospects of people who genuinely wanted to remain, and could have remained, in the community. It will cost the Government more to adopt those policies than if they had allowed people to remain independent or semi-independent if they wished.

The role of housing in relation to community care is absolutely vital. Last year was the first year since the 1920s when no new council houses were built in my district. No one is making the sort of provision we need to enable people to remain semi-independent by moving into sheltered housing when they can no longer remain in their own homes. The voluntary sector and housing associations have simply been unable to expand the provision in the way needed during a period when there has been an increase in the number of elderly.

Alongside those policies, we have seen a clear effort by the Government to make it easier for people to enter private institutional care. There was a change in 1981 in the supplementary benefit system. People have told me that they have struggled to try to get telephones, day and home care facilities, but their local authorities have genuinely not been in a position to assist them because they did not have the resources. However, as soon as the decision was made for those people to give up the ghost and go into institutional care, the money flowed.

The money is available, but not where it is actually needed. It is not used to allow people to remain independent or semi-independent. It is not used on basic services such as home care and facilities that would allow people to remain in their own homes, which is tragic. I have met many people who have been affected by those policies, and I believe that the Government have made regrettable decisions.

It is also important to mention the way in which a market experiment in the private care sector has, with substantial public support and money, had a bearing on the type and range of services now available. Provision in the private sector is unplanned. If it is planned, it is done purely and simply by entrepreneurs who realise that they can make money by providing establishments in a particular district.

Perhaps because there are not many large Victorian mansions in Wakefield, vast numbers of people who have lived all their lives in that district have had to move away to live—often for the rest of their lives—many miles from where they were brought up. Provision for people in need has not been available where those people live, and they have had to move to the facilities. If there were proper planning of community care provision, those people would have been granted the necessary facilities in their homes.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: I am surprised that the hon. Gentleman is making such a strong argument. In my short speech, I spoke of a private proprietor who had built a purpose-built nursing home for the infirm and those who could not operate within the community from their own flats or houses. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will be prepared to admit that, if special accommodation is not provided by the county council social services or through the old geriatric hospital wards, it must come from another source. The private sector can fill and is filling an important vacuum.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I understand the hon. Gentleman's point. I certainly do not disagree that, where provision is specialised and limited—as it might be for young disabled people—it might be necessary for the person requiring that care to travel some distance from where he or she lives. However, I am not talking about people with specific needs, but about elderly people who simply need elements of care that are not provided in their communities.

I know of a number of examples where individuals have been discharged from NHS geriatric care and have been told that they must move into private care as there is nowhere else for them. As private care is not available in their local authority district, those people have had to travel to find accommodation outside their local authority area. They have ended up in the private care of another local authority. After some time, they have applied to that local authority for funds to return to their own local authority district where they have lived all their lives. They are then told that the authority is not prepared to support them because they are ordinary residents.

They have to live out the rest of their lives in a district many miles from their own homes where they have lived all their lives. I know of a number of such deplorable cases. As private care is largely unplanned, it is often not in the interests of the many residents who have to move from the district where they have lived all their lives and where they have their friends—[Interruption.]

Having been given a nod by the Whips, I shall come to my central theme, although I should have liked to go on for at least another half an hour. Private sector provision comes primarily in one form: institutional provision, which is the easiest way to make money. I do not believe that institutional provision should be the only facility available to the elderly or disabled. There are other forms of provision which could be available to people in their own homes.

People keep plugging the fact that the new legislation will introduce assessments. Hopefully, the assessment scheme will be introduced in the 1993 legislation, but assessment alone will not cure the problem. A social worker can assess a person, but only on the basis of the services available at any one time. If there are no alternatives to institutional care, assessment is nonsense. It would be wrong to assume that assessment will cure the problem.

I shall briefly summarise the points that should come out of the debate, and I hope that the Government will take note. The Government have engineered a deliberate redirection of public resources away from preventive domiciliary supportive services in the community towards institutional care in the private sector. It is ironic that, up to the last financial year, the amount of money spent on institutional care in the private sector through income support provisions—previously, supplementary benefit—was about £6 billion. That sum was provided to people entering private care since 1981. The amount of money taken out of local authority preventive services budget was about the same—£6 billion. That is what the Government have achieved during their period in office.

The incoming Labour Government will have a huge challenge: to engineer a complete transformation of residential care. No one has referred during the debate to the quality of care available in homes. The Government have commissioned various reports; the report analysing the costs of care did not mention quality. I agree with Lady Wagner who said that local authority homes should be "progressively adapted to provide fewer residents with better accommodation on the model of very sheltered housing." That is the policy that we should adopt for residential care. We should not simply put people into Victorian houses miles away from where they have lived and forget about them, as happens at present.

I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) agrees that, when we are in government, we must urgently implement a substantial redirection of public resources away from residential care towards supportive services in the community, whether in the voluntary or local authority sectors or elsewhere. We shall thus enable people who choose to live independently to remain in the community with the support facilities which they require and which, in many cases, have been removed by the Government.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): Although the hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) may have thought he was introducing a contentious note, only in the closing seconds of his speech did I find much to disagree with. It was the second time that I have heard that speech, but it was well worth a second airing and there was a great deal in it with which I would agree.

The hon. Member for Wakefield fairly pointed out that the amount of money spent on residential care is massive. Our report notes that since 1979 the amount spent on income support for people in residential care and nursing homes has risen by about 160 times—a massive increase. Without wishing to spoil the atmosphere of consensus, I must point out that, although the hon. Gentleman said that the money could have been spent in better ways, I have a strong suspicion that, had it not been increased by this amount, he might have said that it should have been increased by more. That sums up the nature of the dilemma that he identified.

It is common ground between us that residential care of the standard that we expect for our fellow citizens is not a cheap option. Whatever else divides us, that statement cannot. It is an expensive option, and so it should be. The chances are that it is the most expensive option of all, so on social, pragmatic and financial grounds, I am sure that the hon. Gentleman was right to draw our attention to the fact that there may be better ways of spending this much money.

I do not, however, see the spending of money in this way as inhibiting our reaching a more attractive regime. It is a necessary step on the way there. We are getting away from the institutionalised Victorian establishment to something which approximates more closely to the sort of conditions that people enjoyed or wanted to enjoy when they were still independent enough to live in their own homes. The type of home with which all hon. Members will be familiar, operating at its best, is a step in the direction of the right sort of care.

We owe the hon. Member for Wakefield a debt. The last recommendation in our report is that the Government should undertake a study into the types of service that should be made available as alternatives to residential or nursing home care. That recommendation was included to satisfy the point made by the hon. Member, and it makes the report all the better.

In a sense, however, we need the evidence to back up the hon. Gentleman's suspicions. I am sure that he is right to say that we could be more creative, that we could keep certain people in their own homes either for ever, or at least for longer. That is only common sense. I must sound a note of caution to the effect that the evidence does not yet exist. I share the hon. Gentleman's strong suspicions, but quantifying them will depend on the evidence. If the recommendation in the report is taken up, we may well gain the evidence that would carry the hon. Gentleman's suggestion further ahead.

The recommendations in the report would not have been made without the highly skilled chairmanship provided by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), who shows us where consensus lies and who makes it clear that the easiest options of all are not available. Many people who take an interest in these matters might say that all that is necessary is to spend more money. This above all others must be an example of a problem on which expenditure of money would do the trick. As the hon. Member for Wakefield and I would agree, however, there is more to it than that. Our acknowledgement of that lends our report credibility and makes it harder for the Minister not to follow at least some of our recommendations.

The first recommendation contains the following statement:

"We do not recommend a general uprating of the Income Support level, other than the normal annual uprating. We welcome the increases to be made in the 1992 uprating, particularly the additional £15 a week rise . . . We understand and sympathise with those who have asked for a general uprating, but we believe that in all probability it would simply push fees up further and actually exacerbate the problem." That says it all. The hon. Member for Birkenhead, with his customary fairness which makes it so difficult to attack the parts of his presentation with which one does not agree, said that a general uprating would merely put the Government, the Treasury, the taxpayer and the system over a barrel. So the message should not go forth that this is just a question of spending more money and then the problem will be solved.

The recommendations can be divided into three categories. Recommendation (xvi), which I have already mentioned, falls into the first. It is valuable and free-standing. The next category discusses specific ways in which money might be spent to deal with a problem that was always bound to exist before community care was finally implemented—but it does so in a targeted way that would not amount to a general uprating. The third category I will refer to in a moment.

The difficulty with which the Government have to wrestle—I can say this in a debate in which there has been far more agreement than disagreement—is that, although we have pointed out the dangers of a general uprating and done our level best to come up with a package of recommendations that do not amount to a general uprating, it may be hard to implement the recommendations in their entirety in such a way that they would not amount to a general uprating, thus having the precise effect that the Committee did not want.

We Back Benchers do not have to wrestle with these problems; we have done our part by pointing out responsibly how to deal with the problem. But we would do our own credibility no good and we would not serve those with an interest in this debate if we did not acknowledge that, unless we are careful about our solutions, we shall bring about precisely what we do not want to achieve.

Finally, I arrive at the third category of recommendations, which includes action that can be taken that will not require expenditure. Recommendations (vii) and (viii) amount to much the same thing. The Committee was given clear evidence that some health authorities indulge in what can only be described as sharp practice, either by passing on to the social security budget or by passing on to relatives obligations that the authority is supposed by law to fulfil. The recommendations try to rectify that; the practice must be stopped.

Health authorities may reply that they want more money, but then they would, wouldn't they? Times do not change; that is a respectable pressure to bring to bear on the Government of the day. But first things first: if authorities have an obligation in law, they must discharge it. Whatever else may cause the Minister difficulty when she sums up, I cannot imagine that she will not be able willingly to clasp to herself those two recommendations. She can do that without embarrassment or fear of comparison with past speeches.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) alluded to recommendation (x)—the consideration of capital assets in connection with income support cases when one carer is present and one is not. This recommendation combines compassion, common sense and—although we do not have the evidence to assess this—good solid fiscal sense. For that reason, if for no other, it should be adopted.

The report does not underestimate the problems; it tries to deal constructively with them, and it responsibly points up the fact that we must be careful lest, by implementing the recommendations in their entirety, we bring about what we do not want to achieve. Mercifully, we Back Benchers do not have to wrestle with that.

5.59 pm

Mr. David Bellotti (Eastbourne): First, I thank the Chairman, the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field), and all the Members of the Select Committee who worked hard to produce the report and the excellent recommendations which are contained therein.

The report is simply a look at the current situation which will grow more serious as time goes on. The United Kingdom has 10 million retired people, about 18 per cent. of the population, but that figure will increase considerably in the decade to come. By the year 2030, although the overall population will rise by about 7 per cent., the rise in the 60 to 74-year-old age range will be about 36 per cent. and the rise in the over-75 age range will be more than 44 per cent. Those figures show that we must consider the report's recommendations seriously, because, unless we act properly on them, the situation will be more difficult to deal with as time goes on.

First, we must determine our principles for care in the community. There should be a mixed economy of care. It is for the House to ensure that all three sectors, public, private and voluntary, have the opportunity to develop and grow during the challenging years ahead. We should try to maintain high standards in all three sectors because that will lead to an element of choice for the client or the customer, help us to ensure that we obtain value for money and, to some extent, maintain standards, because only by rigorous inspection and comparison between the three sectors can standards be maintained.

In the real world, however, local authority public sector provision for residential care is in difficulty. Sussex is no different from many other areas of the country. There, the local authority is having to reduce the number of places available and to close existing residential homes in order to find the money to bring the remaining homes up to the standard which should exist across the three sectors to which I have referred. Therefore, the number of places in the public sector is being reduced.

The voluntary homes are also in difficulty because of recent changes in the financing of many of those which are registered as housing associations. Many of them are finding it difficult to balance their books, and relatively few are looking forward to developing new projects in the next 10 years. Their development plans are few and far between.

The third sector, the private residential and nursing home sector, has suffered because of the gap which has been created between income support and the real cost of delivering care. I was extremely pleased to see that one of the report's major recommendations was that the Government should immediately commission research to provide information about the shortfall between income support and fees paid, so that the funds to be transferred from the Department of Social Security to local authorities in 1993 can be accurately determined, because, if a problem exists now, it will be much worse then. That is important because, if funds are not there, standards of care will decline.

Slightly less important, but nevertheless important to homes that I visit, is recommendation (ix), which has not yet been referred to, requesting the Department of Social Security to ensure that high priority is given to assessing and paying claims for income support in care homes. I have visited many residential homes in Eastbourne where the proprietors are concerned about the time that it takes for those receiving income support to obtain it. That causes initial problems at the very moment when confidence in the system is needed.

The 7·7 per cent. increase in social services spending in the recently announced standard spending assessment has been referred to by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities as "absolutely devastating". The Association of County Councils has also expressed strong concern. The problem with that figure which gives local authorities cause for concern in the public sector is that it is not a 7·7 per cent. increase above their spending last year but above the SSA, which is what the Government thought that they should have spent. Therefore, the real increase in the funds available to social services departments next year will not be at the level above inflation which would meet the existing problems. Many social services departments throughout Britain are already spending well above their SSAs.

An example of where that is not only occurring but is leading to delay is in the provision of a much needed facility by the Key housing association in Kilmarnock. Because Strathclyde region cannot be sure about next year's funding, it is unable to give the sort of encouragement that such a proposal has so far received, and there could well be a delay in the provision of residential accommodation as a result of those delays and uncertainties. It is important that not only the right figure is arrived at through the SSA, but a figure that will give people confidence to move forward.

In evidence to the Committee, widespread concern was expressed about the gap which is emerging. The Royal National Institute for the Blind, which I quote not least because one of its residential homes is in my constituency, said that, from April 1991, its fees were £262 per week, whereas its real average costs were about £300 per week. It concluded that there was an urgent need for the weekly limits to be raised so as to ensure that visually impaired people received the care they needed.

I am sure that the Minister is aware that that concern is shared by other voluntary providers and by the private sector providers. In addition, private providers tell hon. Members that, unless the gap can be reduced or some other solution arrived at, they are particularly worried about the future. The British Federation of Care Home Proprietors says:

"As the gap between income support and real costs continues to widen, choice, a major concern of the Government"—

something to which, as I said at the beginning, I too am committed—

"will be restricted and a two-tier system of residential care may be the inevitable and regrettable consequence."

I think that all hon. Members will accept that we do not want to support anything that would lead to the evolution of a two-tier system of care. The report contains many examples of concern expressed on that front. Given the comparison of the fees, of which we had much evidence, it is not surprising that concern has been expressed from so many quarters.

Another report dated 7 May 1991 comparing the income support for 1991-92 with two surveys one from Price Waterhouse and one from Laing, it is easy to see why that concern is so widespread. For residential care running costs, income support for the present financial year was £160. The Price Waterhouse survey concluded that the real cost was £187 and Laing concluded that it was £204. In nursing homes, the comparative figure for income support was £255. Price Waterhouse concluded that the real cost was £293 and Laing, £287.

Those figures will be well known to the Minister, but they illustrate and add to the views being expressed from so many quarters. One way of providing residential care is often for individuals to sell their properties when they retire and to use the capital to purchase their care. Unfortunately, it is becoming more difficult to do that. Apart from the problems of selling property at this time, the average house realises only £66,000. Even if the whole of that sum is invested, the income thus produced is unlikely to be sufficient to support someone living to a very old age. An extremely helpful booklet produced by Pearl Assurance states:

"Many people use the proceeds from the sale of a house to help finance the fees. Even large amounts of capital do not last forever, so it is a good idea to get professional advice well in advance of the time you anticipate moving into a home."

Given the large number of people who are likely to enjoy a quality of life into old age, consideration must be given to how they can be financially supported, because that cannot be done only by the sale of their property. Price Waterhouse points out that average residential care and nursing home costs in London and the south-east are 15 per cent. higher than in the rest of the country.

Current uncertainty means that developments such as that in Kilmarnock which I mentioned are not proceeding as we would wish, and it is affecting individuals who are receiving care but who are not properly funded. I know that the director of nursing at one Sussex establishment has written to the Secretary of State and to a number of other right hon. and hon. Members, pointing out that his home has provided places to ex-hospital patients, but that they have not been awarded the income support to which they are entitled.

On 24 September, the National Association of Mental Health legal director successfully represented 12 of the ex-hospital patients in that home before a social security tribunal, which awarded them income support. However, the Benefits Agency decided to appeal against that decision to the social security commissioner. While that process continues, those individuals are left without any income. The Minister should give consideration to such cases, which place enormous pressures on the establishments concerned, and which could arise even after "Care in the Community" has been implemented.

In all this, we want also to protect the carers. At some stage, they could become the very people who need financial help for residential care. If we mortgage their future on behalf of those for whom they care, we shall not be providing for their own care in due course. Clearly, income support levels are not high enough, and the Government must address the alternative solutions available to them. Funding must also be reassessed—and I am sure that if we put our minds to that task, we could all do better.

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): I pay tribute to the Chairmen of the Social Security Select Committee and of the Health Select Committee, who have found a way around the difficulties of operating together and have produced a more interesting report as a result. Having been through that process once, the Social Security Committee is clearly interested in other areas. When problems such as those created by the Maxwell affair, for example, come to light, that Committee and the Department of Trade and Industry could operate together.

The report therefore establishes an important precedent: it means that Government policy will not always be departmentalised but will be seen in the round. The problem with Select Committees is that they are sometimes compelled to take a narrow view, rather than the broader view that is reflected by the report.

The report gives further evidence that residential and nursing homes are an enormously important and valuable source of care for the elderly. The Government have made significant improvements in that regard. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State must be delighted that she will be summing up in a debate that concerns an area of activity in which expenditure has increased 160 times under this Government. Even given the expenditure that the Government have devoted to the public sector, there cannot be many Ministers who find themselves in such a favourable position.

The number of claimants has increased from 12,000 in 1979 to 220,000. There were 9·5 million old age pensioners in 1979, but there are now some 10·5 million. Those extra 1 million pensioners must account for many of the additional claimants. The frail or very elderly account for an increasing number of pensioners, and that emphasises the importance of nursing home and residential care.

The evidence to the Select Committee suggests that the private sector has not only expanded well in terms of growing numbers and additional services, but of maintaining its assets. There was, however, evidence that public sector homes have been poorly maintained and that councils had spent their money elsewhere. Councils have had an enormous amount of money through their hands, and have spent it in an equally enormous number of areas over the past 12 years.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): A recent report named my local authority of Calderdale as the second most efficient metropolitan council in the country. Because of the threat of poll tax capping this year, it was compelled to cut £5 million from its budget. I do not think that even the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) could accuse that authority of being profligate, but those cuts will affect the care of the elderly in Calderdale.

Mr. Shaw: The hon. Lady ought to examine local authority budgets. I was on a local council for some years that thought it was well run, but we still found it possible to get rid of a tier of management. It is always possible to do that, and to use elsewhere the money saved. Many councils have employed too many staff over the years, have been too inefficient, and have not maintained their homes for the elderly and residential care homes as well as they should have done.

The Committee was told of a backlog of maintenance. That is because councils do not keep proper accounts or records. One of the problems in the public sector is that no one keeps a balance sheet, so there is no proper record of maintenance costs and of depreciating assets—whereas the business man or woman who manages a private care home is alive to the importance of maintenance, and of protecting the value of that asset.

The Government made a good move in calling in Price Waterhouse, because clearly there was concern among residential care home owners about their funding through the income support mechanism. We welcome the Government's commitment to keeping finance and income support levels under review; the Committee will examine the position from time to time, and ensure that the levels remain reasonable.

As the Committee's Chairman pointed out, the Government must maintain a fine balance. They must be careful not to make income support too generous, thus causing the taxpayer to lose out and causing funds to be taken from other provision for the elderly and disabled. The Government must exercise the wisdom of Solomon: although they must not put too much money into that sector, if they put in too little, the owners of care homes will tend to withdraw the little extra facilities that are so enjoyed by the elderly people.

As the report points out, resources must be made available to those who enter residential care with no resources of their own for those "little extras". Their spouses may not have been able to save much during their lives; they may have had low-paid jobs. Thank goodness, the current pensions policy is improving the position: many more people will retire with second pensions. Many others, however, will have retired some time ago, and will not have sufficient resources. The Government should consider setting up a scheme to provide top-up money when residents' families cannot provide it themselves.

The question of evictions is open to misconception. The evidence of such evictions is very weak; I felt that the evidence presented to the Committee was based more on political considerations than on hard numbers. One organisation suggested, however, that—although no actual evictions had taken place—some people had been discouraged from going into homes because of the cost involved. We recognise that some homes are more expensive than others, and that some provide more facilities than others; we must ensure, however, that no one falls through the net because basic income support is not available.

The report makes a recommendation about the assessment of claims for income support, and the payment of such support. We are led to believe that there are administrative problems. As we know, all Government Departments have such problems, but a review of administration might be helpful.

In my constituency, a care home owner admitted an elderly person over a weekend after that person had suffered a fall in her own home. The home owner had not waited for the bureaucratic processes to be completed; she had acted out of the goodness of her heart. Rather than being rewarded by the social security system, that home owner suffered a disadvantage. Payment of income support is related to pension payment days, and she was not remunerated for the first five days of the elderly person's occupation. The home owner had to pay herself. It is clear that legitimate and reasonable owners of residential care homes are suffering. The less money is given to such homes, the less is available for the "little extras" to which I have referred.

The hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) mentioned alternatives to residential or nursing home care. Although I disagreed with some of what he said, I agree that we should consider whether more people can stay in their own homes. As I have said, there has been a substantial increase in the number of pensioners, but surely new technology and the availability of volunteers could enable more people to stay at home for longer. We should take a radical approach to the position of elderly people beyond the year 2000, and consider whether technology can allow them to enjoy a better standard of living and to rely less on residential and nursing homes. Surely, in the early years after retirement, fewer people will need to go into such homes.

I commend the report. I believe that many of its recommendations deserve wider and deeper consideration, and I hope that the Government will take them on board.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on his excellent chairmanship of the Committee; I also congratulate the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), who played an important role. I welcome the recommendations in the report.

The report addresses itself very well to a specific "client group", the elderly and sick. Over the past decade, the care of that group has been privatised: the hon. Member for Macclesfield illustrated the process very clearly when he referred to an excellent nursing home in his constituency, a fairly large institution containing trained nurses. The taxpayer financed the training of those nurses: there is a hidden bonus for the owner of that home, and for the owners of many others.

In the Select Committee, the hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), who is not in the Chamber now, moved to amend paragraph 88 of the report. I am sad about that. The paragraph clearly spelled out the story of supplementary benefits and income support payments to fund care in residential and nursing homes, saying that it was a telling example of what could happen if change was made in an ad hoc way.

The section that was deleted struck me as very important. It pointed out:

"no overt decision had been made to phase out geriatric wards; the practice grew as health authorities saw the opportunity to transfer costs to the budget of another Government Department by transferring one aspect of care to the voluntary and private sector. That practice has now brought about a major change in the NHS. A service free at the point of delivery is being changed, for some, to one in which they or their relatives are asked to make what is often a considerable weekly contribution."

When Opposition Members talk of creeping privatisation, that is exactly what we mean. I am sorry that an excellent paragraph was amended, effectively to blame carers—or their neighbours or female relatives—for neglecting to do their unpaid duty.

Paragraph 94 expresses dismay that the funding of nursing home care should be private, and that health authority managers should draw a distinction between the elderly and others who need care. I hope that the Minister will take note of that important paragraph. I have argued with my district health authority for many years I know that many hon. Members have done the same with theirs—because it has for various reasons shifted the problem of elderly sick people to the private sector. It is increasingly difficult for the relatives of the elderly sick to obtain even respite care in many hospitals when they themselves need a rest. The crisis has occurred because of the Government's policy—which, whether or not it was deliberate, has been disastrous, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) said. We have ended up in a mess.

The hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) attacked local authorities, but that will not wash. It is no good knocking local authorities—we have only to consider the figures to see the massive amount that has been removed from rate support grant while the number of elderly people has increased. If the local authorities had been given the money that has been poured into the private sector to be spent on domiciliary packages, more home helps, special care attendance and occupational budgets to provide aids and adaptations for people in their own homes, we could have saved the Government and the country millions of pounds. My local authority of Calderdale spent responsibly, and a Government Department patted it on the back, saying that it was the second most efficient metropolitan authority in the country.

I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield said that £1·7 billion has gone into the private sector in the current year. With that money, we could have provided what the people wanted and real choice. I imagine that, for 90 per cent. of the elderly sick, the choice would be to receive nursing home treatment under the national health service or the care packages which would enable them to stay in their own homes. If local authorities and councillors had wasted the money in the way that many of us believe the Government have done, they would have been surcharged and hounded out of office. It is a disgrace that Government Departments are not subjected to the same scrutiny and punishments.

I do not want to criticise those who provide private care, because I recognise that there is as much good care in the private sector as there is bad. However, I criticise the trend towards not having highly paid and experienced staff. Many of the private homes are pretty, Laura Ashley, chintzy places, but do they have rehabilitation programmes or free therapy for their residents? Do they have the orientation programmes which I have seen in many of the local authority homes that I have visited in my constituency?

The crux of the report is funding, and the growing gap between income support and what it now costs to keep people in either nursing homes or elderly residential homes. The growing gap now means that the elderly people or their relatives must find that difference. When the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe), was in a less exalted position, I remember listening to her make a clear and, I thought, slightly emotional but honest contribution to a debate in the House. She talked about Florence Smith, an elderly constituent of hers, and how she was caught in such a gap.

Since she became Under-Secretary, I have written to the hon. Lady about such gaps experienced by many of my constituents. I am afraid that her reply was not as sympathetic as the contribution that she made as a Back Bencher when talking about Florence Smith. She also told me that there had been no evidence of evictions, but, however hon. Members interpret it, the evidence given to the Select Committee by Mr. Harris of the Association of Metropolitan Authorities was clear. He said:

"about 24 per cent. of our member authorities are saying to us that they have recorded instances of eviction."

Mr. David Shaw rose——

Mrs. Mahon: I shall finish this point, and then I shall give way.

A constituent of mine was on the verge of being evicted. Fortunately, her relatives were able to move her to another home which was cheaper: that is an increasingly common practice. Elderly residents are being downgraded and sometimes have to share rooms, and that situation will get worse. I am concerned that that will happen long before the community care changes come into force.

I want to draw the House's attention to recommendations (vii) and (viii), which are important. They deal with hospital discharge procedures and state that district health authorities should obey circulars. We need to know how the recommendations will apply in the new internal market for health care. We know that circulars that go to trusts are sent for the purpose of information, not action. If the recommendations are shortly to be accepted by the House, we want to know specifically whether the opted-out hospitals will be excused from obeying that recommendation. If so, there is not much point in us debating the issue. The report is excellent, and I hope that its recommendations will be carried out.

I finish where I started, by saying that the report confirms absolutely that there has been a wholesale privatisation of care for the sick and elderly. That is unfair, and it is also slightly sinister to say that, when somebody reaches a certain age, he can no longer receive care under the NHS. I welcome the fact that that has been exposed and, despite the amended paragraph 88, I welcome the recommendations as a whole.

6.36 pm

Mr. Michael J. Martin (Glasgow, Springburn): I shall be brief, as I understand that the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman and the Minister want to reply to the debate. I also wish to put on record my congratulations to the Select Committee and its Chairman for their hard work.

I hope that we never reach the position that I have sometimes, although not often, met in my constituency, when I have received a phone call from a private home to the effect that it could no longer keep a patient who had perhaps become doubly incontinent. If the relatives could not pick the patient up, he would be lodged in the casualty department of the local hospital. It is scandalous that elderly patients should be treated in that way.

I repeat what the hon. Member for Antrim, South (Mr. Forsythe) said about patients' private needs payments. It has been brought to my attention that that money, which patients regard as pocket money, is sometimes taken from them by private residential homes to be used as payment.

I take issue with some Conservative Members who spoke of second pensions solving the problems of the elderly in our communities. I ask them to visit some of the communities that I represent, from which industry has disappeared and in which it is not only the person approaching pensionable age who is unemployed and in receipt of social security benefit, but the caring young people in the family who want to do the best for their relatives. I do not see how those people can accrue a second pension. To get a second pension, a person needs a job, and the jobs are just not there.

I have no objection to private residential care for those who can afford it, but the Minister must admit that local authorities do an excellent job in terms of residential care and that there should be more local authority residential care places. The Minister must know that, when Conservative Members attack local authorities, they are attacking—sometimes unconsciously—dedicated men and women who have fought for years to get first-class old folk's homes.

If we mean business in looking after our elderly—and not just the elderly, as young and middle-aged people may be stroke victims or have other problems which mean that they need residential care—local authorities should be encouraged to build more places. I hope that the Minister will encourage local authorities which do an excellent job in terms of residential care.

Mr. Keith Bradley (Manchester, Withington): It gives me great pleasure to commend to the House the fourth report by the Select Committee on Social Security. It is a model of detail and clarity in reporting on private residential and nursing homes. It is of great credit to the Committee that it describes the situation so clearly and that it points out many of the problems that have come about as a result of Government policy towards private residential care over the past few years.

I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) for his kind comments in his introduction to the debate. No one has more expertise or knowledge of these matters, and it is to the credit of the House that he brings those qualities to bear in our debates. He has always been a source of inspiration to me and I hope that he will take it as a compliment when I say that, from the days when I was a student, he has been an inspiration to me.

I intend to reinforce and highlight some of the recommendations that have been mentioned in many thoughtful contributions this afternoon and I will pose a series of questions to the Minister, whom I welcome to her first estimates debate. I hope that, in the short time available, she will be able to answer those questions.

I support my hon. Friends the Members for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) and for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) in their general comments on the broad area of policy on residential and community care. Many people who care or who are cared for find it difficult to understand why they cannot get the resources for that care when such vast amounts go towards people who are in residential care. Such people have been disappointed, to say the least, that the Government postponed the community care programme by two years because they saw it as an opportunity for the balance of resources between residential care and community care to be readdressed. They also saw it as an opportunity to get the packages of care that they sought implemented as early as possible.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halifax made the point that the rundown of long-stay care for the elderly in our health service and the move towards the elderly having the opportunity to go only into private nursing care is to be deprecated. I am not in favour of long-term institutional care in hospitals, but the balance between the opportunity for decent health care for the elderly in our hospital services and the opportunity for other care has gone much too far. In my local hospital in Withington, the number of beds for the elderly has decreased in the past few years from 140 beds to barely 20.

I was informed today that elderly people who are trying to get into hospital are being put on to wards in which the nursing staff have not been designated specifically for the care of the elderly. They are put into such wards because there are not sufficient resources in the health service to open up other wards that have been closed because of the general lack of resources in the health service. We must consider clearly the balance between health care provision in the national health service and health care provision in private nursing homes.

We must also examine the way in which the run-down of resources through personal social services and housing, as my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield pointed out, has led to local authorities having to suspend many innovations. Cities such as Sheffield and Manchester have been at the forefront of examining alternatives to residential health care to ensure that people can live happily in the community. I commend the programme of the development of elderly persons' resource centres in those cities.

In Withington, we have such a centre, which provides domiciliary care, meals, laundry services, recreation services, shopping facilities and companionship. The people who attend those centres can still live in their own homes because of the support staff who work from those resource centres. The number of people in the catchment area of the resource centre who now seek residential care has dropped dramatically. Few now seek residential care because of that support in the community.

I hope that the Government willl re-examine the funding of such developments in local authorities in conjunction with their community care programme so that local authorities and others can again consider a flexible response to ensure that we do not only seek residential care, but that we look forward to proper community care and support in the home.

My hon. Friends have highlighted some of the report's recommendations. The report is clear that there is substantial evidence from many organisations such as the citizen's advice bureaux, the Association of Metropolitan Authorities, Mencap and MIND—the National Association for Mental Health—that the level of income support does not match the costs in private residential care and that there is a threat, although Conservative Members may doubt it. People in such homes are anxious that, because of the gap between income support and charges, there is a threat of eviction. Indeed, there are cases of eviction. They may be few and far between, but they cause worry to elderly people who fear that the gap may lead to them being put in the same position.

An AMA survey in September 1990 showed that 24 per cent. of local authorities gave evidence of evictions. It is a particular problem in the south-east, where there are escalating costs. There have been examples in local councils in the south-east—Hertfordshire springs to mind—of evictions taking place. We must study the gap closely and we must realise that, in many of the homes that have come on to the market, on which there has been significant capital outlay by people moving into the private sector, the costs have escalated because of the massive increase in interest rates. Those costs have been passed on to the residents, so the gap has widened.

We have heard today that the gap has had to be filled by resources from relatives, from charitable organisations and, most appalling, from the meagre personal allowance available to people in residential homes. They cannot then use that small amount for the few personal items that they may want to buy when they are in residential homes. We must ensure that the gap does not lead to anxiety about possible eviction. We must also ensure that the escalation of costs does not lead to elderly people having to move from a single-bedded room to shared accommodation, which would be a lowering of standards in their residential home—and it is their home. We must ensure that those problems in the south-east are addressed.

I support the recommendation—I hope that the Under-Secretary will do likewise—that the extra allowance that is given in the Greater London area should be extended to out-of-area boroughs that have similar high charges. Her Department should act on the recommendation that local officers should be able to top up that gap for claimants if no other resources are available. There should be local flexibility through income support benefits to meet the different charges around the country.

I also support the suggestion that has been made by the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux about housing benefit continuing to be paid until the new system commences in 1993. I am pleased to see the Secretary of State for Social Security in his place, because he has said that the decision in January 1991 to stop such payments was taken because "It has never been the intention, nor is it sensible, that in the generality of cases Housing Benefit should be available as an alternative to income support".

After 1993, the finance to meet the charges will come from income support, housing benefit and local authority community care budgets. Therefore, would it not be sensible to reintroduce the housing benefit element now to ensure that that gap can be met?

I strongly urge the Under-Secretary to look closely at the recommendation that the personal allowance should not be used as a contribution to bridge the gap between the charges and the benefits. The personal allowance must be ring-fenced to ensure that people in residential care can have a small amount of money for their personal needs.

Several hon. Members have highlighted the position of carers who may be disadvantaged because of the capital rules on income support. Their position was well summed up by the Carers National Association, which has stated that the current rules could have "disastrous consequences" for the family and friends of the claimant who may have moved into the home to take on the caring responsibilities. We must not do anything to discourage people from taking on that caring role. People often give up their own home to move into the home of the person for whom they will be caring but may lose that home as a result of the income support capital rules.

Although a spouse may be protected if he or she stays in the home, if the partner goes into permanent residential care, the spouse may want to move into smaller and more appropriate accommodation. In that case, the spouse must forgo 50 per cent. of the proceeds of the sale of the property, which means that his or her opportunity to purchase something more appropriate is diminished. I urge the Minister to comment on that and to look at the way in which capital is treated for income support purposes to ensure that such disadvantages do not continue.

Perhaps the most crucial recommendation is that relating to the funding that will be available for community care after April 1993. The report highlights three issues: the amount of money to be transferred from the budget of the Department of Social Security; the way in which housing benefit will be calculated after 1993; and the division of responsibility between the health authorities and the local social service departments.

The first issue is the amount of money that will be transferred in income support from the social security budget into the community care budget. The Association of Metropolitan Authorities estimated in its evidence to the Committee that there would be a £300 million shortfall in that provision. Although the Secretary of State questioned that figure in his evidence, he did not say what he believed the shortfall would be. However, there is irrefutable evidence that there will be a shortfall, and if we do not ensure that that gap is identified and ascertain where the resources to meet that gap will come from, not only will the people who are currently seeking community care be disadvantaged, but, more importantly, future generations who might seek care in the community will not receive the resources that at present they believe that they will get.

I should be grateful if the Under-Secretary could comment on the way in which housing benefit is calculated. I hope that the Government do not intend to set a national figure that will apply throughout the country. Without regional and local variations, a further gap will be created. We must ensure that there is local flexibility when assessing housing benefit so that it is sufficient to meet the charges that are imposed locally and to ensure that the gap does not widen.

We must also ensure that the Department of Social Security and of Health reach a clear understanding about the way in which the community care system will operate in future. From my reading of the evidence, it appears that there is a certain amount of buck-passing between the Ministers in the two Departments about who will identify the gap, where the resources will come from and who will come clean about the budget that will be set for community care provision. The local authorities need to know now how the standard spending assessments will be calculated so that they can make definite financial plans. Such planning is crucial if our hopes for community care are to be realised after 1993. The local authorities need to know where the resources will come from and how they will be allocated between the different areas of the country.

I end with some final thoughts for the Under-Secretary. Many questions have been posed and many recommendations highlighted in this debate. The Opposition commend them all, and I hope that the Minister will say that she will implement them. More crucially, however, will she tell the House how the Government will meet the identified shortfall in community care funding? If they do not meet that shortfall, there will be a sorry start to the future system of community care.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Miss Ann Widdecombe): I begin by joining in the congratulations paid by hon. Members of all parties to the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Field) on the production of an excellent report, and to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton) who chaired the Select Committee on Health, which was also involved.

I welcome the hon. Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) to the Opposition Front Bench and look forward to many a debate with him. I look forward especially to a future opportunity to develop his views on the desirability of keeping national insurance contributions as low as possible and of working out exactly how that fits in with the policies of some of his right hon. and hon. Friends, but that is for another occasion, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Before turning to the detail of the debate, my hon. Friend the Minister of State for Health, who has been present for most of the debate, has asked me to apologise to the House on her behalf for the fact that she could not stay throughout.

The hon. Members for Birkenhead and for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) and my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield referred to my part in the events of 1990. It could scarcely be more vivid in their memories than it is in mine, but what is also vivid in my memory is the aftermath of those events, which was the Government's sensible accommodation of the fears and anxieties that had been expressed.

I refer not only to the substantial amount of money that was made available, resulting in a £45 per week rise for nursing homes, which cost us a total of £225 million, but to the amendment that allowed the Secretary of State, after community care had been in place for some time, to take account of the local authorities' assessments of reasonable rates and of their experiences in general. I will not say that much of this debate has been irrelevant, because that sounds as if I am dismissing what has been said, which I am not, but it is irrelevant in the context of 1993, because the advent of the new system will answer many of the problems that have been identified.

The fact that we can examine what local authorities are doing has been comprehensively ignored, yet it could have an effect on many of the points that were raise.

The hon. Members for Birkenhead and for Withington raised the problem of evictions. They seemed to be selective in the evidence that they quoted. I was particularly surprised to hear the hon. Member for Withington home in on Hertfordshire, because, among those giving evidence to the Select Committee was a Mr. Herbert Laming, the director of social services in Hertfordshire. He said:

"there is no statistical evidence that is known to me at the present time . . . of people who are actually being discharged from the private sector . . . We do not have evidence . . . to bring to you . . . of a substantial number of people who have been discharged against their will from the private sector."

We must take into account that evidence, as well as the other evidence, which seems to point the other way but has not been statistically upheld and has never been put before us in any form that we could check or examine.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Will the Minister accept that I have an example? A private care home in my constituency accepted an elderly lady for respite care. Her son and daughter who cared for her were going abroad for a fortnight's holiday. After a period, the home evicted the woman, put her in a taxi and sent her to the local police station. Is that an eviction? Is that responsible behaviour by the private sector? Does the Minister accept such behaviour? It is happening elsewhere to my knowledge. It is not merely anecdotal evidence. There is clear evidence.

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Gentleman said that it was happening elsewhere to his knowledge. Perhaps he could produce chapter and verse evidence of such incidents.

Mr. Hinchliffe rose——

Miss Widdecombe: May I finish, please?

If the hon. Gentleman sends the evidence, we will examine it to see what happened in that case, and whether it is evidence of a larger problem. There will always be homes, local authority as well as private sector, which do not always behave as well as they should within the rules. That is not evidence of a general trend. The hon. Gentleman has not produced evidence of a general trend.

The problem of carers was sensibly raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst (Mr. Sims) and by several other hon. Members, including the hon. Members for Withington and for Birkenhead. We already make exceptions to the capital rule where homes are occupied by a spouse, a relative over the age of 60 or a relative who is incapacitated. We have considered whether any further easement is possible. Although I cannot give the House any good news on that score tonight, I can say that we are considering the matter.

We have to consider factors other than merely resources. Opposition Members seemed to suggest that the hold-up was resources, but there are other factors, not least the fact, that, if we needed primary legislation, it would come on stream in about 1993, when the responsibility for assessment and the decision about what to pay passes to local authorities. No new cases would come on stream for us to deal with. There seems to be a slight practical difficulty there.

Furthermore, we would have to devise fairly tight rules. Yes, the cases quoted are clear ones, in which carers have been in the home for a long time, but obviously we would wish to avoid a position in which the carer was in the home for a short time in the expectation that he or she would then be allowed to stay there. All those factors are being taken on board.

The hon. Member for Antrim, South (Mr. Forsythe) raised the problem of the personal allowance, as did several hon. Members. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State alluded to the problem when he was giving evidence to the Select Committee. It is my understanding that, after 1993, the personal allowances will have to be given to the individual, but we have a problem. The personal allowance belongs to the individual. It is for the individual to do what he or she likes with it. We cannot forbid individuals to use that allowance in whole or in part to pay fees for their care. So that is another problem. Opposition Members want us to forbid the use of that personal allowance, if only in part, for a particular purpose.

My hon. Friend the Member for Chislehurst said that, on Ministers' own admission, we no longer paid the full rate of fees. That is not true. We have said that we have never been committed—it is not something new—to paying the full fees, however high. In many instances, the income support rates cover the fees.

Mr. Frank Field: The Minister asked my hon. Friend the Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) to give her more evidence of evictions. May we ask her for evidence? History seems to be being rewritten. Could she give us just a handful of examples of people who were moved from geriatric beds into the private sector in the early stages of the development of the policy and were given the assurance that she says was publicly given that the Government had no intention of meeting fees, however high? Is not the truth that practically everyone was told, "Don't worry—social security is picking up the bill."

Miss Widdecombe: Social security has always been committed to meeting a reasonable rate. The hon. Gentleman has acknowledged, indeed it is in his report, that, by simply increasing the income support rate, all that we do is cause the fees to rise behind it. That point has been made consistently. That is the point that we have addressed in saying that we will not meet fees, however high. I do not believe that we ever said to anyone in geriatric care or anyone who entered a home for any other reason, "Don't worry—social security will pick up the bill, however reasonable or however high." The hon. Gentleman challenged me, but I challenge the hon. Gentleman to provide the examples of where we said that.

The hon. Member for Wakefield (Mr. Hinchliffe) made an interesting speech. He seemed to suggest that the problems with the policy had largely been caused by the Government withdrawing funding from local government for domiciliary and other services, thus forcing people into residential care. I do not know how he reconciles that with the 59 per cent. increase in spending on local authority care services since 1979.

The hon. Member for Wakefield said that he did not like private institutional care. May I draw his attention to comments in the recent issue of "Community Care" by the hon. Member for Birmingham, Perry Barr (Mr. Rooker) The hon. Member for Perry Barr is not an apologist for the Government, but he said that the Labour party was committed to a mixed economy. I welcome his commitment. That also means a commitment to private residential care as much as to local authority residential care.

Mr. Hinchliffe rose——

Miss Widdecombe: I would like to make progress, because the hon. Member for Birkenhead wishes to reply to the debate.

Mr. Hinchliffe: Will the Minister give way?

Miss Widdecombe: For the last time.

Mr. Hinchliffe: I said that I did not like institutional care, whether private or public. We have more of it in Britain than in any other country in Europe, and it is wrong.

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Gentleman said that private residential care was effectively institutional care, and went on to say that he did not like institutional care. By the application of simple logic, anyone can work out that that means that he does not like private residential care.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Bellotti) was the only hon. Member to refer to recommendation (ix). I shall turn to the other recommendations in a moment. Recommendation (ix) calls upon local offices and the Department of Social Security to give higher priority to those entering residential care to to make sure that their claims for income support are processed in good time so that people do not have weeks of worry or possibly weeks in a home without paying.

I was grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising that, because it is not often realised that such claims can be made up to three months before the person enters care, although I am aware that the circumstances do not always allow that. Few people enter care on the spur of the moment as a result of a catastrophe. For most people, it is a planned exercise. Therefore, I welcome the opportunity to exhort people who are considering the option of residential care to make inquiries as early as possible with the social security department.

Of course, there are national targets for all categories of claim. The target for income support is five days. Obviously, there will be difficult cases, especially where there is perhaps a house or capital to be considered. However, we will take on board the recommendation and try to ensure that people are not kept waiting on any appreciable scale. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Eastbourne for raising the matter.

The hon. Member for Eastbourne also quoted a Price Waterhouse survey at some length, and referred to shortfall between what we pay and the fees charged. If I heard him correctly, and I thought so, judging by the figures that he was quoting it must have been a more recent Price Waterhouse survey, not the original. The more recent survey was based on an example of 85 homes. We based ours on an example of more than 700. Therefore, statistically, one should take the results of the first survey, and we based our rates of income support on its median rates.

I shall now deal with the rest of the recommendations which have attracted debate in turn. The comments on recommendations which relate to the responsibilities of my hon. Friend the Minister for Health will be passed to her for examination.

Two major recommendations in the report have attracted most publicity. The first is top-up payments, which the hon. Member for Birkenhead recommends should be made by local offices; the second is the reintroduction of housing benefit. I shall deal with the second recommendation first, because it is based upon a complete misunderstanding.

Housing benefit was never payable in addition to income support, but was used in place of it by people who would not have qualified for income support, such as people living in a room run by a close relative, the long-term disabled and various other categories of people under pensionable age who were not eligible. They were protected when the change was made. However, we were not keen for housing benefit to be used in place of housing support for care, which is properly the provision of income support.

The hon. Member for Birkenhead also misunderstood what will happen after 1993. Yes, housing benefit will be an element of the total package, but will not be for the whole cost of care and will not be wholly additional to current rates of care. It will be the rental element of the home, but there will still be a package. Housing benefit will not come in on top of the rates.

Mr. Frank Field: That is what we advocated.

Miss Widdecombe: The hon. Gentleman says that that is what he is advocating, and says that we should reintroduce it now for those who face a shortfall in fees, but it would not make up the shortfall, because it would be part of the reasonable rate of fees.

Mr. Field: It would be additional.

Miss Widdecombe: It would not be additional, I am afraid that the hon. Gentleman has not understood the working of housing benefit.

The remarks about top-up by local offices was also based on a misunderstanding. In his opening speech, the hon. Member for Birkenhead said that we should "bring forward" the arrangements which will prevail after 1993, but it will not be down to the local adjudication officer to assess people to decide the appropriate care and to assess the reasonable rate. The hon. Gentleman is proposing something entirely different, which would certainly be without the law, which is not an advance on 1993 and which is probably impossible. Local adjudication offices could not assess individuals and it would be difficult to decide why Mrs. Y should get a top-up but Mrs. X should not. That is simply meeting the fees, no matter how high, in a more disguised and reasonable form. It would work in exactly the same way as a general rise in rates.

The hon. Member for Halifax asked whether national health service trusts would be subject to the same guidance rules and discharge procedures. She is a victim of her own propaganda. NHS trusts are NHS trusts, so they are subject to NHS guidance after 1993.

Mrs. Mahon: We know that when NHS circulars are sent to trusts they are sent "for information", but that they are sent "for action" to directly managed units. I was asking about that.

Miss Widdecombe: On discharge procedures and the trusts having to take care—in exactly the same way as health authorities now have to take care—of those for whom they believe that care is appropriate, the same rules should apply.

In the last minutes of the debate—the hon. Member for Birkenhead need not worry; I am leaving him time within the advice that I have been given—I must mention the generality of the issues raised. Time and again we have heard tonight—especially from the hon. Member for Withington—about shortfall and about the measures that we should take to meet it. Throughout the debate, shortfall has been defined as the gap between fees charged by some homes and the maximum level of income support which we will pay for different categories of persons in those homes.

The crucial thing is that we are talking about fees charged by the homes, not about reasonable costs. We are talking not about reasonable fees, which have been independently assessed, but about a fee levied by a home. That is vastly different from saying that we should consider the shortfall between the fees and the costs incurred by the homes. The answer is that we do not intend to meet all that shortfall. We have never committed ourselves to meeting it, no matter how high the rate.

In the light of all the sedentary interruptions from the Opposition, I would be interested to hear whether those hon. Gentlemen intend—in the unlikely event that they ever change places with us—to meet that shortfall, no matter how high the fees.

The hon. Member for Wakefield said that under an incoming Labour Government local authorities would receive much more support. We cannot wait for a Labour Government. We have to act in 1993, and we shall do so. Unless Opposition Members are prepared to stand up and pledge that they will meet the costs of every private home, no matter how high and heavy, our proposals for 1993 will overtake most of their objections, and I am grateful to have had the opportunity to respond to the debate.

Mr. Frank Field: I am grateful to have the opportunity to respond to the debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The hon. Gentleman requires the leave of the House. Is that agreed?

Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Field: With the leave of the House, it remains for me only to thank the Select Committee on Energy for allowing us to hear the Government's reply. Even if the election is postponed until July, the Government will not be able to maintain the line that we have heard from the Dispatch Box.

The debate was concluded, and the Question necessary to dispose of the proceedings was deferred, pursuant to paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates).

Coal Industry

[Relevant documents: Fifth report from the Energy Committee of Session 1990-91 on Clean Coal Technology and the Coal Market after 1993 (House of Commons Paper No. 208) and the Government reply contained in the first special report from the Energy Committee of Session 1991-92 (House of Commons Paper No. 67).]

CLASS V, VOTE 9

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That a further sum not exceeding £4,000,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1992 for expenditure by the Department of Energy in connection with the privatisation of the coal industry.—[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory.]

7.17 pm

Dr. Michael Clark (Rochford): The Select Committee on Energy believes that we all want to get the best that we can from one of our big national resources—coal—and for that reason we have carried out an inquiry into clean coal technology and the future of coal after 1993. We are grateful for the opportunity of this Estimates Day debate to bring our report to the attention of the House.

Coal was the foundation of our industrial revolution and coal remained the lowest cost source of energy in this country until the long period of low oil prices in the 1960s. Then the coal industry, faced with tough competition for the first time, slimmed down, modernised, introduced new equipment and new working methods in a way that should be applauded because it did so at a time when the rest of British industry was resisting change. Coal, however, faced the challenge.

The coal industry certainly coped with contraction admirably on the first occasion. As a result, at the end of the 1960s it was in a much healthier and stronger condition, which would have been ideal to take advantage of the fivefold increase in oil prices in 1973. However, the industry then had the misfortune to suffer two of the most disruptive and damaging strikes in our history. The result was that, as a business, the coal industry did not progress, despite further major technical improvements and large investments. Its markets were sheltered by the high oil price in the heyday of the Organisation of Petroleum Exporting Countries cartel and to some extent the industry was cosseted by those high oil prices. Then there was the collapse of oil prices, followed consequentially by the collapse of world coal prices.

Since then, the industry has had to manage a second period of change much steeper than the first. That decline has again been managed remarkably well—indeed, better than any of us might have believed. For the second time in 25 years, something smaller but in every other way better has emerged. There may have been a vast reduction in employment but with the Government providing generous and substantial help, those who have gone from the industry have been properly provided for, while those who remained are better off, with high earnings, a safer environment and better equipment. The days lost by disputes are at a record low, and productivity is twice what it was five years ago. Of course, one has to commend the so-called super-pits for the way in which they can set European records, with outputs of some 30 tonnes per man shift.

Most politicians of all parties believe that, despite the many problems that the industry faces, British Coal can and should make a valuable long-term contribution to our energy economy, especially now that we face some decline in North sea oil and later some decline in gas. If it continues to perform as it has done over the past five years, British Coal has a major part to play for the benefit of us all.

The problems that we have to deal with come in part from coal's position right at the end of a series of privatisations. The commercial freedom given to British Coal's principal customers—the electricity generators—has had a negative knock-on effect on the coal industry, which has to compete with other fuels and with imported coal for its share of the market.

We must make a clear distinction between three different challenges. First, there are the challenges arising directly from the structure which has emerged from the privatisation of the energy industries to date, with the consequent changes in the marketplace which have produced greater competition for British Coal. Secondly, there are challenges and problems which come from the perceived need to clean up coal-fired generation. Thirdly, there is the greater availability of competitive fuels, such as gas which is used in high-efficiency combined cycle generators, and imported coal.

Let us consider price competition and market forces. There may be a case for easing the pain for British Coal by having to compete against world coal prices for a short while, but there is no case for the long-term ring fence accorded to the German and Spanish coal industries. Perhaps we need a European coal policy to get equality throughout the Community. To see the high cost coal elements preserved artificially in other countries within the Community, while at the same time our low-cost coal industry contracts, is economic folly—and no more so than when looking forward with all idealism to the spirit of 1992. If, as I am told, British Coal's anti-dumping case is technically sound, it should be investigated and not pushed aside simply because the Germans totally protect their coal industry.

Of course we are not immune to similar problems. We have to address our internal inefficiencies, the most striking of which is the protection of the nuclear industry and the way it benefits from subsidy. If we have to get rid of protection subsidies on coal, we should not perpetuate subsidies on any competing fuel.

Nuclear power must receive its proper credit for not contributing to greenhouse gases and acid rain emissions. It must be given the opportunity to develop as a future source of fuel for the next century, perhaps as an insurance policy. If we neglect coal and lose our coal resources and our ability to mine coal, we are more likely to need an insurance policy.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): I do not want to interrupt the flow of the hon. Gentleman's speech, but he has made pointed remarks about nuclear power. He was at the Nuclear Forum this year, and he probably heard the chairman of Scottish Nuclear say that he thought that there was a case for subsidising nuclear power in the interests of defence and strategic needs. Does the hon. Gentleman agree with that statement?

Dr. Clark: My view—I am not speaking for the Select Committee here—is that nuclear power is a power source which cannot be ignored and which should be developed, even if there is a cost. We need the insurance policy, but we shall need it more if we allow coal to run down. If we allow coal to take its natural course and if we develop more coal-fired power stations with clean coal technology, the need for the insurance policy will be less obvious. Perhaps then we could run down our nuclear industry.

If we continue saying that we shall become dependent on oil, most of which will be imported in 40 or 50 years, and on coal which may be imported because we have no indigenous source of supply, the only indigenous source of supply left will be nuclear. In those circumstances, perhaps we should subsidise it. There are ways around that. One is to let coal come back naturally into the marketplace. Then we would not need to do so much for nuclear power. I did not mind the interruption; it may have helped to put my argument across.

If we are to get rid of subsidies on nuclear generation, we must do so fairly quickly, because we need to know where the nuclear industry stands by 1994 when the Government review its future. If we can get a proper review of the nuclear industry clearly before the country, we shall know better where the coal industry will stand after 1994.

Clean coal technology was dealt with in the first part of the report. The need to clean up coal-fired generation is a problem, in that massive expenditure is required to retrofit existing power stations to take out sulphur dioxide and stop acid rain emissions. Massive expenditure will be required on all existing coal-fired power stations, but the wise and economically sound solution is to build new clean burn coal-fired power stations which, due to their high thermal efficiency, create an opportunity for coal to compete more effectively with the gas-fired combined cycle generators which seem to be so much in vogue.

Clean coal technology cannot reduce the price of indigenous coal, but it can increase thermal efficiency so that coal in general, from wherever it comes, can better compete with gas. Clean coal technology can make a major contribution to solving the problem of carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide emissions, because there will be less emission per megawatt of electricity generated. Clean coal technology can also help to increase demand for coal, even imported coal, thus helping our indigenous coal industry to expand in an energy market which accepts that coal is clean and economical.

In July 1991, the Select Committee that I have the honour to chair concluded that it attached great importance to clean coal technology, both in terms of providing an energy source and an electricity source for the country, and also in terms of the future of the coal industry. The Department of Energy said in evidence that it recognised the United Kingdom

"as an acknowledged leader in development of some aspects" of clean coal technology which has a research and development objective

"to support work which would not otherwise be undertaken on an appropriate timescale".

The Department of Energy still refuses to give even modest help to demonstration projects. However, the Secretary of States has said that it is "self-evident that there is a very big demand for clean coal technology."

In the Select Committee report, we recommended that a credible long-term strategy should include certain elements. First, there should be a new sense of urgency, which recognises that the United Kingdom's competitors are making progress with clean coal technologies in the expectation of obtaining significant export markets. If we do not go ahead urgently and make some progress with such technology, in due course we shall have to import it.

Secondly, we should recognise that the United Kingdom is unlikely to succeed with clean coal technologies unless the Government are as supportive towards such technologies as are our competitors' Governments. In fairness, I acknowledge that the Department of Energy has given encouragement and funding to the project at Grimethorpe. However, that funding falls short of what is needed by that project. It also falls short of the funding that has been given to similar pilot plant processes in other countries. I hope that the Minister will address that when he replies.

Thirdly, new emphasis should be placed on demonstration projects, which go one stage further than pilot plants. That would require a significant increase in Government funding to ensure that the necessary resources are available to push the development of such technology forward towards commercial use.

There have been plans for a demonstration project at Bilsthorpe, but those plans are now on the back burner and the project may never materialise. However, I heard just a few days ago that a demonstration project is to go ahead at Gardanne in France. Well done, Gardanne, but it would be nice if we could have a demonstration project as well, so that, in due course, we do not have to import such technology from the other side of the Channel.

Mr. Rhodri Morgan (Cardiff, West): They are discussing that at Maastricht right now.

Dr. Clark: Perhaps, but I suspect that it will be low on that agenda.

Fourthly, there should be a realistic appraisal of the extent to which each stage of research, development and demonstration projects can expect to attract industry funding. The Government are rightly keen to get industry to fund such projects, particularly demonstration projects. Certainly, industry funding would be the most admirable way in which to make those projects work as well as a commitment to build those projects and to recoup the investment. The Government should encourage industry to make such investment, and perhaps they should also match some of the funding for the research, development and demonstration projects.

It is not yet known when the Government will reveal their strategy in response to our report or in response to the report from their own coal task force. That strategy may not be announced until after the election or until the plans for privatisation of the coal industry are announced, but the impact and importance of that strategy, when it is known, cannot be underestimated. That strategy will ultimately determine the final size of the British coal industry, it will influence electricity prices and it will have a significant effect on environmental protection.

In conclusion, the United Kingdom of the 1990s and beyond will be very different from that of the 1980s, which was overflowing with energy riches. Let no one think that it does not matter if we let British coal resources remain unexploited. It would be most ironic if the country's largest fuel reserves disappeared at the very moment when the combined cycle might be readily available for coal-fired generation.

It would be ironic if we lost the ability to produce coal in this country at a time when the world was turning towards it and when, at the beginning of the next century, there might be a revitalisation of the coal industry. If that happened, our coal industry would be in danger of being unable to follow the rest of the world because we had allowed it to become too small and to decline too far. That would be to the detriment of us all.

Mr. Alan Meale (Mansfield): It is extremely kind of you, Madam Deputy Speaker, to call me so early in this debate. That does not usually happen to me.

I am pleased to follow the hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark), who made a remarkable speech. He examined many aspects of the coal industry, and some of his findings were forthright and honest. In particular, he identified the fact that the Government have shifted their energy policy away from the coal industry. Unless something is done about that, the nation will lose an important asset.

It is important to consider what has caused the Government to shift their support from the coal industry. Therefore, it is important to consider recent events in the coal industry. If one considers the past 12, or should I say unlucky 13, years of Conservative Administration, it is clear that there has been a policy shift away from the coal industry. That industry is having to pay for that today.

The conclusion of the Select Committee on Energy report calls for measures to ensure the future security of the coal mining industry. I must remind the House that those who work in that industry have always faced insecurity. Rumours abound about possible Government action after the next election. Hon. Members are aware that the Government never have tried to hide the fact that, if elected, they will introduce a Bill to privatise the coal industry. That Bill would hardly make those in the industry feel secure.

Recent leaked reports—they have been disowned, in common with others—reveal what will happen to the coal industry. Those reports have been commissioned at a great price by the Government. One such report recently predicted the devastation of the coal mining industry and predicted a further massive reduction in the number of coal mines. That is hardly designed to make miners feel secure. The Rothschild report predicted that, at best, there would be 14 pits left in Britain and, at worst, only 12. That was devastating news for the coal industry, and it has caused immense insecurity.

It is important to consider what has happened to the coal mining industry in recent years—an industry that formed the backbone of British industrial production for decades. That industry has suffered the loss of 180,000 direct jobs, together with the loss of hundreds of thousands of associated jobs from our coalfield communities.

We in Nottinghamshire have suffered the loss of 25,000 jobs in coal mining, with the loss of 4,000 ancillary jobs. In other words, we have lost about 29,000 jobs in eight or nine years. In that area, the capital of the coal mining industry, 80,000 further jobs have been lost in service and other industries that supported or were reliant on coal. Well in excess of 100,000 jobs, representing absolute devastation, have gone from Nottinghamshire.

The action and planning that have resulted in that degree of loss have not helped to create security in coal mining. Not only do those still working in the industry feel insecure, but the threat of Rothschilds or something similar hanging over their future makes them feel terrified.

I know that the hon. Member for Rochford appreciates the plight of those in the industry, because his home is in the area and he has connections with the county of Nottinghamshire. I am anxious to remind hon. Members who are not familiar with coal mining about the situation in Nottinghamshire, because it is not dissimilar to what is happening in other coalfield communities.

Nottingham is a new coalfield compared with many others. People working there originated in Scotland, the north-east, Lancashire, Yorkshire, Wales and Kent. Many of them arrived in Nottinghamshire as their second or third move from other coal-mining areas. Some had moved from Scotland to the north-east, on to Yorkshire, on to Nottinghamshire or Derbyshire and then even further afield. It is incredible to think that that has happened within a few short years. Many families in my constituency have had to move more than once or twice in that way.

Many of my constituents who are anxious to live and work in the area are being denied the opportunity to do so by the insecurity that is being forced on them. I know many men who are working in their fourth or fifth pit in the Nottinghamshire coalfield because of the rate of close-down elsewhere in the country.

With the demise of 25,000 jobs in Nottinghamshire, we are left with only 14,000 miners—in a part of the industry that was described only a few years ago as the king, the capital of the British coal mining industry. The Government should put an end to policies which create that degree of uncertainty, and I am grateful for the recommendations of the Select Committee on that score.

We cannot consider the future of British coal mining without taking account of the Government's attitude to imported coal. In the past, some Conservative Members have argued that imported coal is important for the continuation of deep-mined coal in the British coalfield. That is absolute nonsense: it is a smokescreen for Conservative policies towards the industry.

I remind the House of the long battles that took place against the imposition of private ports designed to cater for imported coal from, for example, Australia, Poland, China and Colombia. Much of it was blood coal, extracted at low labour cost, shipped to Europe, mixed with other coals elsewhere in Europe and then imported into Britain. We fought long battles in this Chamber over Immingham and Killingholme to try to stop the building of ports, the main activity of which was the importation of cheap foreign coal. Indeed, I recall a chairman of the then CEGB admitting, on being questioned, that up to 8 million tonnes of cheap foreign coal would be imported via those ports.

Conservative Members also argue that we cannot have a European coal policy. They go so far as to say that such a policy would be illegal. That, too, is absolute nonsense. We could get our act together for the benefit of the British coalfields, because we produce the cheapest deep-mined coal in Europe. We shall soon have a Labour Government, but whatever the complexion of the British Government, hon. Members in all parts of the House should get them to get our act together and achieve a Europewide policy.

Conservative Members argue that GATT prevents us from restricting imports from areas outside the European Community into Britain. They claim that such action would be illegal. We should tell the other Governments in Brussels that we welcome aspects of the social charter and want them applied to trade agreements with countries outside the European Community. Then, the miners in those countries, including children—in Colombia, South Africa, China and so on—would work under a law approved by the EC. That would enable them to benefit from that social charter when digging coal in their countries. On that basis, coal could be landed in Europe only if it had been mined in accordance with that law.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): My hon. Friend will know that we have been in the Common Market for 18 years and that for all that time the member countries have not bought our coal. We hear lots of talk about our colleagues in the EC and about how we are all working together. We buy their goods, manufactured and otherwise, and although we have the cheapest deep-mined coal in Europe, our so-called colleagues never buy our coal. One would think that, after 18 years, they would be buying some by now. That prevents me from going down the EC road which my hon. Friend seems to be taking. Is he suggesting that we get deeper into the EC web, when the countries of Europe are not delivering——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I suggest that we return to the subject of the report that is before the House.

Mr. Meale: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that intervention, because he and I have been, and remain, close on European matters. My argument is that, as we are in the EC, like it or not, we should try to establish with our European partners a common policy for coal, including cheap international imported coal.

I appreciate the point that my hon. Friend makes. He too spent many long hours in the Chamber campaigning against private ports being used to import cheap coal. For example, South Africa coal was shipped to some of our partners, notably Holland and Belgium, mixed with cheap coal there and then sold on to Britain as European coal. That cannot be a common European coal policy. Instead, we must try to get our act together to ensure that the coal industry is supported.

I thank the hon. Member for Rochford for some of his comments. I welcome the report, which starts to put some of the arguments together. I hope that it will make hon. Members, wherever they stand, realise that coal is one of this country's major assets for the future. I hope to God that we shall not throw it away.

Mr. Peter Rost (Erewash): I entirely agree with the hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) that the coal industry and its future should have a European dimension. We should recognise that, in so far as we have a European Community energy policy, the European Community as a whole should take a view on how far we can allow our major indigenous energy source to run down.

May I offer an additional solution to this major problem? In their reply to the report of the Energy Select Committee, the Government said that a strong market will develop for key coal technology at the end of the decade. I am sure that that is right, but I am concerned about whether we shall still have much of a coal industry left at the end of the decade if we wait until then. That is why I shall consider the problem from a shorter-term perspective. My solution could help to get the coal industry out of its present dilemma and allow it to survive long enough to meet demands for energy at the turn of the century.

We all know that British Coal is fighting to retain its market. It is threatened by cheaper imported coal and, above all, by gas, which is the flavour of the month for combined cycle gas turbines. Furthermore, environmental pressures to develop cleaner energy are imposed on us by the European Community and the Toronto protocol.

Against that background, it is not surprising that we are now undertaking a huge investment in gas turbine power generation. I have just been involved in a working party with a number of experts, including representatives from the National Union of Mineworkers, British Coal, the power generators and industry. We are producing a report trying to assess what the market for coal will be—a second guess to the Rothschild report. Our best estimate is that we have at present 6·5 GW of combined cycle plant under construction or firmly committed, with probably another 10 GW likely to go ahead, which in total will almost certainly replace some 30 million tonnes of coal. That is the dilemma.

Although new combined cycle gas turbines offer cheaper electricity than new coal-fired plant, they do not compete with existing coal capacity. Electricity from existing coal-fired power stations underprices electricity from the new combined cycle gas turbines. There is plenty of evidence of that, for those who want to find it. The evidence comes from PowerGen and National Power, which have admitted that they are pushing up the price of electricity in the pool to justify the cost of new investment in combined cycle gas turbines. We know that environmental considerations are an additional reason. The power generation industry has rightly been told that it must reduce emissions over a period of years.

Those are not the only reasons why we are developing so many combined cycle gas turbines. Such development is not justified on economic grounds, because it is leading to the premature closure of coal-fired power stations that could still compete in the electricity market. National Power has admitted that it has already closed down 3 GW —3,000 MW—of coal-fired plant in the past two years, PowerGen has closed down about seven of its coal-fired power stations, and both companies propose to close more. I challenge the suggestion that all those power stations are uneconomic, as both generators maintain.

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I have heard those arguments directly from one of the big generators that he mentioned. Does that not run contrary to the ideology behind the privatisation of the electricity supply industry—that new competition would force down prices?

Mr. Rost: I shall come to the question of competition. I do not accept the manner in which the hon. Gentleman puts his case. I shall argue that we do not have proper competition. If we had, we would not be closing down so many coal-fired power stations. They are being closed down because there is a duopoly rather than a series of competitive producers. The duopoly is more than anxious to get rid of excess capacity, some of which could compete in the marketplace.

In order to get rid of excess capacity, an artificial scarcity in electricity is being created, so that the duopoly can justify its huge investment in new combined cycle gas turbines. Some of the existing coal-fired plant that is being closed produces electricity at the marginal cost of some 2p per kilowatt hour. New combined cycle gas turbine plants cannot produce electricity at that price—it costs 2·5p to 3p, depending on the gas contract. Some of the new gas turbine plant that is about to be ordered has yet to obtain a long-term gas contract. I should be surprised if the cost of that were not at least 3p per kilowatt hour. Much of our existing coal fired plant underprices that.

If I am wrong, let us put it to the test. The coal-fired plants which the duopoly is closing down, has already closed down or proposes to close down because they are supposedly uneconomic, should be offered for sale to others who think that the duopoly may have got it wrong. They should be offered to a wider range of independents, or perhaps to the regional electricity companies or British Coal.

I presume that, if they are of no interest to National Power of PowerGen, their only value is the site or scrap value, so it would not cost much if anyone else wished to prove that they could still bid into the electricity market at a competitive price. I suspect that many of them could. Some of them could be and would be refurbished as clean coal-burning fluidised bed combustion plants, as is already happening at the Slough estates and as some of the regional electricity companies wish to do. That would also meet the emission standards, and produce a higher thermal efficiency.

If that competitive opportunity is denied by the duopoly, and the market for British coal is thus restricted and contracted, British Coal will be unfairly penalised in the market. I go further, and suggest that British Coal should be allowed to compete fairly in the new, privatised energy market. British Coal should have the same opportunity to invest in power generation as its main competitior, British Gas, which is using its fuel to compete in power generation. Why should not British Coal use its coal for the same reason?

British Coal should now—before privatisation, or it may be too late—be given sanction to raise money that it requires for commercial decision taking by its shareholder the Government. If not, it should be free to raise funds in the financial markets, as do privatised industry and its competitors in the energy market. That would enable it to make viable decisions to enter the power generation business, perhaps in a joint venture. After all, British Coal has competent directors and management to make such decisions.

Given such a level playing field of opportunity to compete, I suspect that British Coal would look for joint ventures with independent power generators or regional electricity companies in order to prove that some of the coal-fired plants that PowerGen and National Power claim are uneconomic could compete in the electricity market. If British Coal were privatised, I believe that it would now be doing just that. I have no doubt that British Coal would have taken a more active commercial step to protect its market, as any industry does if it sees its market collapsing around it.

However, we know that British Coal has been restrained by its shareholder and the Treasury from investing or diversifying in power generation. I believe that British Coal, under privatised management—which should have happened many years ago—would be taking on the duopoly power generators. I believe that it would be saying to them, "All right, you do not want to buy our coal, so we will use it ourselves and show that we can compete with you." My theory should be put to the test in order to prove whether existing British Coal and British power stations fuelled by coal can compete with the new combined cycle gas turbine power stations. I believe that they could.

British Gas and the oil industry are already entering the power generation market. Industry is also doing so, through combined heat and power. In addition, regional electricity companies are competing in power generation. Why should not the nation's leading producer of fuel for generation also have the freedom to do so, especially when its future is being undermined by its competitors and it is unable to compete fairly because its hands are tied behind its back?

If the Government want a successful privatised British coal industry, which I am sure they do, would it not be a great deal easier to privatise British Coal as a stronger commercial asset, which would make it more attractive to potential buyers, if it were involved in some profitable power generation and had thus secured some of its own coal markets? British Coal's freedom to move into power generation by taking over power stations that National Power and PowerGen had rejected and by using its own coal would also help to build up competition in the electricity market which does not currently exist. That point relates to the issue raised by the hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron).

The competition does not presently exist, because the duopoly is, to some extent, abusing the system. It has all the power plants at present, although, in due course, independent plants will come in at the margins. At present, the duopoly is getting rid of excess capacity, even though some of it could still be competing, which is restricting competition.

If the Government want to help the competitive power market, they have an opportunity to allow a new player into the power generation market: British Coal. That would not only provide competition but would make British Coal a more attractive proposition for privatisation and, above all, would give British Coal a life saver in the transition period between now and the turn of the century, when, hopefully, the new clean coal technologies will come to its rescue.

I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will at least consider my argument reasonable and worth some consideration. I hope that he thinks that my proposals go some way to finding a solution to the difficult transition period now facing British Coal.

I believe that the energy balance—the economics of energy—will change in years to come as gas prices begin to rise because of the extreme pressure of demand throughout Europe. I believe that the balance will begin to change back in favour of coal, which will make the clean coal technologies the investment choice by the turn of the century. I hope that, by that time, our coal industry is still able to participate.

8.7 pm

Mr. Terry Patchett (Barnsley, East): I am grateful to have caught your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker, but I shall be brief, as I know many of my colleagues who wish to speak have a genuine interest in the coal industry. I am fortunate in that my constituency still contains the semblance of a coal industry, albeit its manpower is less than a third of what it was in 1985.

I find it difficult to speak in this debate, given that its subject is the future of the coal industry. I believe that both parties in any debate should have a genuine interest in the subject, and be open and honest. The Government, on their past record, do not meet any of those criteria. They have always stated that British Coal should take its chance in a fair and free market, but they suported private Bills —for example, the one that is now the Associated British Ports Act 1990—which helped British Coal's rivals. They have used the British coal industry to pursue Tory dogma. They initiated an unnecessary year-long strike which cost the taxpayer £5 billion. They did so just to make the trade unions look bad, ably assisted by their friends in the press. That did no good and had nothing to do with the industry.

The Government's friends in the press vilified, and attempted a character assassination of, a trade union leader whose heart and soul was genuinely in the industry —Arthur Scargill. His only crime was to speak the truth about the Government's pit closure programme. In this very Chamber, he was called a scaremonger and a liar. Ministers, including the then Prime Minister, told the House that they had no such programme, but history proved who was telling the truth.

If the Government are really interested in British Coal, they should take an interest in the health and safety of its workers, yet they have proceeded to deregulate health and safety. I refer to certain types of support systems and the number of hours worked in a shift. I have been involved, and I know the inherent dangers. This dangerous move displays a callous indifference to the work force, but it fits in well with the former Prime Minister's love of Victorian values. Hers was an era that cared little for the life and limb of the work force.

If the Government really care about free and fair market forces with no Government interference, why have they allowed more private mines? Why have they assisted opencast mining by relaxing planning controls and allowing the rape of our countryside unnecessarily? We can well do without opencast coal, yet the Government have interfered and helped rivals of British Coal.

I am satisfied that only the Opposition have adopted an open and honest approach to the industry. I know that the Rothschild report will be mentioned often in this debate, so I will not dwell on it, but I am worried about one or two of its aspects. For instance, why was there a need to commission the report when the way in which the generating industry is moving shows that the Government are implementing Rothschild's recommendations in advance? The Government have been moving in that direction for many years, so why spend taxpayers' money on a report that changes nothing and merely supports the Government's political ideology?

The report does not mention any effect on our balance of payments. It is typical of the Government to pursue the dogma of privatising coal without a thought for the economic consequences of that decision. Social consequences are never mentioned in the report, yet we all know of the traumatic problems brought about by the lack of tax revenue and the increases in unemployment payouts—these are the social costs. We are talking about social costs and human problems, not exclusively about profits.

The Government have clearly shown their interest in the coal industry by the amount of money that they have poured in to supplement redundancy terms. That is a sign of the way in which the Government want the industry to go.

I was pleased to hear the Chairman of the Energy Select Committee refer to clean coal and especially to the fluidised bed experiment at Grimethorpe in my constituency. The privatised energy industry has shown a distinct lack of interest in that experiment and has put little money into it, but if it is proved a successful and profitable venture, the privatised industry will be in there with its sticky hands to cream off any profits that may be had.

I should like to take this opportunity to ask the Minister to assure the House that the fluidised bed experiment will be allowed to be completed. If the Government have a genuine interest in British coal, let them show it by some real action.

8.14 pm

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): This debate on the coal industry is not only opportune but imperative in view of the report by the Energy Select Committee, and I congratulate the Committee and my colleagues who have already spoken in this debate.

In the past 100 years, the House has heard much more about the coal industry than about any other, and rightly so, because coal was the parent of our industrial revolution, and until 1950 our only indigenous source of energy. The industry controlled our economy, and 2 million families associated with it.

With each and every debate—the last being on 14 November—we get an historic resumé, political criticism, and emotional speeches from Members who have been miners and speak from experience, which is understandable. Nevertheless, I hope that they accept that Conservative Members who represent coalfield constituencies care about the industry no less than they do.

My speech on the Coal Industry Bill on 14 November at column 1262 touched on the past and present and questioned the industry's future role and size. While it would be in everyone's interests to repeat that speech in full, time is limited, so I will concentrate my remarks on the essential parameters of renewed contracts with the power generating companies post-1993, and the opportunity for British Coal to secure every tonne of commercially viable business. This, of course, will depend on the total demand for electricity and the share given to coal in generating that energy.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy has often said that British Coal must face the challenges to its markets head on. It has done that—only to find half the power stations' fuel market in England and Wales entirely removed from that marketplace. That is not free and open competition, but rigged protectionism, denying consumers the benefits which would accrue from the unique offer made by British Coal—to supply coal at lower costs and steady prices.

What my constituency miners want to know is why an annual productivity-induced unit cost reduction of £150 million is not passed on to the consumers, as it would be in a truly free market. In addition, they have to subsidise Nuclear Electric, allowing it 20 per cent. of the electricity market share, costing three times the unit price of coal. That is not the market working, but political intervention. Some would like to call it a diversity of supply. That may be so, but it is a feeble excuse to use to our miners who have done so much in the past five years, increasing productivity by 108 per cent. and reducing prices by 40 per cent. in real terms.

Further commercial mismanagement is about to surface from gas also being given favoured status. From their new-found cash resources, National Power and PowerGen have signed continuous gas generating contracts coming on stream up to 1995, equivalent to 25 million tonnes of coal. Having done so, the companies now discover that 40 per cent. of this market share is hopelessly uneconomic compared with their present coal-contracted generation.

Unlike Nuclear Electric, the companies are not asking British Coal for a subsidy to fund this mistake; their means are more subtle—to remove the competition by closing 12 GW of modern coal-fired generating stations, and to demolish the plants. To the lay person, that may seem an insignificant figure, but it is equal to all the power plants in the Trent valley, which currently produce a third of England's electricity requirements. If that was all, it would be bad enough, but a further 17 million tonnes of coal-equivalent gas contracts are waiting for the signature of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Energy, all at unit prices 30 per cent. above those of British Coal. In view of those indisputable facts, my right hon. Friend will have no difficulty in returning those contracts to sender unsigned.

Having 50 per cent. of the energy market protected by intervention, British Coal looks to a potential market after April 1993 of between 50 to 55 million tonnes, most of which it could meet at economically sustainable prices. To get there would require a degree of predictability and orderly progression which only the Government can sponsor. That process must be undertaken soon. Miners are despondent because they continually hear vague promises that, if they keep going, success will come, while at the same time seeing their market decrease and ever-increasing investment in port capacity to handle large quantities of foreign coal.

I make no apology in returning today not only to the question of the wisdom of importing coal on spurious economic grounds but to the extent to which our strategic requirements could be put in jeopardy by allowing such a policy.

Winston Churchill, our great leader and a man of vision, secured in 1914 a 51 per cent. stake in the Anglo-Persian oil company, now British Petroleum, for no other reason than to secure oil supplies. History has proved him right, and nothing has changed to remove that need except that we have now abdicated our responsibilities to two commercial companies, National Power and PowerGen, whose only claim to fame so far is their record-breaking dash for gas.

My constituency miners also demand an economic audit on the importation of coal. It costs £1·80 to produce a gigajoule of domestic electricity worth £20 from British coal compared with £1·50 from imported coal. Eliminate the former, and the cost of the latter will rise through the roof, leaving industrial and domestic consumers at the mercy of foreign Governments.

The United Kingdom already has the lowest domestic electricity prices in Europe and, given the opportunity, British Coal can offer long-term guarantees to keep that price advantage at or below the United Kingdom retail prices index. The starting price could well be reasonable —say 160p per gigajoule or 10 per cent. below present prices—but the contracts are unlikely to be firm, with reopeners at regular intervals. With action as described, British Coal could secure 50 to 55 million tonnes per year, most of all on a firm five-year basis and at much the same price as would be achievable from the lower volumes should any of that market share go to imported coal.

Therefore, we need the Government's support not to dictate on future coal contract prices, but to ensure that the dominant position of the generators is properly regulated rather than abused and that the contract negotiations are decided on genuine, not make-believe economic grounds. Otherwise, instead of the desired increase in competition, there would be an inevitable and dangerous decline in the diversity of energy supplies available to the consumer. The Rothschild report was just one of several options in the privatisation of British coal, but in the end it could be the only one. To abandon the United Kingdom coal industry in that fashion would be a decision which was not only historic but irreversible.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce (Gordon): I am grateful to the Select Committee on Energy for its report. It is particularly helpful that it has highlighted its concern about the potential decline in the extractable reserves of British Coal to a critical level. My only concern about that is it has left it a little late: it might have been helpful if that concern had been registered earlier. Some of the closures that have taken place are irreversible.

However, at least Conservative Members now recognise that the Government must do a bit of thinking about the coal industry's future in relation to the consequences of the privatisation of electricity, the opening up of the market for coal, which even the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) accepts may not be an entirely level playing field, and the future ownership of the coal industry.

I make no apology for being particularly concerned about the future of what little is left of the coal industry in Scotland. We have one operating pit and two mothballed pits. That is the Scottish coal industry. The consequences of the coal strike were more devastating for the Scottish coal industry than any other region. The industry was effectively decimated.

I spent some hours this morning in the company of members of the Monktonhall miners' consortium. As the Under-Secretary of State well knows, it has put in a bid to take over the licence for the Monktonhall colliery from

[Mr. Malcolm Bruce]

British Coal, and British Coal has said that a decision is likely to be made by the end of the year, which presumably will be announced early in the new year. It is my firm belief that that bid is being treated seriously by British Coal only because the consortium has persisted in its determination to try to take over its old pit.

It is a matter of some concern that a company that so far has shown no interest has suddenly popped up at the end of the day and said that it will put in a counter-bid. That is of particular concern when one knows that, in spite of the fact that the principal of that company may be from the Isle of Lewis, he has been as far away from Lewis as he could be for most of his life, and his interest has only materialised recently. Indeed, he has said that he was desperate to take over Monktonhall as soon as he learned that the licence might be available. He has not said when he learned that, but I am sure that it was nothing like as long ago as the Monktonhall miners, who have for three years been trying to take over the licence from British Coal.

It is perhaps also a matter of concern that, for the past two years, the company has made donations of £50,000 a year to the Conservative party. One wonders whether that may be why it has some expectation of results. It is my experience that companies give donations to the Conservative party not to promote and uphold free enterprise but in order to prevent the effective operation of free enterprise and to secure advantages within the marketplace from a Government who are willing to be deflected from their professed ideology in order to favour their friends and backers.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): The hon. Gentleman has just made a serious allegation to which I shall be responding in due course, but meanwhile, will he tell the House whether the consortium which seeks to take over Monktonhall, or the coal industry generally, will be helped by the Liberal Democrats' call for an immediate carbon tax, as set out in their recently published environmental policy document?

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman is wrong: we have not called for an immediate carbon tax. We have raised the question that the Government have also raised—how we should deal with the problems of carbon dioxide emissions and the operation of the market. The chairman of the Conservative party, a previous Secretary of State for the Environment, is on record as saying that energy taxes will have to rise if we are to deal with our environmental problems. Therefore, the Conservative party is in no position to cast such aspersions on how we deal with the problems of carbon dioxide. The Government's record on that is less than impressive.

The particular point about which we must now be concerned is whether the consortium that has put in the application for the licence for Monktonhall will be successful, and the Government's role in that.

I am glad that, on this occasion, the Under-Secretary of State is in his place. I am not criticising him for his absence when this matter was previously debated, because I know that his colleague the hon. Member for Lewisham, East (Mr. Moynihan), who is responsible for oil and gas, reported the debate to him and the concerns that I expressed at that time. As a result, I am pleased to note that he met the consortium and the Chairman of the Energy Select Committee, I think on the same day, and I know that the consortium welcomed that opportunity. That leaves the interesting question why those meetings took place, when the Secretary of State, the Under-Secretary of State, and the Minister at the Scottish Office responsible for industry refused persistent requests for meetings over the past three years—saying that it was a matter not for the Government but for British Coal.

I wonder whether it had to do with the fact that the request for a meeting came from a Conservative councillor in Edinburgh who had previously shown no interest in the consortium and is not directly connected with it. Is it not odd that there should be that sudden change of Government policy? I suppose that that is an indication of the way that things have changed in recent years. As a rule, Ministers did meet Members of Parliament wanting to make representations to them. It is interesting that Ministers are only prepared to do that now for outsiders who are members of their own party. That is a regrettable development.

More seriously, to what extent does that indicate a change of Government attitude? In the past, they said—the Minister knows my view, that this is the wrong position to take—that the licensing of coal pits was entirely a matter for British Coal, and there was no point in meetings, because they would interfere in the management of British Coal. The Minister knows that, when I have attempted to meet Ministers' requests to seek a meeting with British Coal directors, they have refused to do that, or to discuss matters in any way, shape or form.

Ministers who are supposedly accountable to the House refuse to accept their responsibility to be accountable to Members of Parliament, and then pass the buck to people for whom they are responsible, but who in turn refuse to meet right hon. and hon. Members. The business of the House is being frustrated and undermined by the inability of right hon. and hon. Members to make proper representations on the policy of a Government who have been in office too long, and who have grown too arrogant about the power they hold.

Who will make the decision on Monktonhall, and what impact will it have on wider proposals for the privatisation of British Coal? If the decision is to be made by British Coal, why did the Minister meet the consortium? If the Government told British Coal what they want the outcome to be, why did they not tell the House, and outline the priorities?

I have twice tried to put amending legislation through the House to transfer the ownership of British Coal and its licensing responsibilities to the Secretary of State. The Under-Secretary has shown that he is not unsympathetic to that suggestion. That ought to happen before British Coal's privatisation, particularly if coal is to be privatised in a different way from that adopted in respect of previous privatisations of single monopolies. Do the Government have any clear thoughts on privatising British Coal as a single entity or in a different way?

The Monktonhall miners consortium simply wants to take over the pit's licence as soon as possible, and certainly this side of a general election. They have waited long enough, and the signs are that a decision will be made shortly. Will the Minister make it clear that the Government believe that the licence should go to that consortium, unless there are commercial or other reasons why that would be inappropriate—in which case, the Government should state what they are? The consortium has managed to persuade its financial backers of its viability, which suggests that its proposition is realistic.

British Coal should not put any charge on that licence. Monktonhall has been a liability to British Coal, and is costing it money. If anything, British Coal ought to put a little money in, to have the pit taken off its hands. However, the consortium does not seek that—only to take over the licence. Will the Government indicate that will be allowed to happen?

The consortium is frustrated because, over the past three years, it has received very little support from quarters from which it might have expected it. An expensive report commissioned by the National Union of Mineworkers, Lothian regional council, Midlothian district council, and East Lothian district council—the political complexion of which I do not need to point out to the Minister—is fundamentally an attempt to persuade British Coal to take over the running of the pit.

It is an interesting point that the miners consortium has no confidence in British Coal and does not believe that it could run the pit any more profitably than before. The miners believe that the consortium in which working people own the pit could be effective and profitable. It is only right to give them a chance to prove that. I thought that the Conservative party would also consider that something worthy of its support. The consortium should be given an opportunity to show that the commitment it has shown over the past three years can yield results. There is no public money at risk—only the opportunity for the local community to prove that it can deliver the goods.

The membership of the consortium totals 250—which is greater than the number of jobs that would be created in the first instance. The members have all said that they would put up £2,000 of share capital in the consortium, and there are more people to work in the pit, above and below ground, than could initially be provided with employment.

Critics have said that a constraint on the consortium is the limit of 250 underground workers for that pit. Initially, that limit would not be exceeded anyway, but eventually the consortium would be able to employ about 500 people. Will the Minister make it clear that there is no reason why that limit should present any obstacle? Every year, Bills on the coal industry go through the House. The Government have already upgraded and amended——

Mr. Barron rose——

Mr. Bruce: If the hon. Gentleman will just listen, he will understand that I am urging the Government to say that they would if necessary amend the legislation to allow the consortium to progress.

Mr. Barron: The limit would have to be changed by statute, as was the case with the Coal Industry Act 1987, which raised the limit to 150 persons. Why has not that same argument been advanced in respect of the current Coal Industry Bill by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who was supposed to be the Liberal Democrats' spokesman on the industry?

Mr. Bruce: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well what happened with the previous Bill. My amendment was defeated by 21 votes to one, because Labour Members voted with the Government to defeat it. I know exactly what is Labour's position in that regard.

The miners in the area in question are thoroughly and utterly disillusioned with Labour for its total lack of support. They say to me, "Isn't it extraordinary that here you have working people wanting to take over a pit that they care about, and putting up their own money to that end, and Labour is backing the bosses who closed the pit in the first place—to prevent those workers taking over their only means of a livelihood?" That is what Labour does for working people, and that is why working people in that part of the world will turn against Labour at the next general election.

I ask the Minister to recognise that he is in a position to ensure that those miners are given the opportunity to do what they have spent three years trying to do—to take over the pit they know and to show that they can make it profitable.

8.37 pm

Mr. Malcolm Moss (Cambridgeshire, North-East): The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) made a number of assertions, to which my hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt reply later. As to the case for Monktonhall, it seems that the hon. Gentleman is seeking privatisation before a Bill has passed through the House. That is an interesting line from the Liberal Democrats.

Few industries in this country or in the Community as a whole have seen such tremendous changes over the past decade as the coal industry. Those changes essentially relate to a slimming down in the industry itself, but also to significant structural changes.

On the debit side, over the past 10 years output reduced by 35 million tonnes or 28 per cent., but the parallel decrease in consumption is much less. It has fallen by only 11·6 million tonnes, or 9·6 per cent. On the plus side, there have been dramatic productivity increases, from 2·32 tonnes per man shift in 1980-81 to 4·70 tonnes in 1990-91 —a rise of 103 per cent. in 10 years. That was not achieved at the expense of health and safety, because over the same period fatal accidents fell by 72 per cent.

Over the same period also, British Coal cut colliery costs by 40 per cent. in real terms. Those are not the statistics of an industry in terminal decline. It is high time that some of the myths presented by Labour Members were buried once and for all. The first is that the British coal industry will be decimated in the near future; the second is that the present Conservative Government are actively working to achieve such a decline, together with the substantial job losses that accompany pit closures.

The Government's commitment to the coal industry has been clear over the past 10 years or more; they have also shown their commitment to a successful future for the industry. After all, who invested more than £25 billion over the past decade—some £2 million each working day? Who put British Coal on a solid financial footing by writing off its debts with a massive £5 billion capital reconstruction programme? Who introduced a Bill—long overdue—to deal with the coal mining subsidence problem? Who restructured British Coal so that it was able, last year, to make a profit of £78 million—the first bottom-line profit for 13 years?

Was it the Labour party, operating behind the scenes? Was it the National Union of Mineworkers, under its renowned leader? Were those achievements the result of efforts by Labour Members? Of course not; they are the tangible evidence of a Government's full commitment to one of the country's major industries.

Let us contrast those achievements with Labour's record in office. The Labour Government closed more pits in their two terms than the current Conservative Government have ever closed. Under Labour, between 1964 and 1970 and again between 1974 and 1979, a total of 295 pits were shut down; since 1979, there have been just under 140 closures. That is half the closure rate under Labour.

Mr. Jimmy Hood (Clydesdale): Can the hon. Gentleman tell us what percentage of collieries have been closed under the present Government, and what percentage were closed under the last Labour Government?

Mr. Moss: I think that absolute figures are much more important than percentages. In the last analysis, they relate to the number of pits, and the number of jobs available at each pit.

Under Labour, productivity increased annually by an average of just 2·5 per cent. Since 1979, under the present Government, that figure has trebled to more than 6·5 per cent. The message is loud and clear; according to any measurement that we care to take, the Conservative Government's record on the coal industry is significantly better than that of Labour.

What of the future? Of course, the coal industry faces real challenges—environmentally, for instance. Stringent targets relating to carbon dioxide, sulphur dioxide and nox emissions make it difficult for coal to compete with other fuels, especially in power generation. Coal also suffers from competition from gas, which is more environmentally friendly, and—as we have heard this evening—is becoming far more important in terms of baseload electricity generation in the near future. The third challenge comes from the liberalisation of world energy markets, a trend that will undoubtedly continue through the GATT negotiations.

None the less, British Coal has achieved remarkable improvements in the past decade, which can and should continue. Tribute should be paid to both management and work force for those tremendous achievements: they deserve the highest praise. The same management and work force face the challenges of the current position, but there is nothing to suggest that they lack the collective will, expertise or enterprise to negotiate a very successful future for themselves and their industry.

Much has been made of the contracts coming up for renewal with the main power generators in the United Kingdom—National Power and PowerGen. Their generating capacity, however, still lies to a significant extent in coal-fired generation. Their new gas plants will not be on stream for several years; they need a secure, well-priced coal contract for a long time to come. As my hon. Friend the Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) pointed out, as negotiations are currently progressing, there is every chance that some 50 million to 55 million tonnes will form part of that contract negotiation. Coal-fired plants are mainly located inland, and very close to existing coalfields. That surely gives British Coal a distinct advantage over importers in negotiations.

The hon. Member for Mansfield (Mr. Meale) raised another possibility for British Coal's immediate future. British Coal produces the cheapest deep-mined coal in Europe; the cost is substantially lower than that of coal from many other producers in the European Coal and Steel Communities. Surely there is tremendous scope for diversification of British Coal sales into European Community countries, particularly Germany. Here, national subsidies are under continual threat of elimination as discussions progress within the ECSC and under the treaty.

As we have stated clearly and repeatedly, the Government are pledged to achieve the largest economic coal industry that the market can support. To say anything less would invite protectionism, ring fencing and subsidy. With privatisation, after the next election, the industry will be more effectively structured to meet its challenges and build on its achievements.

What of Labour's plans for the future of the coal industry? Its pledge is to maintain the industry "at around about its current size". Let us ignore for the moment what Labour actually means by that; how will it deliver on its promise, bearing in mind the fact that the nuclear industry is already ring fenced, gas contracts have already been signed and committed to combined cycle gas turbine plant, and coal imports are perfectly legal under European law?

Labour's coal strategy simply does not stand up—first, on environmental grounds. Labour is pledged to freeze carbon dioxide emissions at 1990 levels by the year 2000; that is five years ahead of the Government's pledge. How will that be possible, given that Labour wishes to phase out nuclear, which could easily push up carbon dioxide emissions by at least 10 per cent. a year and prevent the development of combined cycle gas stations, which emit half as much carbon dioxide as coal-fired stations?

Sulphur dioxide emissions would also increase if that strategy were implemented. The only way in which to meet sulphur dioxide targets would be the adoption of a massive flue gas desulphurisation programme on existing coal-fired stations. Who would pay for that? If Government grant is given to the companies running the stations, it will come from taxpayers' money. Or will National Power and PowerGen be forced to do the retrofit? That would mean significant increases in the price of electricity for consumers. We have heard nothing this evening about where the money will come from.

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): The hon. Gentleman said that Labour would need to implement an FGD programme, and asked who would pay for it. Surely the Conservative Government have already set out proposals for such a programme: they should be telling him where the money would come from.

Mr. Moss: The existing programme represents a commitment by National Power and PowerGen to retrofit about 8 GW. That is clearly contained within their financial programmes. Labour's plans involve an increase, or a stabilisation, of coal burn in our power stations, at the expense of gas or nuclear, at the same time as a reduction in both carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide levels.

Without FGD retrofit across many more stations than are represented than those 8 GW, I do not think that that will be possible.

Mr. Barron: What does the hon. Gentleman think about the fact that National Power and PowerGen are currently importing orimulsion and getting permission to burn it? Orimulsion emits three or four times as much sulphur as coal.

Mr. Moss: The point at issue is whether National Power and PowerGen meet the carbon dioxide and sulphur dioxide targets that have been set for them.

The hon. Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark) raised the question of clean burn technology. I have no doubt that additional points will be raised about that aspect later because of the Select Committee's excellent report. I have little doubt that it represents a future for coal-fired power generation in the next decade. However, it seems that the technology is not right at the moment in economic terms to fill the gap and to play a part in the crucial current round of negotiations in which the future of the coal industry in the next three to four years is the most important issue.

Furthermore, Labour's policy of reducing or banning imports of coal and of reducing the development of gas-fired stations is, in many eyes, quite illegal. First, the banning of imports might land the Labour Government in the future in front of a European court and, secondly of course, if the Labour Government attempted to use their 40 per cent. stake in National Power or PowerGen to bring pressure to bear on those companies to reduce the development of gas-fired stations, they might end up in a United Kingdom court for breaking United Kingdom company law.

I believe that Labour's statement that it will maintain the coal industry at "around about its current size"

is unworkable—especially in the light of the developments that are already in train—and also uncosted. British Coal has an excellent future. There are still sizeable markets within this country and in the European Community. We cannot consider the future of British coal with preconceived notions of output, size and number of pits because that would be unrealistic. Further improvements in productivity and price are, of course, necessary but the price gap between British coal and the generators is certainly not unbridgeable.

Mr. Alexander Eadie (Midlothian): In considering this important subject, it would be churlish not to congratulate the Select Committee on Energy on the report that it has produced, which to some extent analyses the current position of the mining industry and its position in the future. However, I wonder whether the Government will pay a blind bit of notice to the report, which illustrates not only what will happen to the mining industry but what will happen if we allow it to contract.

When the Chairman was introducing the report, I intervened on the question of nuclear power. I do not say this in a malicious way or to score debating points, but I said that the chairman of Scottish Nuclear had argued at the Nuclear Forum that there might be a case, in the strategic interests of the nation, to subsidise nuclear power. We have argued for a long time that there is a peripheral argument that in the strategic interests of the nation we should be concerned about the coal industry.

To judge from the way things are going, there will be difficulties in respect of the size of the industry. The hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) wiped about £30 million or £40 million off the take from the coal industry. He said that his first speech in the previous coal debate made the headlines of Coal News, but I do not think that the chairman of British Coal will be grateful that the hon. Gentleman has halved the take and production of coal in his remarks.

If we see the demise of the coal industry, the nuclear power industry will be subsidised. That is, in essence, what I was told. Let me remember how unforgiving the nuclear power industry is. To think that we should destroy the coal industry and then say, "Well, if we have no coal industry, we shall have to have a nuclear power industry and what it costs does not really matter because it is in the nation's interest to do it," does not make sense.

When one reads and analyses the admirable report, one discovers a number of threats—the importation of foreign coal, the question of how the board will react to privatisation and the Government's Rothschild report which is not, in fact, a report but a slaughter of the coal industry. The estimates that we are debating propose that a further £4 million should be spent on preparing the future privatisation of the coal industry, but what is £1 million or £2 million between friends? If the taxpayer understood what the Government are planning with this privatisation and what they are doing to the coal industry, there would be no doubt what would happen at the next general election. It is absolutely disgraceful that this proposal should be put before us. Who is getting the millions of pounds? It is certainly not the miners.

The whole point of the admirable report is to point out what is the biggest threat to the coal industry. It is, of course, the gas industry—there is no doubt about that. It is a threat because the Government have sat back willingly and said that they do not care if another 30 million tonnes of coal is taken out of the take and if there are to be gas-fired power stations. One of the hon. Members who spoke earlier pointed out the dangers, and I wonder whether the Government are aware of the dangers of the policy that they are pursuing in relation to gas-fired power stations. It will affect not only the coal industry but the consumers who will have to pay an ever-increasing price for gas.

There is an assumption that gas is a green fuel. The Government are helping to support the idea that coal is a pollutant but that nuclear power is green friendly and that gas is green friendly. In addition, it is said that gas is cheaper, but that is not true on two counts.

Because of the lack of time I shall draw attention to a recently published report entitled "UK Energy Policy Post-Privatisation" which was written by Professor Fells. He meets head on the issue of the future of gas and its price. It is time that the Government examined the issue because as a result of the policy that they are actively backing—or at least not opposing—the consumer will face colossal electricity bills because of the escalation in gas-fired power stations.

The report to which I have just referred states:

"Reserve depletion, especially of oil and gas, must still be a concern for the long-term, but in the medium-term, constraints of supply security and the environment are more worrying than is depletion of the resource base itself. Probably now, and certainly after 1992, it is not certain that gas in the United Kingdom sector will be landed in the United Kingdom; it is likely to be sucked into mainland Europe, where prices are higher. Viewed in this perspective the privilege of the United Kingdom is temporary; the price and availability of natural gas in the United Kingdom depend" on many other factors into which I do not have time to go. I put that comment on record as the position is serious.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) said that he met the consortium today. He has not discussed the matter with me, although Monktonhall is in my constituency. I have never made any secret about the fact that my view on Monktonhall colliery is that British Coal should reopen the colliery. We have had many meetings on that, and the miners' parliamentary group has met the chairman of British Coal several times. We have had long meetings with the Secretary of State for Energy on the future of Monktonhall. There is no question that the issue of Monktonhall was not put forward, as the hon. Member for Gordon seemed to imply. I have never made any secret of the fact that I believe that the future of Monktonhall lies in British Coal working the pit and we have said that from the start.

It is a bit much for the hon. Member for Gordon to show a report and to say that it was compiled by Labour-controlled Lothian regional council. He obviously has not read the report——

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: I have.

Mr. Eadie: If he had, he would not have made the remarks he did. The report on Monktonhall was compiled by an independent consultant; it had nothing to do with political views. It was unanimously agreed by Lothian regional council, including Liberal Democrat councillors and Tory councillors, that there should be a report. The hon. Gentleman did not say that.

The report said that what was happening at Monktonhall should be costed. It went into great detail about how much it would take to start the colliery again and said that it would cost millions of pounds. It said that the capital's availability in the open market was doubtful and suspect. My view of the consortium has always been, "Good luck to it." However, I am concerned about where the money will come from and what the rates of interest will be. I want to ensure that my constituents do not lose the money that they are supposed to invest.

One does not have to look at the report which the hon. Member for Gordon has thrown away with such disdain. The Government with British Coal decided that they would get an independent consultant's report to study how the mine could be put up for licence—whether under the consortium or under private ownership. I have a copy of the consortium's report and the hon. Member for Gordon should have got a copy because it was identical to the Lothian report. The only difference was that the consortium's report said that it would cost another £250 million for subsidence damage.

The consortium has been advised by a mining engineer who was made redundant by British Coal. He proposes that the coal seams should be worked in the advance. It is good mining practice that if one is to work all the mine that has already been developed—and £60 billion has been spent in its development—one does not work it in the advance, but in the retreat. I have good reasons to be doubtful.

The hon. Member for Gordon says that the people of Midlothian are sick of the Labour party. The people of Midlothian are sick of the Liberal Democrats, because an argument is going on at present in Midlothian about who most wants to back the consortium and whether it is the Scottish National party or the Liberal Democrats. The Liberal Democrats write to The Scotsman and say that they were the first to back the consortium. They should not play about with people's livelihoods.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: We did not back the consortium.

Mr. Eadie: I did not interrupt the speech by the hon. Member for Gordon. If the hon. Gentleman wants to make a speech about the constituency of Midlothian, he will have to do a lot more homework than he did tonight. We have problems, and the hon. Gentleman is one of them. We have problems with the Liberal Democrats, who change their mind every five minutes and who have a different policy for every constituency. I want to try to be kind to the hon. Member for Gordon because he is out of his depth. He knows nothing about mining.

I do not know what will happen about Monktonhall. I want it to remain open, but I also want to understand the position. I do not want only Monktonhall, but the 100 years worth of coal which stretches to Musselburgh bay to be developed. Incidentally, I knocked down the girders that were to go to develop a new pit which would come from Monktonhall into those reserves.

I do not need the hon. Member for Gordon to lecture me about my affinity with the mining industry. I worked in that industry for 30 years. My record will stand alongside his in relation to the future of mining in Scotland or in relation to any miners in Midlothian. If the hon. Member for Gordon wants to make speeches criticising the Labour party, he should do more homework first.

Mr. John Home Robertson (East Lothian): I am grateful to my hon. Friend and constituency neighbour for giving way so that I can express the East Lothian interest in Monktonhall because Musselburgh bay lies under the east Lothian coast. My hon. Friend has long experience in the mining industry and is aware that the proposed privatised operation at Monktonhall would be restricted to an underground work force of only 150 people. Does my hon. Friend feel that justice could possibly be done to the coal reserves in that pit with such a small squad?

Mr. Eadie: I am obliged to my hon. Friend for his intervention. The hon. Member for Gordon treated this matter as a little joke, saying in the local press that everything could be changed in only five minutes. He has said that one only needs a dispensation from the mines inspectorate. That is a load of rubbish. One could not get a dispensation from the mines inspectorate to increase the manpower. I appeared on the Front Bench in the Committee Sitting in which the hon. Gentleman referred and received an assurance from the Minister that getting a dispensation would not be a problem. However, when I tabled a question to that effect, the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wells (Mr. Heathcoat-Amory), answered by stating that, before the position could be changed, primary legislation would be required.

The hon. Member for Gordon does not seem to understand either that primary legislation would be required or that such primary legislation takes longer than five minutes to be put on the statute book.

I shall finish on this note——

Mr. Andy Stewart: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Eadie: If the hon. Gentleman does not mind, I will not——

Mr. Stewart: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for giving way, because I listened to what he said earlier and have since checked my speech. There is only one small difference between what I said on 14 November and what I have said today. I said on the 14th that the equivalent of 25 million tonnes of coal gas contracts had been given, with a further equivalent of 10 million tonnes lying on the table for the Secretary of State to sanction. I have since discovered that that figure is not 10 million tonnes but 17 million tonnes. That is the only difference.

Mr. Eadie: The hon. Gentleman should read his speech again.

I shall conclude now because I am taking up valuable time. When I first became a Member of the House, I learned that one should never speak about things that one does not know or does not understand. As that applies also to the subject of mining, I shall give that advice to the hon. Member for Gordon, who spoke on a subject about which he knows very little—and it showed.

9.6 pm

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford): I am sorry that the hon. Member for Sherwood (Mr. Stewart) appears about to leave the Chamber, as I intend to refer to him. The Chairman of the Select Committee on Energy apologised to me earlier for the fact that he has had to leave the Chamber because he is due to make a speech on clean coal technology elsewhere in London.

I listened with interest to the hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) when he said that the Labour party did not have much interest in or seek to represent the Monktonhall miners. I assure the hon. Gentleman that the Select Committee carefully considered the Monktonhall bid and that our discussions were forcefully led by my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, East (Mr. McAllion).

I do not mean to be offensive to the hon. Member for Sherwood when I say that he has entertained us with his prepared briefs in many of our coal debates, but that it is a bit rich of him continually to criticise the contraction of the coal industry when he has supported many of his Government's policies on the industry. I hope that the Nottinghamshire miners and Coal News will note that that is hypocritical. When I read Coal News after our last coal debate, it appeared as though the only people to speak on behalf of the mining industry were the hon. Member for Sherwood and his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham, South (Mr. Brandon-Bravo). I hope also that British Coal has not helped to produce some of the briefs that we have heard in previous coal debates.

I am a long-standing member of the Select Committee on Energy and like, I am sure, many other members of that Committee, am beginning to feel like a parrot. We have produced reports year after year expressing anxiety at what was happening to the British coal industry. Over the years, we have had different witnesses, different Secretaries of State and different chairmen of British Coal. They have told us, "There are no figures at all. All you read in the newspapers about running down the mining industry has no truth in it."

However, the Select Committee report is based on clean coal technology, on which we have taken a great deal of evidence from expert witnesses. I am trying to cut my speech short because other people want to speak. I simply say that it is fairly obvious that Britain could have taken the lead in clean coal technology. Unfortunately, we have failed to do so. We have had leading opportunities in British Coal's topping cycle for coal-fired generation. We had the British Gas Lurgi coal gasification and coal liquefaction. We have failed miserably to support those experiments financially.

The Government contribution to the Grimethorpe project was much less than that of foreign Governments. We now find that, because we have failed in the past 10 or 12 years, to recognise the need for clean coal technology and support the schemes that were in operation, it will take eight to 10 years for plants to become operative and produce clean coal. In the meantime, foreign competitors are moving ahead of us.

The biggest problem is that when the clean coal technology plants are available, judging by present progress, the British coal industry will be run down to such an extent that it will not be able to meet the demand from the plants. Once again, we shall be in the hands of our foreign competitors.

It is rather ironic that we continue to run down our coal industry and sterilise billions of tonnes of coal. I shall refer to the Rothschild report later. I hope that the Government have read the latest British Coal press release from its chairman. I shall not read it out, because there is not time, but it makes the very point that, purely and simply for medium-term policies and commercial reasons, we shall sterilise billions of tonnes of coal.

Mr. Illsley: May I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the Government's response to the Select Committee report? Both he and I were members of the Committee when the report was produced. The Government's response was:

"it is not true to say that the reserves are lost forever if pits currently accessing them are closed."

On the following page, the British Coal memorandum says:

"The Committee is right to draw attention to the fact that, once a mine is closed, the capacity is effectively lost."

Does that not show how wrong the Government are?

Mr. Lofthouse: Now that my hon. Friend has brought me to the matter, it is right to put on record the comments of the chairman of British Coal in the press release.:

"Speaking in London almost a year after becoming Chairman of British Coal, Mr. Clarke said: 'What we are seeing is a sort of energy arms race, with attempts to justify it on the grounds of guaranteeing security, diversity and competition—but in reality, guaranteeing nothing but higher electricity prices, a rapid abandonment of other fuel reserves, and reliance on as yet unproven overseas resources.' . . . Coal's advantage still held good when account was taken of the cost of fitting flue gas desulphurisation equipment, said Mr. Clarke. The next supply contracts which British Coal will negotiate with the big electricity generators would offer electricity users an even better deal because of coal's success in reducing costs. . . . 'This is no exercise in abstract economics for British Coal,' Mr. Clarke stressed. 'The dash for gas affects us directly, and in a particularly perverse way.' The economics of gasfired stations meant that investors wanted long term supply and sale contracts to make them bankable. Typically, such contracts were for 15 years. 'Each new contract, each new gas station, eats into coal's share of the market—a share we could supply competitively. And we have to close down capacity as a result. Because we can't re-open mines, that capacity is lost for ever.'"

That is the case, and no expert would refute it.

The future of British Coal depends on the results of the next general election in a few months' time, and I do not think that any hon. Member or the Minister would refute that. That will decide whether we have a mining industry able to supply the demand for coal in the medium and long term, or whether we shall have the Rothschild recommendations. The Minister has an obligation to tell us whether the Government intend to implement Rothschild if they are returned to power. If that is the case, we may as well throw all our debates and the report out of the window.

The Minister has heard speeches from the chairman of the Energy Select Committee and all its members, including my hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, Central (Mr. Illsley) and the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost), who have been privileged to listen to expert witnesses. People without any political bias have given honest evidence and enabled the Select Committee to produce the report, which was a genuine effort to draw to the attention of the Government their folly in running down the coal industry to the extent that they are planning to do.

The Committee has done so in the past, but the Government have taken no notice. Even though they are hellbent on privatising the coal industry, I hope that at this late stage they will take notice of the Committee's report. It is a sincere and honest endeavour to try to inform the Government of exactly what is happening to the industry and what folly it would be if they allowed privatisation.

I hope that there will be no opportunity for the Government to introduce the Rothschild recommendations and that a Labour Government will be returned. They will treat the mining industry and the country in a responsible way and will maintain reserves of fuel which the country so badly needs in the medium and long term.

9.17 pm

Mr. Kevin Barron (Rother Valley): I do not know whether the Minister would agree that, until now, we have heard explanations from both sides of the Chamber about the imperfect and expensive competition which has arisen as a result of the privatisation of the electricity supply industry. The House should ask what we are doing taking a decision on class V, vote 9, which will give the Government an extra £4 million from the Consolidated Fund

"to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1992 for expenditure by the Department of Energy in connection with the privatisation of the coal industry."

I do not know whether the Minister agrees with the evidence given by the hon. Member for Erewash (Mr. Rost) and by my hon. Friends about privatisation of the electricity supply industry. However, it is obviously as much a waste of funds to give money to privatisation of the coal industry as it was to give money for the poll tax.

A lot of nonsense has been talked—and a lot of myths—when the privatisation of the coal industry has been discussed in the House and elsewhere.

"Now the first myth that deserves a liberal dollop of embalming fluid is the notion that British Coal management can't do the business. That a change of ownership would usher in new ideas and allow productivity to soar and new markets to be exploited."

I do not know whether the Minister agrees.

"I can tell you that's absolute rubbish".

Also, people believe that there can be "a quick fix". I do not believe that there is a quick fix for the coal industry. Anyone who thinks that he can improve on the commitment and effort of British Coal managers reveals how little he knows about the coal industry and coal mining.

Those two quotes about "absolute rubbish" and "a quick fix" are not my words; they were taken from the speech made on Thursday last week by the chairman of British Coal. He ought to know; he was appointed by the Department to run British Coal. He says that the idea that British Coal can bring anything new to the industry or the nation is a myth. I should like the Minister to tell us whether he believes the myth about privatising the coal industry. If it is a myth, how can he justify the request for another £4 million of public funds to be spent on merchant bankers and other advisers like N. M. Rothschild sending reports into the country in brown envelopes which show that the future of the British coal industry is bleak?

We are debating the issues in the report of the Select Committee on Energy. I welcome the commitment of the Select Committee to secure the future of the coal industry in Britain and to develop a credible long-term strategy for research and development of clean coal technology. The whole House should commend the conclusion of the Select Committee in paragraph 89 that the strategy must include "recognition that the UK is unlikely to succeed with clean coal technologies against foreign competition unless the Government is as supportive towards those technologies as competitors' governments."

The failure to support our industry is amply illustrated by the Bilsthorpe and Grimethorpe projects. In the case of Bilsthorpe, the Secretary of State's excuse for lack of Government support was that the project was neither commercial nor a demonstration project. In paragraph 78, the report records the Secretary of State as saying:

"the view that we took was that the technology that was involved was reasonably well proven . . . We were perfectly satisfied that it would work."

While the Government were refusing to take a 20 per cent. stake in the project, a fluid bed boiler of the same size and design was built at a mine in Lorraine on the initiative of the French Government, who funded 60 per cent. of the cost. That is a fair example of how Britain is lagging behind the rest of Europe.

In their response to the report, the Government have said that the Bilsthorpe project failed to achieve the support of the European Commission after an assessment by technical experts. Is not it the case that the European Commission, through the THERMIE programme, would back Bilsthorpe only if it was certain to go ahead, and that the only way to ensure that was through Government support? All the indications are that the Government did not support it and, as a consequence, it was not supported by the European Commission. Now the Government choose to blame the European Commission instead of putting the blame where it rightly lies—on their own lack of support for the project.

We have also had what is described by the Select Committee as the "sorry tale" of the Grimethorpe topping cycle. In paragraph 72, the Select Committee says that it reflects

"the lack of a long-term strategy and the failure to review the R & D role of the Government and other bodies in the wake of privatisation."

Apparently, the Government now agree that such a long-term project needs to be funded in such a way as to avoid unnecessary delays.

I wonder whether the Minister can tell us whether the project at Grimethorp is now securely funded, so that it will be able to complete its programme of 1,250 hours of operation? Will the money run out, as it did once before, with the consequential loss not only of the technological advantages gained but of the scientific and technical expertise? My hon. Friend the Member for Barnsley, East (Mr. Patchett) has taken an avid interest in the Grimethorpe project, not only because of its impact on his constituency but because of its impact on energy development. Will Grimethorpe complete its current programme without any further problems? My hon. Friend and I want to know the answer.

The report of the Select Committee is notable because it managed to clarify the Government's position in relation to the generators commitment to retrofit flue-gas desulphurisation systems to coal-fired power stations. Paragraph 107 of the report notes the Secretary of State insistence that PowerGen, the smaller of the two generators, cannot withdraw from its programme of 4 GW of FGD retrofits to coal-fired stations. However, from evidence submitted by McLoskey Coal Information Services and the British Association of Colliery Management it is clear that orimulsion, the fuel from Colombia, has a higher sulphur content than British coal. That means that those coal-fired power stations which use that fuel need FGD retrofitting. National Power and PowerGen have been given permission to burn that fuel at their power stations at Pembroke, Richborough and Ince.

The Select Committee took a great interest in the issue of FGD retrofitting. Will the Minister confirm that the Government will take the necessary steps—if necessary through Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution—to ensure that PowerGen complies with its commitment to retrofit 4 GW of coal burn should it not do so voluntarily? The Ferrybridge sea power station has not got permission for its 2 GW coal burn. That power station is the biggest sulphur emitter in Britain, and any investment in plant to get rid of sulphur emissions should be directed at such a power station.

Will the generators be required to retrofit FGD if they decide to burn orimulsion? Would the sulphur emitted by that coal be in addition to the 4 GW limit set now?

It is a pity that the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) is not in the Chamber. Attendance on the Conservative Back Benches is thin to say the least, especially when the Government tell us how much they support the coal industry. I note that my hon. Friend the member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson) has moved to those Benches in an attempt to put the imbalance right.

The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East made much about sulphur emissions, but the Government are taking no action to stop generators bringing in foreign coal. Surely that behaviour is anomalous. The Government say that those generators need the coal because it has a lower sulphur content, but at the same time they give them permission to burn orimulsion, which has a higher sulphur content than any coal produced in Britain. The Minister must explain that dichotomy.

The consultation paper of the coal task force recommended:

"the Government should accept the need for it to take action to provide a framework to encourage the development and promotion of new cleaner coal technologies"

That view is also reflected by the Select Committee's report, paragraph 67 of which states:

"without Government assistance no demonstration plants wil be built. Without demonstration plants, the UK's clean coal projects cannot proceed towards commercial implementation. Without commercial implementation, the UK's R & D in this field will have been largely futile."

Most people would agree. I hope that the Government will take on board what the all-party Select Committee has said about clean coal technologies and act on those recommendations as a matter of urgency.

The second part of the Select Committee report is about Government intervention in long-term contracts for the British coal industry. Paragraph 137 of the report says:

"it is precisely because of the uncertainty over future energy needs and supplies that secure, indigenous sources of fuel are important."

Indeed they are, and most energy commentators in Britain take that view. We do not know whether a certain institution takes that view, because it has little to say about whether the long-term security of indigenous sources of supply is an asset to Britain. The institution to which I refer is the Department of Energy.

Even so, the Government reiterate their belief that the supply of fuel is a market-only decision. They "believe that only the participants in the market can have the necessary knowledge and the incentive to determine the economic size of an industry. It is therefore for the electricity supply industry to ensure that it has access to secure long-term supplies of competitive fuel."

In stubbornly repeating that, they rebut the Select Committee stance which rejects total reliance on the market. Indeed, in its conclusions in paragraph 149, the report points out:

"if the generators take decisions which turn out to have unfortunate long-term consequences, it is the nation as a whole (and electricity consumers in particular) who will pay the price, rather than the generators themselves."

If decisions are taken for short-term economic reasons and in the full knowledge of their likely effects, a future Labour Government would not see their duty lying in protecting the profits of the generating companies at the expense of consumers. I want the message to go out loud and clear that a future Labour Government would not feel that we had to put consumers at risk because of decisions taken now by generators in the knowledge that, while coal is offered at home with guarantees on its price structure for years to come, they feel that they should run elsewhere for short-term economic gain.

The Government's stated belief in a free and open market on the basis of willing buyers and willing sellers, their unwillingness to subsidise what they term uneconomic production and their rejection of the coercion of customers sits uneasily on the protection of the nuclear industry's markets through the non-fossil fuel obligation and the nuclear levy.

In the debate on Second Reading of the Coal Industry Act 1990, I spoke of the European Commission's proposed reference price for coal. The Minister seemed unaware of the proposals. Indeed, he said:

[Mr. Kevin Barron]

"He did not tell us what was in that plan"—
referring to the plan that I had mentioned—
"other than mentioning something called a reference price".
—[Official Report, 14 November 1991; Vol. 198, c. 1318.]

It was astonishing to hear a Minister say that in November 1991, when the European Commission had for many months been discussing exactly that matter in relation to the future of the European coal industries.

The Select Committee has no such qualms, for it said in paragraph 145:

"the concept of a reference price band . . . is . . . an important step towards a harmonised policy in respect of European coal reserves and towards defining the value of the security which indigenous coal production provides."

The Select Committee called on the Government to play an active part in the deliberations on that. When one considers that that was said in July and that the Minister responsible for coal said in November that he did not even know about the reference price, one cannot have a great deal of faith in him or in his ability to protect the British coal industry.

The Government's formal response to the Select Committee is muted, to say the least. They will give, as they call it, only "careful consideration" to proposals when they emerge, rather than be actively involved in formulating the proposals. That should come as no surprise to us, given the Government's record. Nevertheless, it is disappointing that the Government do not take a more positive attitude.

In a recent letter to George Stevenson MEP, the EC Director-General for Energy said:

"the Commission believes that the current world market price for coal is not a sufficient criterion for assessing the competitiveness of Community coal. It is therefore realistic to define a security premium for the Community coal production which covers both the long term prospects for the evolution of the world coal market and the coal supply security."

I hope that the Minister will join more enthusiastically in the vital discussions on long-term markets and security of supply which affect the future of the British coal industry.

The Commission's paper on reference prices says:

"it would be particularly unfair for pits to continue to close in those Member States which have nearly completed the restructuring exercise, while substantially less productive pits in other coal-producing Member States are kept running thanks to a national system of subsidies and other protective measures."

That was also pointed out by the Chairman of the Select Committee. Surely that covers the British coal industry because, if our restructuring is not complete, how many more pits will have to close in Britain?

The letter to George Stevenson MEP also states:

"Further reductions of British coal production capacity are certainly worrying."

It is a shame that the Government are not worried by such prospects. Their approach to negotiating a new contract between the coal corporation and generators is a clear expression of their easy come, easy go approach to the coal industry. I cannot believe that it is in the national interest for the Government to proceed as they have. We must not lose the nation's assets because at some stage there will be a national crisis in terms of where our energy resources should come from.

I do not think that I could conclude my speech better than by reporting the warning in the conclusions the Select Committee report:

"if a significant proportion of the UK's coal reserves were abandoned . . . resulting in a major reduction of long-term energy security, the Government should understand that the country would see this not as a commercial decision, but as a largely irreversible decision of historic significance for the UK."

I hope that the Minister and the Department of Energy will take our great national assets more seriously than in the past and ensure that we have an asset that will serve the national for many generations to come, as it has for centuries past.

9.37 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Energy (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): I congratulate the Energy Select Committee and all who serve on it on the quality of their report, which is one of the subjects of this evening's debate. They examined the prospects for the coal market after 1993 and the possibilities of clean coal technology. Naturally, I do not agree with all their conclusions, but I recognise the high standard of the report.

I listened with particular interest to the opening speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Rochford (Dr. Clark), who spoke with great authority on his report. He has given me notice that he is unable to be here for the latter part of the debate. Obviously, I entirely accept his apology and there is no possible discourtesy. My hon. Friend and other hon. Members referred to the painful restructuring that has taken place in past decades in the British coal mining industry. There is nothing new about colliery closures. Indeed, my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) drew attention to periods under Labour Governments when similar pit closures were experienced and large numbers of coal miners were displaced.

We have ensured that restructuring and social grants are available to help that painful process. We have also provided deficit grants to aid the industry more directly. Since 1979, more than £7·5 billion of new investment has been made available by the Government through British Coal. The total grant aid provided in those years comes to more than £17 billion—including more than £6 billion of deficiency grant provided in the Coal Industry Act 1990. It cannot be said that the taxpayer has been stingy in supporting the industry.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Does not the Minister agree that the blocking of the RECHAR grants has deliberately stopped considerable sums of money that should have come to districts such as mine, which was a considerable blow?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: That is a separate issue. I regret that one of the European Commissioners is apparently refusing to release RECHAR money to this country as it could be of direct assistance to some of the affected regions. I know that discussions are taking place between the Government and the Commission on that issue, and I hope, that before too long, the Commissioner involved will authorise the release of the money, which we can certainly put to good use.

I am sure that all hon. Members recognise—it has been asserted again in the debate—that the coal industry faces competition from other fuels. That would be true under any Government and whether the industry were in private or public hands. It faces competition from the nuclear industry, the growing number of renewable energy sources —which, although few at present, are of growing significance in total—and also from the gas industry, which is now to provide power for electricity generation.

Under any Government, a number of large gas generating plants would be commissioned over the next year or two, which would inevitably affect the market for coal. However, we believe that there is still a significant market for coal. The prospects of British Coal winning that market are good, particularly if we succeed in transferring the industry to the private sector.

That is why we are working out proposals to do so after the next general election and are bringing forward the supplementary estimate which is one of the subjects of this evening's debate. Decisions on the timing and details of the privatisation package and the Bill that we shall bring before the House will be taken after the next general election, but it is sensible to consider in detail the technical issues involved and some of the options that may be appropriate.

The hon. Member for Gordon (Mr. Bruce) wanted us to act faster and transfer ownership of the Monktonhall pit to a consortium of coal miners in advance of the main privatisation Bill. It is not possible for us to do that without changes in the law, so I think that he must have meant that the licensee should be the miners consortium, although there was some confusion in his remarks between the two different approaches.

The hon. Member for Gordon prefaced his main suggestions with an allegation that applicants could influence the choice by contributing to Conservative party funds. I very much resent and utterly reject that allegation. He then, confusingly and paradoxically, suggested that I should involve myself in the choice of licensee. He went further, and said that my choice should be his favourite consortium—the mineworkers consortium—which has discussed its proposals with me. I make it clear to the hon. Gentleman, to the House and to the mineworkers consortium: the choice is not for me but for British Coal. I am glad that an independent operator may be given the chance to work these reserves if the necessary conditions can be guaranteed, but the choice between competing applicants is not one for me to make.

Mr. Malcolm Bruce: I accept that, but does not the Minister accept that British Coal may be compromised? The Government have made it clear that it is to be privatised. They have also said that it will continue to be the licensing authority for private coal pits. Does not that leave British Coal in a position in which its judgment of who may be the best operator for a pit may be the one likely to be the least successful, or at least less of a threat, not the one who might operate in the best interests of competition, the local community or the wider economy? Should not the Government transfer the licensing role from British Coal to the Secretary of State as soon as possible?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: We are working within the statutory framework of the 1946 nationalisation legislation. Until it is altered by this House, it would be quite wrong for us to suggest that any other body could act as a licensing authority. However, when we bring our proposals for the privatisation of the industry before the House, it will be entirely appropriate to deal with matters such as this. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will support our efforts to give outside independent private miners and mining companies opportunities to exploit British Coal reserves. But that is a matter for another debate.

I noticed that the hon. Member for Gordon failed to answer my earlier point, which was that the Liberal Democrat party poses as a friend of coal—he did this evening—but the environmental document recently published by that party is extremely enthusiastic about a carbon tax and makes it clear that such a tax would bite most savagely on the combustion of coal. The economic and industrial implications of a carbon tax are discussed in the latter part of that document, but it is entirely silent on the question of the coal industry.

Not only would the Liberal Democrat proposals be highly damaging to the industry that the hon. Gentleman purports to support, but his document fails to discuss the issue at all. So I take his professed support for the British mining industry with a large pinch of salt.

Other hon. Members have rightly discussed coal research and development, a subject which formed an important part of the Select Committee's deliberations. I hope that hon. Members will therefore welcome the fact that last year we initiated a major review of the United Kingdom's coal research requirements in the longer term. We set up a coal task force, which was the Department's advisory committee on coal research, and it produced a consultation document in August.

That has already led to a large number of comments from overseas as well as from the United Kingdom industry. The report has been generally well received, and it certainly deals with the anxieties expressed this evening in favour of research being long-term. Research and development carried out in the United Kingdom should certainly be conducted in a framework that includes the long-term implications of coal burn.

At present, we are reviewing the comments that we have already received, and in the course of next year we shall publish a considered response to the coal task force. It gives the strategic direction referred to in the debate.

I emphasise that we are not standing still while we await the outcome of that review. In partnership with British industry, British Coal and overseas agencies, we have recently launched five new clean coal projects with a contract value of about £20 million, bringing the total contract value of coal research and development to more than £100 million. Further projects are at the planning stage, and announcements will be made in due course.

We believe strongly that collaboration between the Government, the coal industry and the rest of British industry is essential, not only to attract additional money for coal research but also for the technical and commercial skills that it can bring.

Reference has been made to the need for demonstration plants. We have already established an industrial working party, drawn from British Gas, the electricity generators and other plant manufacturers, to examine prospects for an integrated gasification combined cycle demonstration plant.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to Grimethorpe and the need to complete the research there. It is not true that the Department has delayed the development of the topping cycle at Grimethorpe and elsewhere. In fact, my Department found £3·7 million at short notice last year to keep the project on schedule. An important feature of that research is that we are working closely with other partners, in particular PowerGen, GEC Alsthom and British Coal, to decide the most appropriate next steps.

Mr. Eadie: Has the Minister had any discussions on the closure of the Westfield plant in Scotland, which was manufacturing synthetic gas from coal?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I am aware of that closure and the experiments and research carried out there. There is no immediate prospect of large-scale funding from my Department, but we remain interested, and if industrial partners come forward to carry that research to another stage, my Department will be interested in encouraging that.

The hon. Member for Rother Valley (Mr. Barron) referred to a reference price for coal. No such request, information or details have been sent to my Department from the Commissioner concerned. However, we understand that the object of a European reference price is not to boost subsidies for coal, but rather to put a limit on them. We remain in touch with the thinking in Europe about a reference price, but the hon. Gentleman is wrong to suggest that proposals have been made. At this stage, no such proposals have been made.

No one pretends that in the years ahead the coal market will be easy. If faces severe environmental and economic pressures. We accept that the Government have a role in ensuring an adequate collaborative research and development programme, and I have instanced some of the projects that we are hoping to take forward. We believe that combined with our proposals to return the industry to the private sector after the next election, the outlook for the industry is by no means bleak.

9.53 pm

Mr. Eric Illsley (Barnsley, Central): I am grateful for the opportunity to have a few minutes in which to speak, having been a Member of the Select Committee on Energy which produced the report that we are debating, part of which related to the coal industry's future after 1993. The sad fact is that, at best, the coal industry's future at that time will be uncertain and at worst it will have no future.

The Government have said that, if they are re-elected next year, the coal industry will be privatised, and their advisers have suggested that about 14 collieries will be left if that privatisation goes ahead.

This evening, the House is asked to vote £4 million for the industry's privatisation. Under the present Government, the coal industry does not really have a future, and privatisation is to go ahead without any word of the industry's liabilities after the next general election. They will include concessionary fuel to those beneficiaries who are entitled to it, and the industry's existing liabilities in respect of compensation for industrial deafness claims and so on, which date back a good few years.

The industry has very little in the way of assets. After 1993, it will not even have a production contract unless the generators relax their stand and agree to renew their contracts for substantial tonnages, whereas they have indicated tonnages of half the present figures.

The industry faces problems other than its run down and privatisation. It has a future only if it can sell the coal that it produces, but the power generators made it clear that they do not want its coal, for several reasons. The generators talk about importing coal, orimulsion, and using gas, to force extra concessions from the beleaguered coal industry, such as lower prices. The generators do not want reliance on British coal but diversification and a number of fuel sources.

The generators also want the flexibility to switch from imported to domestic coal. Despite advice from British Coal, the Government are reluctant to accept that once British collieries are closed, they cannot reopen for several reasons—one of which is the economics involved. All that despite the fact that the industry has improved its productivity by more than 100 per cent., and decreased its costs by more than 25 per cent. by closing collieries and reducing manpower.

Private sector generators have only one goal—to increase profits for their new shareholders. To do that, they will burn the cheapest fuel. They will go for cheaper prices and increased profits. Hence the dash for gas—increased gas generation, which has required British Gas to implement a 35 per cent. price increase for some projects suggested for the future. It could not see that enough gas would be available to meet all the new gas projects on the drawing board.

The generators talk about importing gas from Norway and the Soviet Union. The uncertainty in the Soviet Union at least means that gas supplies from that source may not be relied on. We are using a fuel to create a fuel, and wasting it for the sake of short-termism and increased profits.

We have heard also that the power generators will burn orimulsion, because Venezuelan tar sand is very cheap, but it has very high sulphur levels. The hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) said that the generators could burn orimulsion and still remain below their emission targets, because they would be burning gas, which has much lower emission standards. I make the point that the generators are willing to go to the limit—and because orimulsion is cheap, they will burn it, despite the fact that it will produce high emissions.

The Government have deliberately encouraged the coal industry's complete rundown through privatisation. The industry's only answer is further to increase production, to try to reduce its costs. We have heard that opencast production could be increased to reduce costs. That will merely flood the market with coal which the industry will not be able to sell, because the generators do not want it. Consequently, more pits will close as the industry argues that it needs low-cost capacity in a handful of collieries.

Over the past 10 years, the Government have simply allowed the coal industry to be whittled away, leaving the rump of pits mentioned in the Rothschild report. That will happen after 1993, when the generators say, "No, we will not burn 60 million tonnes, or 50 million; we will burn half what we burned in the past."

It being Ten o'clock, MR. SPEAKER interrupted the proceedings, and the Question necessary to dispose of the proceedings was deferred, pursuant to paragraph (4) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates).

MR. SPEAKER, pursuant to paragraph (5) of Standing Order No. 52 (Consideration of estimates), put the deferred Questions on Supplementary Estimates, 1991-92 (Class XIV, Vote 1 and Class V, Vote 9).

CLASS XIV, VOTE 1

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £1,680,076,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1992 for expenditure by the Department of Social Security on non-contributory retirement pensions, Christmas bonus payments to pensioners, pensions etc., for disablement or death arising out of war or service in the armed forces after 2nd September 1939 and on sundry other services, on attendance allowances, invalid care allowance, severe disablement allowance, mobility allowance; on pensions gratuities and sundry allowances for disablement and specified deaths arising from industrial causes; on income support, transitional payment, child benefit, one parent benefit, family credit, and on the vaccine damage payment scheme.

CLASS V, VOTE 9

Resolved,

That a further sum not exceeding £4,000,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges that will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1992 for expenditure by the Department of Energy in connection with the privatisation of the coal industry.

MR. SPEAKER then proceeded to put forthwith the Question which he was directed to put, pursuant to paragraph (1) of Standing Order No. 53 (Questions on voting of estimates, &c.).

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES, 1991-92

Resolved,

That a further supplementary sum not exceeding £1,743,208,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund to defray the charges for civil services which will come in course of payment during the year ending on 31st March 1992, as set out in House of Commons Paper No. 6 of Session 1991-92.

ESTIMATES 1992-93 (VOTE ON ACCOUNT)

Resolved,

That a sum not exceeding £75,069,116,000 be granted to Her Majesty out of the Consolidated Fund, on account, for or towards defraying the charges for defence and civil services for the year ending on 31st March 1993, as set out in House of Commons Papers Nos. 7, 8 and 9 of Session 1991-92.

CONSOLIDATED FUND BILL

Bill ordered to be brought in upon the foregoing resolutions by the Chairman of Ways and Means, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Mr. David Mellor, Mr. Francis Maude, Mrs. Gillian Shephard and Mr. John Maples.

Mr. Francis Maude accordingly presented a Bill to apply certain sums out of the Consolidated Fund to the service of the years ending on 31st March 1992 and 1993: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 11].

Ministerial and Other Salaries

Mr. Speaker: I have not been able to select the amendment on the Order Paper, because it is out of order.

10.1 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John MacGregor): I beg to move

That the draft Ministerial and other Salaries Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 2nd December, be approved.

I am sorry that a small error appeared in the final version of the 1991 order in article 2 on the first page, where an "of" appeared instead of an "or". The necessary correction slip is being issued.

Our proposals for increases to the salaries of Ministers and paid officials in this House are, this year, quite straightforward.

On Monday 2 December, in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Hertfordshire, South-West (Mr. Page), I announced in a written answer all the details of the changes that we envisage. The increase in salaries in this House and in another place would be 4·5 per cent. effective from 1 January 1992. The total cost of those increases would be just over £154,000 in a full year.

Ministers' recent record on pay restraint—and, indeed, that of the past 10 years—has been good. Over the lifetime of the present Government, most Ministers have received increases significantly lower than the increase in average earnings in the economy as a whole. From 1979 to 1991, such average earnings increased by 218 per cent. whereas Commons ministerial salaries increased by between 94 per cent. and 115 per cent. Over the same period, the retail prices index increased by 147 per cent., so there has been a fall in ministerial salaries in real terms. Moreover, ministerial salaries in the Commons have increased more slowly than parliamentary salaries, which, as the House will know, are increasing by 6·5 per cent. from 1 January 1992. There is no doubt that Ministers have given a clear lead in practice in regard to pay restraint.

I believe that the proposals that I have outlined continue to demonstrate the Government's commitment to pay restraint, and I commend the motion to the House.

10.4 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): The burden of the remarks of the Leader of the House was that the increases for Ministers were very modest. My first comment is that the performance of Ministers has also been very modest. Indeed, to say that it has been modest is almost an exaggeration—it has been much less adequate than that.

Of course, by any outside comparisons, Ministers of the Crown are underpaid. I say that in an objective sense, not in support of Ministers in the present Government. But for the fact that the salary of my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition was included in the order, I might be moved to recommend that we vote against it. However, in the circumstances, such a recommendation might be open to misinterpretation, so I shall not recommend such a move to the House.

During their term of office, the Government have been molved—I was going to say "obsessed", but that is perhaps an exaggeration—to pursue arguments about performance-related pay. I can say only that, if the country was asked whether performance-related pay should apply to Ministers of this Administration, it would almost certainly say yes and call for cuts in the salaries of certainly a number of Ministers.

I cannot believe, for example, that people in the country at large think that the Secretary of State for the Home Department has earned any increase in salary in view of his performance in the past few months. If the salary of the Secretary of State for Employment were reduced by just 10p for every job lost in the past 12 months—and that means 580,000 jobs—he would end up having to pay the taxpayer to be able to stay in his post instead of receiving a salary. It will seem strange to some people outside that we should be recommending a salary increase to the Secretary of State for Employment when hundreds of thousands of people are losing their jobs as a result of the disastrous performance of the Government's employment and industrial policies.

We shall not divide the House on the order. The Leader of the House said that the salary recommendations were modest. I say that the Government's performance is equally modest, and I am sure that people outside this place are looking forward to the opportunity to hold their own review of the Government's performance when the general election comes. I have no doubt what the outcome of that review will be.

10.6 pm

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): There are three component parts to the order. The third gives you, Mr. Speaker, an increase and I have no quibble with that. The second gives an increase to the Leader of the official Opposition and to the Labour Chief Whip. Although I do not quibble about either of those two gentleman being paid more, I agree with the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) about the general issue of salaries. The first and largest in terms of its consequences for the public Exchequer means that Ministers of the Crown should be paid more.

I have been advised that, although it was in order to table an amendment to try to reduce the salary of a Minister of the Crown, it was unlikely that it would be in order for it to be called. I understand that the procedure has been changed in recent years to make that an impossibility, which seems to be a protective mechanism for the Government. Therefore, one has to deal with the issue generally rather than specifically. By contrast, there have been debates in the House in which one has been able to move a reduction in ministerial salary. I think that the most recent was in relation to the Lord Chancellor, whose salary is dealt with in a different way.

I share the Lord President's view that one cannot criticise the general principle of the amount of the increase. It is a modest increase in view of the annual and average rate of increase across the board. I do not dissent from the view that Ministers—and I include Members of Parliament—should be paid relatively more. I believe that, relatively, the amount that they earn is still inadequate to recompense them for the importance of their job and their functions.

As the hon. Member for Copeland rightly said, it is an anomaly that there is no way in which the House can make a judgment on the link between Ministers' performance and pay. Ministers are carefully protected from that.

It is even more inconsistent for the Government to make a virtue out of performance-related pay. They always defend pay rises for highly paid chief executives of the now privatised but formerly public industries as justified by the importance of their jobs. When we complain about the salary increase for the boss of British Telecom or for the boss of British Gas, we are told that it is because they do an important job and deserve to be well paid. Many people have been relatively inadequately paid all the time. The great tragedy of the Government is that the gap between the top 10 per cent. and the lowest 10 per cent. has widened consistently. We are a far less equal society than we were in 1979, 1983 or 1987. There should be performance-related pay.

I put it on record in an objective way that leaders of parties other than the principal Opposition party should have a compensating increase above the allowance of the ordinary Member of Parliament. I do not include only the leader of my party, but the leaders of other parties, perhaps parties over a certain size. If we expect democracy to function and to flourish, there is a strong argument for that.

I understand the historical reasons why the Leader of the Opposition has a different status in the House from the status of the leaders of other parties, but there were often not so many other parties as there are now, and the logic of increases being given only to the Leader of the Opposition and the Opposition Chief Whip—apart from yourself, Mr. Speaker—is now historic, and the anomaly should be corrected.

The hon. Member for Copeland cited two examples. There is a failure in the system if it does not allow us to challenge the way in which Ministers increasingly hang on to office, no matter how poor their performance in specific areas. My amendment illustrates my case. No matter how serious the breach of convention, there is no possibility that a Minister in this Government will resign for a constitutional failure. It seems that that is now an historically unrecognised position.

The most relevant examples have appeared in the Home Secretary's most recent year in office. I make no personal comment about him. One may consider a Minister to be a perfectly pleasant bloke or woman, but that is not the point. The point is how he or she does his job. We are all accountable.

It has been an extraordinary year in the life of the Home Secretary since last November. I agree entirely with the hon. Member for Copeland that, if the public were asked tomorrow to judge how much each Cabinet Minister should be paid, and if they were paid according to the public's perception of how well each did his job, it would be a salutary lesson for the Government because they might discover that some Ministers would be paid very little.

I do not attribute the general rise in crime to the Home Secretary, although I attribute to him the increasing numbers in prisons, the inability to deal with that problem and the inability to cope properly with the law and order issue. The Home Secretary has had several run-ins with the courts on Government immigration policy. In March, the High Court asked him to review a decision to return an asylum seeker to Togo. In May, he said that he did not intend to introduce legislation to curb dangerous dogs, but then he decided to do so. In July, two IRA prisoners escaped from Brixton prison. One shot a friend of mine,

Malcolm Kemp, the driver of the car that was attacked outside the prison when he and his wife were on their way——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is outside the scope of the order.

Mr. Hughes: With respect, Mr. Speaker, I seek to address how we judge the record of Ministers, and I am giving examples. I accept that I may have extended that example too far. The prison escape was so significant that the Home Secretary returned from his holiday because of it. Things then became even more suspicious when we heard that someone had been planted in Brixton prison as part of an escape advisory service for prisoners.

We then had a summer of joyriding, followed by an announcement at the Tory party conference that there would be legislation to deal with that, and a Queen's Speech which suggested that there would not be any legislation. Then, in the past two or three weeks——

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): Rubbish.

Mr. Hughes: It is not rubbish——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Whether or not it is rubbish, it is wide of the order.

Mr. Hughes: The Home Secretary said that he would do one thing, but he did not do it until he was chased. As the House knows, in the past two weeks—at the very end of the year—the right hon. Gentleman was told off by the Court of Appeal. There were many protests across the House about the fact that the Home Secretary is the first Cabinet Minister ever to be held guilty of contempt of court. It has yet to be seen, of course, whether that decision will be borne out by the House of Lords. Nevertheless, the Home Secretary was criticised by the court and, in the same fortnight, refused to implement the law on Sunday trading.

There may be other examples, but if ever, in any one year, there could be more reasons for saying that somebody has failed the duty of his office——

Mr. Gale: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is this discussion about Sunday trading in order and, if it is, may I join it?

Mr. Speaker: I have a suspicion that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) is coming to a close.

Mr. Hughes: As so often, Mr. Speaker, you are correct.

If ever there was a case for being able to ask whether a Minister should stay in office, that must be a good example of it. It is a failure of the House that there is no way in which we can challenge a Minister's entitlement to his full salary if he does not do his job properly. I hope that the next Tory party manifesto will contain a pledge to the effect that performance-related pay will be applied to Ministers as well as to the rest of the economy. That might improve their performance considerably.

Mr. MacGregor: This has been a brief debate, so I shall make a brief response. The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) made two main points. I note that he thinks that Ministers—and Members of Parliament generally—are underpaid for the responsibilities that they carry. One way of dealing with that point in relation to Ministers' pay would be for the Top Salaries Review Body to undertake another review of Ministers' pay. That has not been ruled out, but none is planned at present.

In answer to the hon. Gentleman's point about my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, I shall certainly not stray into all the policy issues that were raised, in view of what you have said, Mr. Speaker, but I totally reject the hon. Gentleman's charges against my right hon. Friend. My right hon. Friend has made his position on the escapes absolutely clear, and has totally justified it.

The hon. Gentleman was completely wrong about the Dangerous Dogs Act and the Aggravated Vehicle-Taking Bill. As he knows, there were an increasing number of cases involving dangerous dogs, and my right hon. Friend acted extremely speedily to draft legislation that was not easy to draft, and to push it through the House quickly, with the full support of all hon. Members. That was prompt action.

My right hon. Friend announced his intention to introduce legislation to deal with aggravated vehicle taking at our party conference. The legislation was not included in the Queen's Speech—many Bills are not—because we were still involved in drafting what proved to be a complicated piece of legislation, but that has been done—and done quickly. The legislation has now gone through the House.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey is therefore completely off beam on both those points. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary acted promptly, and a great deal faster than is sometimes the case for other urgent matters requiring legislation.

The hon. Gentleman was also wrong to suggest that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary should implement the law on Sunday trading. That is a matter for my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. He made his position clear, rightly and fairly, in the House the other day, so I reject the charges——

Mr. Gale rose——

Mr. MacGregor: I do not want to become involved in a debate on Sunday trading, and I reject the charges absolutely.

Mr. Gale: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for giving way on that precise point. I speak as one who opposes Sunday trading. Does my right hon. Friend recall that our right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General came to the House to announce that he did not intend to take action on Sunday trading because the matter was before the European Court, and is it not the Liberal party that wants all our laws to be made in Europe?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend makes a fair point.

My final point relates to the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham). He posed a hypothetical question about the public response on Ministers' performance. Indeed it was hypothetical. When the country is asked who should head the negotiations at Maastricht, people give a clear answer, as we saw in recent polls. By a substantial majority, they support my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary. People have shown clearly that they have faith in my right hon. Friends and do not have faith in the hon. Gentleman's colleagues on the Opposition Front Bench.

Dr. Cunningham: Clearly the right hon. Gentleman has not seen the news of tomorrow's poll—or perhaps he has seen it and is ignoring it. The greatest criticism of the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) should have come from the Leader of the House, but perhaps I understand why he did not make it. The hon. Gentleman seems to want to remove the Government one Minister at a time. It will be quicker and far better for the country for them all to be removed together.

Mr. MacGregor: I am happy to await the verdict on that matter. Meanwhile, there is general agreement this evening that the House should proceed to pass the order. Therefore, I am happy to sit down.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Ministerial and other Salaries Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 2nd December, be approved.

PETITION

Human Rights (Kashmir)

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): On Human Rights Day, I am proud to present a petition signed by 2,600 Bradford citizens of Kashmiri and non-Kashmiri origin, including Councillor Amin Qureshi of Bradford.

The petitioners remind the House that the United Nations Security Council passed resolutions declaring that the final disposition of the state of Jammu and Kashmir would be made in accordance with the will of the people, expressed through the democratic method of a free and impartial plebiscite conducted under the auspices of the United Nations. Whereas both Lord Mountbatten and Mr. Nehru solemnly promised that a referendum would be held, and whereas the Indian security forces now occupying Kashmir have perpetrated gross and persistent violations of the human rights of the people of Kashmir, the petitioners pray that your honourable House will condemn the systematic mass murders, torture, arson and rape by the Indian forces of occupation in Kashmir; promote international efforts to help refugees fleeing Kashmir and to relieve the hardship and suffering of the people who remain in the territory; demand that India permit Amnesty International and other international human rights agencies to enter Kashmir, with a view to investigating and reporting human rights violations; and calls for the withdrawal of India's armed forces and security forces from the State of Jammu and Kashmir and their replacement by an interim United Nations Administration with the task of restoring law and order, and as soon a practicable, conducting the said plebiscite.

I am extremely proud to present this petition.

To lie upon the Table.

Poll Tax (Enforcement Procedures)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

10.23 pm

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): One of the central features of the hearing that saw me expelled from the Labour party on Saturday was my attitude to the poll tax and my work in the past three years to defend those who are unable to pay, by welding together with many others that force, which resulted in not only the demise of the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), the former Prime Minister, but the Government's biggest climbdown in their 12 years by abandoning what the right hon. Member for Finchley called the flagship of the third term of the Tory Government.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): The third Reich.

Mr. Terry Lewis (Worsley): Yes, the third Reich.

Mr. Nellist: Perhaps, more accurately, if not the third Reich, as my hon. Friends, whom I am still happy to call my hon. Friends, have just said, certainly the Titanic of that regime.

It is even more apposite to stand here this evening and to begin a short debate on the poll tax and its enforcement procedures on a day when attitudes have hardened in Scotland and a headline has apparently appeared in the Evening Times, "Poll tax war in Glasgow streets."

I realise that the Minister speaks on environment matters not for Scotland but for England and Wales. However, today 1,000 people in one of the poorest boroughs in western Europe stood in solidarity outside the homes of those who are unable to pay the poll tax, to attempt to stop an especially pernicious and mediaeval barbarity called poinding, which is the theft of items from people's homes by what we would call bailiffs, but by what are referred to in Scotland as sheriff officers, to sell those goods—often at a fraction of their value—to try to meet civil debt.

Of the 1,000 people, 29 were arrested. Although some were young, there were also a number of middle-aged men and women—a cross-section of working-class people—who stuck together on the cold streets of Glasgow. I think that it is the first time that sheriff officers, without any provocation from protesters, have called in the police in Strathclyde in that way. It marks a hardening of attitudes in Scotland on the enforcement of the poll tax. It is one year ahead of England and Wales on enforcement of the poll tax.

Strathclyde—a Labour authority—like many others, has promised, using the terms of the legislation and almost the words of the Secretary of State for the Environment, that only "wilful" non-payers, who can pay but refuse to do so, would ever have the full weight and majesty of the law thrown at them.

One of the people who was being protected in Springburn today—whose door the sheriff officers threatened to kick down—was an old woman who was wheelchair-bound. A large proportion of those suffering the ultimate sanction of imprisonment in England and Wales, have not been people on high salaries, whom Ministers and Tory MPs like to categorise as the only ones involved in the battle against the poll tax. In Scotland, England and Wales, the poorest and weakest are hardest hit by the poll tax and by the oppressive, authoritarian and barbaric measures of enforcement which are now being deployed.

In Britain, the final sanction is imprisonment, but it is ironic when one considers the expense. I do not know the value of goods collected today. I am told that one door went in and about £150-worth of goods were brought out. I should like to see the figures tomorrow showing how much police time and the time of sheriff officers, court and council officials was spent to get £150-worth of goods out of that person's home.

Where is that effort on a Sunday? I know that you ruled that Sunday trading was wide of the mark in a previous debate, Mr. Speaker, so I shall make only a slight diversion for a sentence or so. Where were the V formations and the special patrol groups in B and Q and Sainsbury on Sunday, enforcing the Shops Act 1950, in the same way that 25,000 hours of court time has been spent in England and Wales in the past 15 months to enforce poll tax legislation? If the same tests were applied to that legislation as Ministers have apparently said should be applied to the Shops Act, millions of people voting with their feet by ignoring it, millions of people have certainly voted with their feet on the poll tax.

We know why B and Q and Sainsbury do not get attacked in that way. Perhaps it is because B and Q put on dances for agents at Tory party conferences and Sainsbury has representatives at ministerial level.

The poll tax is unenforceable and uncollectable in Scotland—after three years, 64 per cent. of the population have not paid, and in Strathclyde 84 per cent. have not paid. Out of 3·7 million adults, 2·5 million have received sheriff's warrants. The figures are also huge in England and Wales. The best description is that they are of herculean proportions.

The Home Office has admitted to me—it took a while to get the figures readily—that, in the 18 months from 1 April 1990 to 30 September 1991, 8,023,621 people in England and Wales were summonsed to court, and 195,845 had turned up, taking up 23,558 hours of court time. That is what the Prime Minister meant, shortly after he came into office, having seen the right hon. Lady deposed, when he told a Back-Bench Tory committee that the poll tax was uncollectable and unenforceable. Up to the end of September in England and Wales, 195,000 people had turned up in court to tell the magistrates why they could not and would not pay the poll tax. Committal warrants for prison have been issued in respect of 2,815 of those people.

Although the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment will be replying to the debate, I asked the Home Office only a few days ago for comparable figures for the five years before the poll tax of the number of people who had not paid their rates. It did not collect the figures. I am not surprised; it did not want a comparison. The citizens advice bureaux did a survey in 1987, which showed that 370 people were summonsed and given committal warrants for non-payment of domestic rates. That is about 15 per cent. of the number of committal warrants issued so far in connection with the poll tax, with only one fifth or one sixth of local authorities moving down that road.

The latest figures show that 54 local authorities have sought to gaol 152 people. As of tonight, 115 have served sentences. Again we are told that they are deceitful and wilful non-payers—not people who cannot afford to pay. Let us hear an explanation when 30 were unemployed, 15 were pensioners, and three were on invalidity benefit.

Let us hear an explanation of why, a fortnight ago in Stroud, 22-year-old Maria Jones, having offered £5 a week out of her £42 a week benefit and having explained that she was 31 weeks pregnant, was still sentenced to 60 days in prison. Let us hear what her major crime was. Let us find why Richard Northover, so far the oldest person to go to prison, was sent there, not for not paying the poll tax—he had paid it—but for not having filled in the registration form two years ago. He got 28 days in HMP Dorchester at the age of 80.

Other pensioners of that age have been put away. Bill Jones, from St. Helens, was taken into HMP Walton—the same prison in which my good friend and comrade, the hon. Member for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields), served 58 days of a sentence in principled opposition to the sentencing of pensioners and those who cannot afford to pay the poll tax. When Bill Jones arrived at Walton, what happened? Bill is old; he is also a war veteran; he is a diabetic and he has only one leg. So they collapsed his wheelchair, gave him a firefighters' lift up the stairs and put him in a cell. Bill has voted Tory all his life—another little irony. I do not think that he will be voting Tory after that experience.

Pensioners have had heart attacks in Preston and other prisons. None of this is to collect money. If we take the costs of imprisonment, the National Association for the Care and Resettlement of Offenders says that prisoners cost an average of £47 per day. It is not long before that is no longer cost-effective when the poll tax debt is £200.

There are too many poll tax prisoners. I have dealt with a number of cases with the Home Office, particularly in Kent, where people have been kept in police cells for some days. One was there 15 days. According to NACRO, the average cost of keeping prisoners in police and court cells is £220 a day. It costs only £190 a night to stay at the Ritz. Keeping a prisoner in a police cell for one day usually costs more than the entire bill the prisoner is fighting.

There are other examples, such as 69-year-old Ron Cassidy from Northumberland, near where I come from. He is a star dominos player in his local pub, where his team used to win every night. Two nights in a row they lost, so they went looking for Ron. They found him in Durham maximum security prison. He owed £62 poll tax and they put him away for 90 days in that prison—a day in prison for every 69p that he owed.

What about the Guinness scandal? What happened to Ronson? Eight million quid went in that scandal, but he got one day in prison for every £30,000 that he owed. He was not sent to a maximum security prison, but to an open prison. He was entitled to remission, and parole. Poll tax is a civil debt, however, and there is no remission and parole—one serves the full sentence when one is put away. Ronson got that parole and remission, and when he got out he was invited to dinner with the Queen Mother. No poll tax prisoner has received a letter from the royal family inviting him to dinner.

Mr. Cryer: My hon. Friend has illustrated powerfully the double standards employed by the Government to deal with ordinary people and those in the City. My hon. Friend should accept from me that his powerful case is ample justification for his award as Back Bencher of the year and why I believe that a serious error was committed in West Bromwich on Saturday.

Mr. Nellist: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for putting that on the record.

Many of those who have been sent to prison rely on income support alone. Others, such as pensioners, are on fixed or low incomes. Some have no income. A number of women with no income have been sent to prison because they were unable to pay the poll tax.

No doubt the Minister will tell us that safeguards were built into system when income support was increased to cover the 20 per cent. of poll tax for which everyone is liable. That support was based on the false assumption that it covered the rise in real poll tax levels as opposed to the notional, national averages. It was also based on the even worse assumption that the actual level of income support in April 1990 was sufficient for people to live on in the first place.

Four years ago, I argued with the then Secretary of State for Health and Social Security about the Fowler review, which led to cuts in income support. A 33-year-old widow with four children in my constituency lost free school meals and housing benefit—a total loss of £25.

Millions of people lost as a result of those cuts, but the difference between their anger and that felt by those in the poll tax battle is glue. In the anti-poll tax struggle, nearly 2,000 groups emerged, and at its peak we had 25 groups in Coventry. Those groups welded people together and provided collective community action. People did not have to face the problem alone as they do so often when it comes to social security benefit cuts.

In April 1990 the amount of income support was not sufficient for people to live on, so the increase to cover the 20 per cent. poll tax charge was not sufficient. Thorough research conducted by Newcastle polytechnic has been passed on to me by the Rev. Paul Nicholson, who has done sterling work to highlight the problems of those on income support. He has also opposed the imprisonment of those unable to pay their poll tax.

The research revealed that, in April 1990, the income support—including the supplement to cover 20 per cent. of the poll tax—for a family of two adults and two primary school children who use the cheapest form of fuel and do not "waste" their income through smoking and drinking, constituted two thirds of the minimum sum experts have identified as sufficient to meet their living requirements. Those who were compelled to use oil for heating and enjoyed a drink and a smoke received an income support entitlement that was just over half of what experts identified as necessary to meet their requirements.

The Secretary of State has refused to answer my questions on this matter. The Government trumpet the £140 reduction, but the reduction given to those on income support is inadequate and does not match the needs of those in receipt of that money.

In conjunction with the Home Office, the Department of the Environment should issue a circular immediately to every magistrates court. I do not know whether the rules and procedures governing magistrates' decisions on poll tax cases have been communicated to them in a proper training package. I have tabled parliamentary questions about that, but I have received no proper answers. The Secretary of State should issue an instruction tonight to all magistrates to the effect that they have the power to remit the payment of the poll tax for anybody who cannot afford to pay. It should be their automatic policy from tonight that anyone in receipt of income support or low incomes equivalent to income support—and, say, 50, 60 or 70 per cent. above those levels—should automatically have their poll tax debts remitted.

I now intend to bring before the House a series of private Member's Bills. The first will be designed to bring English and Welsh law into line with Scottish law, which four years ago, under the Debtors (Scotland) Act 1987, abolished in Scotland the medieval barbarity of putting people in prison for civil debt. That law should apply in England and Wales as well. Were it to do so, literally hundreds of thousands of people would tonight not be sitting at home frightened about whether they might be dragged into the courts and on to prison.

Many people have been forced, when trying to pay the poll tax, into choosing between food, fuel and clothing and paying the tax. In 1991, we should not be making the poorest in society the scapegoats for a policy that even every Tory Member admits is dead, is dying and should be abolished. We could do something tonight by having the Minister announce that magistrates will stop putting in prison people who cannot pay their poll tax. He should seek immediate discussions with the Home Office with a view to having the law altered, to bring English and Welsh law into line with Scottish law.

I ask the Minister to do one more thing for those millions of families, many of whom are part of that 250,000 who are more than six months in arrears with their mortgage repayments, who fear that their homes will be taken from them and who have paid the poll tax. They have been responsible locally, particularly in areas of the highest deprivation, and they are paying surcharges to local councils of £20, £50, £70 and more a year for those who cannot pay the poll tax. Those who have paid have been surcharged. That should be on the national Exchequer, not on those locally who are trying to make ends meet.

I am grateful for the opportunity to put those arguments before the House. I do not expect much joy from the Minister tonight, but I give warning that, for the time I remain on these Benches, with the label on which I came here eight and a half years ago—as a Labour Member of Parliament, albeit a Member who has a label beneath his name on the TV as an expelled Labour Member—I shall bring before the House the necessary measures not just to talk about the death of the poll tax but to bury it once and for all.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Robert Key): I congratulate the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) on his success in raising an important issue on the Adjournment. I also congratulate him on winning The Spectator's Back Bencher of the Year award. I fundamentally disagree with his proposition, although I congratulate him on the stand that he has taken for his principles. Many parliamentarians would also congratulate him, however strongly they might disagree with him.

The hon. Gentleman illustrated his argument graphically, and so shall I. No hon. Member will forget the riots in Trafalgar square and elsewhere in the country that were provoked by those opposed to a system of taxation endorsed by Parliament. Nor will we forget those hon. Members who were regarded as the darlings of the rioters. Whatever justification there may have been 600 years ago for riot and revolt, there was never such justification today. The House will recall just how often in recent years the hon. Gentleman was compared to Wat Tyler, leader of the peasants' revolt of June 1381. They have precious little in common, except that they both worked in the construction industry before journeying to London.

I begin my answer to the hon. Member by reminding the House that those who ignore history are destined to repeat it. I will show why the hon. Gentleman has achieved nothing of any worth or substance by his protest. Tyler was a mob leader. He would have been quite at home in those Trafalgar square riots. He and his comrades sacked and pillaged their way from Rochester to Canterbury, from there to Lambeth palace and Southwark. They dragged Archbishop Sudbury from the chapel in the Tower of London and plundered and slaughtered their way through London. They, too, felt strongly about prisons. They incited prison riots, burned prisons down and sacked and burned John of Gaunt's splendid palace of the Savoy. Was history repeating itself when The Spectator magazine recently perpetrated the huge joke of wining and dining the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East on his success as Back Bencher of the Year at today's Savoy palace?

Wat Tyler was defeated by the courage and judgment of his king—a boy of 14—and the wisdom of Parliament. History surely repeats itself in the poll tax rebel's end. Wat Tyler was struck down and fatally injured by the sword of the loyal Lord Mayor of London, whose name is commemorated in time-honoured fashion. In the road named after him, today's so-called tribunes of the people decided to bring to an end the antics of the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East. The Lord Mayor who saved the king and all that he stood for was William Walworth. The young king had made concessions to appease the rioters and prevent further loss of life and bloody rioting, but within a year, they were revoked by Parliament, and no permanent results were obtained by Wat Tyler's poll tax revolt. None have been obtained by the hon. Gentleman, either.

The legislation ensures that people have a statutory right to pay the community charge in manageable instalments. The community charge regime is an improvement on domestic rates in that respect. On receipt of a bill, the charge payer is given a specified date by which he or she should pay each instalment. The date governing the first instalment cannot be sooner than 14 days after the issue of the bill.

If an instalment is not paid, a reminder is issued. That requires the outstanding instalments to be paid within seven days. The authority may issue a second reminder notice, but it is under no obligation to do so. Charge payers are therefore given at least two opportunities to pay their community charge instalment.

If, following the issue of the reminder, the charging authority still does not receive payment, the right to pay by instalments is lost and the charge payer becomes liable to pay the authority the full amount of community charge outstanding for the remainder of the year. That sum must be paid to the authority within a further seven days.

If payment is still not received, the authority will take enforcement action against that person to ensure that the required sum is paid. To start that procedure, the authority applies to a magistrates court for a summons. The summons requires the person to attend the court to explain to the magistrate why the sum has not been paid.

If the bill and the reminder notice have been issued in accordance with the regulations and the charge is still outstanding, the magistrate must issue a liability order to the council so that it can take action against the defaulter. That order is made for the aggregate of the sum payable and for costs incurred by the charging authority and the court in obtaining and issuing the order.

Once the order has been issued, the charging authority has a number of recovery options available to it. We have strengthened and widened those powers compared with those that were available to authorities for the enforcement of the old domestic rates. Under the rates, the only means of enforcement available were to distrain and sell the ratepayer's goods in order to discharge the debt or, if insufficient goods were found, to apply for a committal warrant. Both remedies apply in the case of the community charge and will apply to the council tax.

In relation to the community charge, we have given authorities the powers to attach a defaulter's earnings or to ask the Department of Social Security to make deductions from income support payments. Those remedies were added because we believe the payment of debt by manageable amounts to be more civilised than distraint. Those are powerful additions to an authority's enforcement battery. They will also apply to the collection of the council tax.

Mr. Nellist: First, will the Minister give an assurance tonight that his Department will start to collect statistics on the attachment of earnings orders and how many have been collected or returned? I have asked for those figures, and apparently none exist. Secondly, why is there imprisonment in England and Wales when the Government abolished it four years ago in Scotland? Why are there two different systems of law?

Mr. Key: That is an historical question, which the hon. Gentleman should address to the Secretary of State for Scotland. I have answered parliamentary questions from the hon. Gentleman when I have been able to do so. Where the information was not available, I was obviously not able to do so.

On imprisonment and so-called amnesties, it is illegal and irresponsible to withhold payment of the community charge. Such action merely deprives authorities of funds that they need to provide services enjoyed by the whole community. It also transfers the debt to those law-abiding charge payers who pay their charge, many of whom will be earning considerably less than hon. Members who chose to default.

The Government have made it clear on a number of occasions and I repeat it now: there will be no amnesty for non-payers. People must realise that local authorities will pursue non-payers until they have secured payment, however long it takes. The introduction of the council tax will not mean that people who have not paid their community charge can forget about it. If they still owe their local authority money, they must pay it: they will not be let off the hook.

As I explained earlier, the community charge procedures give charge payers every opportunity to pay their community charge. Enforcement action can be stopped at any stage by the payment of the amount due. If a charge payer is in financial difficulties but is prepared to offer to pay off any arrears at a reasonable rate, most authorities will accept such arrangements. However, if someone wilfully refuses to pay the charge, it is right that he should have to pay the price for his illegal action. In those circumstances, a magistrate can sentence someone to a maximum of three months in prison. So far, only a tiny minority of the 36 million law-abiding charge payers in this country have chosen to face that ultimate sanction. Most of them did so to make a political point and to gain publicity.

The hon. Gentleman has made much of the power of imprisonment for non-payment. He has pointed to the difference between the treatment of offenders in Scotland and England, and said that the Scots do not imprison defaulters following their acceptance of the Scottish Law Commission's report, which recommended that civil imprisonment for the non-payment of rates and taxes should be abolished.

The collection position in Scotland is far worse than in this country. The Scottish National party must take much of the blame for the lack of payment in Scotland. They have irresponsibly encouraged people to withhold payment, and then at the eleventh hour they have made payments, leaving those poorer people who were foolish enough to follow their appalling example to face the consequences of now owing a lump sum.

The threat of imprisonment for non-payment of local taxes is not unique to the community charge. It existed under the old domestic rating system, and still exists for those who do not pay rates in Northern Ireland. Among our European colleagues, people in the Netherlands who do not pay local taxes can also be imprisoned.

To deprive someone of their liberty is never an easy decision to make. Imprisonment is a harsh measure that should be used only when every other reasonable avenue has failed. However, I state again that enforcement procedures offer plenty of opportunities for someone to pay their dues and so avoid imprisonment. Before any committal warrant is issued, the magistrates court must hold a means inquiry, and it is only following that that a warrant can be issued.

The courts have shown themselves sympathetic in cases where the charge payer does not have the means to pay. The court will issue such a warrant only where it is satisfied that the failure to pay the charge was wilful or negligent. Those warrants do not necessarily need to be served by the police. A local authority can make its own arrangements to arrest defaulters, which can include the use of bailiffs, and the defaulter must comply with such a warrant from the court.

People who go to prison for non-payment of the community charge do so because they choose to lose their liberty rather than pay the amount that is rightfully theirs to pay. Some Opposition Members have campaigned to stop the imprisonments. We have no wish to see people imprisoned any more than they have, but the law must be upheld. If someone deliberately flouts the law in that manner, they only have themselves to blame for the consequences. I urge all Opposition Members who have not paid their poll tax to do so without delay.

Mr. Terry Lewis: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Key: Of course I shall not give way. There is no question of my giving way——

The Motion having been made after Ten o'clock and the debate having continued for half an hour, MR. SPEAKER adjourned the House without Question put, pursuant to the Standing Order.

Adjourned at seven minutes to Eleven o'clock.

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

SCOTLAND

NHS Trusts

1. Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what action he takes to enforce procedures laid down in national health service circular No. 1975 (GEN) 46.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Michael Forsyth): I have received no complaints regarding health boards' compliance with this or any other circular.

Mrs. Fyfe: I am rather surprised to hear that, because Greater Glasgow health board is very dissatisfied with the lack of consultation over the closure of two wards in Ruchill hospital in my constituency. Will the Minister of State nevertheless assure me that if the move to day care will be to the detriment of those who were receiving in-patient care for endocrine and metabolic problems, he will take action? Will he reassure me about the future of those patients who, until now, have been in the rheumatology unit of Ruchill hospital?

Mr. Forsyth: I am a little puzzled by the hon. Lady's question. I do not see how Greater Glasgow health board can be dissatisfied with the consultation process when it is responsible for——

Mrs. Fyfe: Health council.

Mr. Forsyth: Health council—the hon. Lady has corrected her position. As part of its general consultation process, Greater Glasgow health board consulted in respect of its acute services strategy for Glasgow. It has also carried out secondary consultations in respect of particular services. If the hon. Lady has anxieties, she should address them to Greater Glasgow health board, which is responsible for delivering the service.

Mr. Canavan: Why have Scottish hospital waiting lists increased by more than 4 per cent. in the past year? Why is the worst record in Scotland that of the Forth Valley health board area—which includes the constituency of the Minister of State—where the increase has been more than 24 per cent? If he has no regard at all for the welfare of patients, does he have regard for his job security?

Mr. Forsyth: I am astonished that the hon. Gentleman, as a Member of Parliament in Central region within the Forth Valley health board area, does not know the answer to that question. He will know that the largest increase in waiting lists as published is in respect of the new service and facility that have been provided in Forth Valley. He will also be aware that Forth Valley has expanded the number of treatments provided and, as a result, is offering a better service for patients.

Mr. Canavan: Why are the waiting lists so long?

Mr. Forsyth: The hon. Gentleman should give some credit to that health board and every other health board in Scotland that has managed to increase the numbers of patients treated.

Mr. Canavan: It is the worst record in Scotland.

Mr. Forsyth: If the hon. Gentleman wants to find a worse record in Scotland for waiting lists, he should look at the waiting lists that were left to us by the previous Labour Government.

Knife Assaults

2. Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many people in Scotland have been injured as a result of being assaulted with a knife or pointed article since 1988; and if he will make a statement.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Lord James Douglas-Hamilton): In the period 1 January 1988 to 30 June 1991, 2,370 in-patient discharges were admitted as emergencies having been assaulted by a cutting or piercing instrument. Figures for persons dealt with as out-patient emergencies are not available.

Mr. Marshall: Is not the Minister ashamed and horrified at those disgraceful and scandalous figures? Has he seen the excellent Glasgow Evening Times article of 20 November which highlights that serious problem in Scotland? When will he shake off his complacency and bring the law in Scotland in line with the law in England under section 139 of the Criminal Justice Act 1988? I have been communicating with the Minister since 1988 on that problem. Is not the simple truth that the Government do not give a damn about law and order and do not care about the safety of people in their homes and on the streets?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We are well aware of the facts in that connection and have substantially increased the capital allocations for police forces in Scotland by some £6 million this year, which is an enormous increase. We shall make certain that Strathclyde's bids are carefully considered before making a final allocation. I shall look into the point that the hon. Gentleman makes about an amendment to the law, but the existing penalties go up to life imprisonment for various forms of crime involving knives and the like. The Secretary of State's crime prevention committee is reviewing the position. If Strathclyde increased the number of police officers by 200 to the complement that it deserves, there would be a much stronger law and order policy there.

Mr. Wilson: We all know that there are crimes for which the penalties go up to life imprisonment, but that does not seem to cover the point raised so eloquently by my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, Shettleston (Mr. Marshall). Does the Minister accept that in Scotland, particularly west central Scotland, there is currently an epidemic of violent crime such as armed robbery and the carrying of offensive weapons, including knives? I endorse what my hon. Friend said about the excellent efforts of the Glasgow Evening Times in drawing the matter to our attention. It is astonishing that, when the facts were put to the Minister, he was unable to give the statistics on the number of offences involving knives and other weapons with which stabbings can be carried out. Does the Minister also accept that far too many people in such communities are now living in fear of violent crime? In addition to the rhetoric of law and order, they want action in terms of policing which will enable people to leave their homes in the evening and not be curtailed by fear of violent crime.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: We collect statistics on various crimes such as breach of the peace, vandalism, the carrying of offensive weapons, robbery, petty and serious assaults, attempted murder and murder. The Secretary of State's crime prevention committee is considering how information should be collected and will continue to do so. The hon. Member must remember that the Labour party strongly opposed the police powers of search, which we introduced and which have greatly helped to reduce the incidence of such crimes.

Mr. Bill Walker: How many additional policemen have been provided in Scotland and how much extra money, in real terms, have the Government allocated to law and order since 1979? Will my hon. Friend confirm that, if the Government were to introduce proposals to toughen up sentencing policy—to impose stiffer sentences—we could look forward to Opposition Members agreeing with us for the first time?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes, indeed. It is important that the strongest penalties should be available. I mentioned the sentence of life imprisonment and the unlimited fines that are available for crimes involving knives. The number of police officers has increased enormously during the past 10 years. The important figure is the £6 million extra that will be allocated for capital equipment and buildings to assist police forces this year. The use of high technology will also be of great importance.

Home Improvement Grants

3. Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received about the home improvement grants scheme.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I receive representations from time to time about various aspects of the home improvement grants scheme and its operation; in the main those concern individual cases.

Mr. Darling: Is the Minister aware that there are now thousands of people waiting for home improvement grants, some of whom applied before 1984? Why does the Minister refuse to meet Edinburgh district council and other councils to discuss the crisis? Is not he aware that thousands of people's property will deteriorate unless grants are forthcoming? Why is the Scottish Office so feeble that it is not prepared to go to the Treasury to obtain the funds needed to complete the improvement scheme once and for all?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Edinburgh district council estimated the cost of clearing the backlog at £25·5 million and we made that allocation to it over a two-year period. It used the allocation, came back and said that its original estimate was entirely wrong and it required an extra £48 million—the original estimate was £48 million out. By contrast, Glasgow gave accurate estimates. I can give a commitment to the hon. Gentleman that we shall consider Edinburgh's bid with great care before making the final allocations to local authorities. Some £205 million has been made available to Edinburgh for repairs and improvement grants since 1979. That is a considerable sum; Edinburgh has done well.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend agree that the home improvement scheme has been one of the most successful in Scotland? Does he also agree that the increase this year is extremely valuable and that steps should be taken towards improving houses in rural districts, where improvement grants are particularly valuable and welcome?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Yes, that is extremely important. The rural housing strategy developed by Scottish Homes will also assist. Since the scheme was introduced, £957 million has been made available through it in Scotland to help bring many empty houses back into use and assist in reducing waiting lists.

Mr. Stephen: While welcoming the changes that the Minister has introduced to the home improvement grants scheme for houses affected by high radon levels, may I ask whether he agrees that in cases of severe hardship there should be access to 100 per cent. grants, as is the case in England and Wales?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: That would require legislation. However, what we can do immediately and are in the process of doing is to introduce a statutory instrument to increase the grant level to 90 per cent. That will substantially help those who are in the circumstances that the hon. Gentleman mentions. We have also made it clear that free tests will be available to anybody who wishes to have them in the hon. Gentleman's local authority area. We are conscious of the extent of the problem in the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Sunday Trading

4. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the operation of Sunday trading laws in Scotland.

The Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Ian Lang): The restrictions on Sunday trading contained in the Shops Act 1950 do not apply in Scotland, with the exception of hairdressers and barbers. Although there is almost complete freedom of trade, many traders choose not to do so in response to the prevailing wishes of their local communities. The present arrangements appear to work satisfactorily and I see no reason to alter the present position.

Mrs. Gorman: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. Has he any evidence of a decrease in church-going, an increase in marital break-up or an increase in the number of complaints to industrial tribunals by women who are asked to work on Sunday against their will? If he has no such evidence, does he think that the introduction of Sunday trading in Britain is likely to cause the kind of social and moral breakdown that has been suggested by some advocates of restrictions?

Mr. Lang: I am sure that the problems described by my hon. Friend have increased, but I have no evidence that any such increase is related to shops in Scotland opening on Sunday. I have no plans to change the present arrangements.

Mr. Harry Ewing: Would not it be a good thing to allow barbers to open on Sunday, if only to help the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart)?

Mr. Lang: As ever, the hon. Gentleman takes a great interest in hon. Members this side of the House, but I suppose that from his point of view it is a receding problem.

Western Isles

5. Mr. Macdonald: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the economic situation in the Western Isles.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland (Mr. Allan Stewart): The Western Isles economy has performed relatively well in recent years despite a narrow base and inherent difficulties faced by island economies.

Mr. Macdonald: Does the Minister accept that the islands economy now faces its worst crisis since the war? Does he appreciate the despair and anger felt by the community at the Government's lack of response so far? Whatever the origins of the present crisis, does he agree that the brunt should not fall on the most vulnerable in the community—the elderly, the handicapped and school children? I extend an invitation to the Minister to visit the community. If he cannot accept it, can he at least dispatch a team of Scottish Office officials to see matters on the ground and report back to the Scottish Office on the grim situation faced by the islands?

Mr. Stewart: As the hon. Gentleman knows, my right hon. Friend has granted the islands council consent to borrow up to £24 million during the rest of this financial year. I recognise the effect of the decisions taken by Western Isles council. It is worth recording that before these expenditure reductions were announced Western Isles council received 98·4 per cent. of its expenditure from aggregate external finance—revenue support grant, non-domestic rate income and community charge grants. Only 1·6 per cent. of the expenditure was borne by community charge payers. The hon. Gentleman invited me to visit the area. If I am not able to visit the Western Isles in the near future, I shall certainly act on his suggestion that we should send a team of Scottish Office officials and that will be arranged as soon as is reasonably practicable.

Mr. Wallace: Does the Minister accept that transport costs are of considerable importance to the economy of the Western Isles? My constituents often look with envy at the relatively low freight costs for transport from the Scottish mainland to the Western Isles compared with transport costs from the mainland to the northern isles. When can we expect the Government to announce the subventions for next year? May we expect that the cost of transporting freight from the mainland to Orkney and Shetland will be comparable with the cost of such transport to the Western Isles?

Mr. Stewart: Orkney and Shetland are further from the mainland than the Western Isles, but the answer to the hon. Member's specific question about when an announcement will be made is, shortly.

Homelessness

6. Mr. Hood: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what he is doing to discourage young Scottish homeless from leaving home and living rough in London.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Grants totalling £150,000 over three years are being made to voluntary organisations for projects aimed at dissuading young Scots from drifting to London without making adequate preparation for housing and employment, assisting those in London who want to return to Scotland and supporting the young homeless in Scottish cities. Moreover, tomorrow I shall announce extra capital allocations of £4·137 million for specific projects for homelessness throughout Scotland, and Clydesdale will be one of the 29 authorities.

Mr. Hood: I thank the Minister for his answer. He will be aware that last night, thousands of young Scots slept rough on the streets of London and he may also be aware of the recent statement by the Moderator of the Church of Scotland, who referred to the fact that 25 per cent. of the homeless in London come from Scotland. Is not it a blight on Scotland that we cannot provide homes for our homeless, including those who are still kids? I am pleased to hear that the Minister will announce an increase tomorrow, but £1·2 million will not even look at the problem. Why does not he address the problem seriously and put real money into solving it—or will he continue to opt out and sell out, just as the Prime Minister did for the country in Maastricht yesterday?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: When we made available the special allocation of £3·5 million earlier in the year, eight authorities in Scotland came forward with specific projects that resulted in 700 extra housing units being made available. For that reason, we wish greatly to expand the programme and are doing so. If any authorities do not succeed tomorrow, they may still be considered for a share of the extra allocation of £7·5 million next year. The £50,000 awarded to voluntary organisations is specifically for the purpose of preventing homelessness and dissuading young people from coming to London when they have neither housing nor jobs.

Mr. Maxton: Is not the Minister's attitude smugly complacent in view of the fact that the Shelter survey shows an over 100 per cent. increase in homelessness in Scotland since 1983 and his Scottish office survey shows a 14 per cent. increase last year alone? Although the £4·1 million may be welcome to homeless people in Scotland, the Secretary of State for Scotland announced a £63 million cut in housing generally in Scotland last year and that does nothing to solve the problems of homelessness. Will he now announce an increase in investment in housing in Scotland and, more particularly, persuade the Cabinet to restore benefit to 16 and 17-year-olds in Scotland immediately?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: First, no young person should be without income. As to housing allocations, the hon. Member must bear in mind the fact that the receipts are well up this year, so the gross programme should be considerable. However, there are 26,000 empty council houses, a considerable portion of which could be brought back into use. Local authorities take their statutory responsibilities seriously, so that in 1990-91, 82 per cent. of those assessed as homeless were found permanent accommodation by local authorities. We are giving them maximum encouragement in this direction.

Constitutional Change

7. Mrs. Irene Adams: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will now meet representatives of the Scottish Constitutional Convention to discuss proposals for constitutional change in Scotland.

8. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he intends to meet the Scottish Constitutional Convention to discuss the future government of Scotland.

Mr. Lang: I have no plans to meet the self-styled Scottish Constitutional Convention, whose report fails to address the substantive issues involved in constitutional change in Scotland. But I welcome any participation in the debate I have called for on these issues, provided that it addresses the issues in a realistic way.

Mrs. Adams: Will the Secretary of State recognise that now his party is being called to the debate, not the Opposition? Will he reconsider his decision on meeting members of the Scottish Constitutional Convention, which represents 70 per cent. of the views in Scotland, including the churches, trade unions, the Labour party and the Liberal party? Will he consider bringing the Conservative party, and talking to the Scottish National party to bring it into the Scottish Constitutional Convention so that we can then have a genuine debate on which way the constitution of Scotland should go?

Mr. Lang: I certainly do not intend to fight the Scottish National party's battles for it. The Scottish Constitutional Convention, which I have described in the past as the Labour party at prayer, failed to address any of the substantive issues that would affect Scotland's representation in the House if its proposals came into effect. It took no account of funding arrangements, parliamentary representation at Westminster or the position of the Secretary of State for Scotland, and the members of the convention disagreed among themselves on the number and sex of its members, the method of election and a number of other aspects affecting Scotland's constitutional future.

Mr. McKelvey: Some hon. Members will welcome the partial movement by the Secretary of State for Scotland in as much as we have had the enormous political death-bed confession that he will look at the Scottish situation. But does not he realise that throughout Scotland he and his cronies are seen as a "wee parcel of rogues in a nation who were bought and sold for English gold"?

Why does not he take his head out of the sand and understand Scotland's problems? Scotland as a nation will determine its own sovereignty whether he agrees to it or not and he should be talking to the Scottish Constitutional Convention about the matter.

Mr. Lang: Far from being reluctant to debate the matter, I have invited the Opposition to take part in four debates on matter days in the Scottish Grand Committee to compensate for their failure to make use of those opportunities in the Scottish Grand Committee during the previous parliamentary Session. Far from being unaware of the impact on Scotland of the Scottish Constitutional Convention's proposals, I am aware that Scotland enjoys identifiable public expenditure 22 per cent. per head higher than the rest of the United Kingdom which would be jeopardised by any change in the constitutional arrangements.

Mr. Rowe: It sounds slightly improbable that my right hon. Friend will be called to a meaningful debate on Scottish constitutional matters in the near future, but will he assure Conservative Members that were he to be so he is fully aware that people in England would take it amiss if any proposition were seriously entertained which allowed Scottish Members to decide matters in Scotland and then to have a say in English matters in England?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend identifies part of the problem which those who favour changes in the constitutional arrangements should address. In the event of the changes that the Opposition favour, one wonders whether Scottish questions could take place on the Floor of the House, or whether there would be a Scottish Grand Committee or Scottish Standing Committees.

Mr. Salmond: Both the Secretary of State and the Prime Minister have made clear statements in the past 10 days that if the Scottish people vote for independence at the election, independence is what we shall have, but will the Secretary of State say a bit more today about how he answers the current argument about whether he has the right to run Scotland with nine Members of Parliament and, according to the latest poll, 18 per cent. of the vote? Does he incorporate the votes of everyone who voted Labour or Liberal Democrat at the last election and use that as part of his mandate to enforce his unwanted policies on the Scottish people?

Mr. Lang: At the previous election I stood for election to a United Kingdom Parliament, as did the hon. Gentleman. As a Member of that Parliament, I am a member of the United Kingdom Government and no one has seriously called in question the right or propriety of the United Kingdom Government to govern Scotland, Wales, Northern Ireland and England.

Mr. John Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend agree that a tax-raising Scottish assembly would be the worst thing for Scotland because it would discourage the inward investment which will be encouraged into the United Kingdom by the fact that we are not part of the social charter?

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. The tax-raising powers of such an assembly, which are referred to coyly by Opposition Members as being only marginal, would, even if they raised only 2p in the pound, cost a single man on average wages £4·72 per week. The single man on average wages will think carefully before welcoming such an impost.

Sir David Steel: Does the Secretary of State recognise how arrogant his original answer sounded with its reference to the "self-styled" Scottish Constitutional Convention? Does not he recognise that it is a broadly based representative body in which it was open to the Conservative party to participate and that for him to call now for a debate, once its work is completed, is extraordinary? He is still welcome to join the convention.

Mr. Lang: The right hon. Gentleman can hardly refer to such a body as having the kind of authority with which he seeks to imbue it when it disagreed on a number of matters and failed to address any of the ones that really matter.

Mr. Dewar: May I add my congratulations to the Secretary of State on yet another about-turn? Does he recall that just a few months ago he dismissed devolution as a stale hangover from the 1960s in which there was no public interest? I therefore welcome his belated decision to take part in a full debate and the fact that he is now—I quote him from last week—keen to acknowledge that there is always room for constitutional change. Will he give an assurance that his ideas for reform will be produced before the Scottish Grand Committee debate on the constitution that he proposes? Does he recognise that dialogue is not criticism by Ministers of everyone else's proposals without making any positive contribution themselves?

Mr. Lang: Once again, the hon. Gentleman shows great coyness in approaching debates on the issues that he and his colleagues support. He is trying to set preconditions before agreeing to those debates taking place. I welcome the possibility of debating the proposals of the Opposition parties. They have come forward with plans which, they say, are carefully costed and carefully thought through and represent the interests of the great body of the Scottish people. I wish to explore those proposals, lay bare the dangers which lurk beneath them and identify the threat not only to parliamentary representation from Scotland in this House but to the economic well-being of Scotland if the Labour party were ever in a position to exercise in Scotland the kind of powers that it would give to such an assembly.

9. Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what representations he has recently received about the governance of Scotland; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: A range of representations, both for and against constitutional change in Scotland, has been received.

Mr. Walker: I thank my right hon. Friend for his reply. Does he agree that there is only one place where the constitution of the United Kingdom can be changed, and it is this Parliament? Therefore, debates in this Parliament must address the realities of the constitution that the so-called self-appointed body would have to face such as the West Lothian question, the Goschen formula and the number of Members coming to this House from Scotland? Unless those constitutional proposals are properly, fully and adequately addressed in a manner that both this House and the other place can accept, they are no more than pipe dreams.

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. One of the important issues that would have to be addressed in any new constitutional settlement for Scotland would be the funding arrangements of Scotland within the United Kingdom. On 5 December The Scotsman said:

"Of course, upon devolution there would have to be an adjustment in spending: there is no dispute about that."

I think that the editor of The Scotsman would be surprised to hear the views of Opposition Members on that. However, it is a very important issue which would need to be fully addressed in any debate.

Mr. Eadie: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that the problem is not the West Lothian question but the Westminster question, which will become predominant if, after having just nine Members, his party is left with none, or just two or three?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman is right to identify Westminster as the seat of government. It is the Union of the United Kingdom that would be breached by the sort of proposals that the Labour party identifies. I intend to expose the shortcomings of the Labour party proposals. Moreover, I do not anticipate the general election consequences to which the hon. Gentleman refers.

Mr Worthington: It is clear that the Secretary of State has not a single idea on the issue. If he wants a debate, he must produce some ideas. Part of the government of the United Kingdom consists of local government in Scotland. The Tory party's working party on local government—including Bearsden and Milngavie district council, one of the three Tory district councils—proposes that education, social work, housing, the police, fire, water, sewerage and strategic planning should be removed from local government and transferred either to the Secretary of State or to local prosperous companies, or that they should be privatised. Do the Government agree with those proposals? Is that part of the Secretary of State's proposal for the government of Scotland? Does the Secretary of State agree that when local democracy does not come up with the results that he wants he abolishes it? Is that his policy?

Mr. Lang: Oh dear, the hon. Gentleman is in a muddle. He contradicted himself within his own question by saying that we have no constitutional ideas and then identifying an area on which we are currently consulting with a view to making constitutional changes. Local government reform is important. We were consulting widely on the possible change to a single-tier all-purpose authority structure in Scotland. I do not regard the United Kindom constitution as set in concrete. It is not a written constitution—it is organic, and it can develop change and adapt to the needs of new circumstances. I should be more encouraged if I could identify within the Labour party a consensus for the preservation of the Union.

Steel Industry

10. Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what recent representations he has received from the Scottish steel industry.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend recently received a letter from the chairman of the Scottish Steelfounders Association expressing concern about state subsidies to European steelfounders.

Mr. Oppenheim: Bearing in mind recent noisy Opposition condemnation of steel plant closures, has the Opposition spokesman yet had the guts to give the people of Scotland an unequivocal assurance that, given the chance, they would prevent such closures—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must ask about government policy.

Mr. Oppenheim: Is the Opposition spokesman afraid that people will remember the days before the Government's policy when political meddling led to huge overcapacity, massive losses and the closure of no fewer than three plants under Labour in Scotland alone?

Mr. Stewart: My hon. Friend is absolutely right. No such assurances have been given by the Opposition because it is not possible for them to do so.

Dr. Bray: Is the Minister aware that the recent fall in British Steel profits has made British Steel look again at capital expenditure and ways of economising without damaging future profitability? Will he use this opportunity to ask British Steel to consider modernising the Dalzell plate mill in Motherwell rather than building an expensive new plate mill, which would be less profitable for British Steel?

Mr. Stewart: I have seen speculation about that. Naturally, we would welcome any investment at Dalzell and any decision that extended the plant's long-term prospects. Some time ago the Scottish Office put a submission to British Steel on the case for investment at Dalzell. That submission was given to the trade unions and is public knowledge. We would welcome any positive news on that front.

Mr. Tom Clarke: Is the Minister aware that perhaps there were so few representations to his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State because the steel industry has been decimated in Scotland, especially in Lanarkshire? Does he accept that there should still be a future for the tube division despite the fact that workers are seeing imported tubes used in the North sea when they are capable of making them? To achieve that, there is an essential need for investment and training. That is particularly necessary in Lanarkshire.

Mr. Stewart: Like the hon. Gentleman, I regret the job losses at Clydesdale, which are due fundamentally to overcapacity in seamless tubes. I agree with the hon. Gentleman's general point about the Lanarkshire economy. That is why the Government have provided an extra £28 million for economic regeneration in Lanarkshire in the current year and why up to an extra £25 million will be available to the Lanarkshire development agency, in addition to what it would otherwise have received in 1992-93. I would hope that the hon. Gentleman would agree that many people of all political persuasions in Lanarkshire are working together extremely hard to build a better and more prosperous future for the area.

Agriculture Support

11. Sir Hector Monro: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what increase in financial support is available to farmers in less-favoured areas for 1992; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: Planned programme expenditure on agricultural support in Scotland in 1991-92 was £158 million. Planned expenditure in 1992-93 is £199·5 million—an increase of 26 per cent. The great majority of that support is directed to the less-favoured areas, which include about 90 per cent. of agricultural land in Scotland.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my hon. Friend agree that in recent years the income of farmers in Scotland, particularly those in the less-favoured areas, has fallen substantially? I welcome the recent payment of the suckler cow premium and the ewe premium, but when will the hill livestock compensatory allowance be announced, and will it be increased?

Mr. Forsyth: I agree with my hon. Friend. Farming is in a difficult position and farm incomes have dropped substantially. We increased the HLCAs last year by an average of 14 per cent. I know that my hon. Friend is anxious for a conclusion to be reached for next year, and I hope that it will be possible to do so soon.

As my hon. Friend knows, we have agreed to review the position of hill farming, and I know that the farming union is anxious to assist the Government in recognising the problems facing agriculture.

Mr. Foulkes: Is the Minister aware that when I recently addressed a meeting of the Ayr, Renfrew and Bute Black-Faced Sheep Breeders Association not only was I extremely well received but much concern was expressed about the position of sheep rearers in the area? The association is dissatisfied with Government policy, particularly with the fact that agriculture in Scotland is dealt with by a Minister in the House of Lords. Does the Minister agree that agriculture would be given higher priority and better consideration if it were dealt with by a Minister in this House?

Mr. Forsyth: I hope that the hon. Gentleman did not try to pull the wool over the association's eyes, as he usually does. My noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State addressed a meeting of farmers in my constituency. They were extremely impressed by what he said and were buoyed up by his message that the Government are determined to ensure that the proposals on reform of the common agricultural policy are strongly resisted because they are not in the interests of Scotland's farmers. I imagine that that was one of the matters raised with the hon. Gentleman, and I hope that he was able to assure farmers of the splendid job that my noble Friend is doing for farming in Scotland.

Mr. Andrew Welsh: Does the Minister agree that agriculture is the backbone of the rural economy and that the loss to the Angus economy of more than £1 million due to the closure of Anglia Canners in Brechin is a body blow to agriculture, transport, ancillary industries and the whole community? As that area of high unemployment has now lost 91 full-time jobs and 41 part-time jobs, what action does the Minister intend to take to sort the problem out?

Mr. Forsyth: As the hon. Gentleman will know, much of our agriculture policy is determined at Community level, so the strength of our voice in the Community is important. If the hon. Gentleman had his way and we had an independent Scotland, we would have four votes instead of 10 and our influence in being able to fight for the interests of Scotland's farmers would be less.

Scotland in Europe

12. Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met CBI (Scotland) to discuss the role of Scotland in Europe.

Mr. Allan Stewart: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I have regular exchanges of views with CBI (Scotland) on a variety of matters. Scotland's role in Europe has featured in those exchanges.

Mrs. Michie: Will not CBI (Scotland) take a dim view of the Government's decision to opt out of a commitment to the single currency? Because of the Government's apparent lack of enthusiasm for all things European, and their determination to go along a slow track, will not Scotland lose out again without any chance of the central bank being cited in Glasgow or Edinburgh?

Mr. Stewart: I disagree with the hon. Lady and I have no doubt that CBI (Scotland) would also do so—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—on that matter. In relation to the agreement on social policy at Maastricht, I noted that Jacques Delors has suggested that the United Kingdom will now be a haven for inward investment from the United States and Japan. On this occasion, I agree with Mr. Delors.

Mr. Ian Bruce: Does my hon. Friend agree that the CBI, in Scotland and in the rest of the United Kingdom, is keen to see flexibility in our social standards and would not wish Scotland to be signed up to a social charter restricting the freedom of workers and employers alike, who look forward to continuing to be a magnet for inward investment from Japan and from the rest of the European Community?

Mr. Stewart: As I suggested in my previous answer, I am sure that my hon. Friend is absolutely right. I have no doubt that the agreement that has been reached will enhance the position of the United Kingdom in relation to the creation of enterprise and the attraction of inward investment. I am sure that that view is shared by Scotland.

Mr. Dewar: When considering our relationships with Europe, will the Minister explain to the CBI why agreeing to a social charter which gives protection to the young employed, gives equal status to part-time workers and sets decent standards for maternity leave should be a barrier to prosperity, given the experience of France and of Germany? Why cannot this country afford social justice when the Governments of Portugal and of Greece have no doubt where the balance lies? Is it not shameful that Britain should opt out in that way? Is not the Minister embarrassed that 11 countries are signing a protocol stipulating that the United Kingdom will take no part in the Community's deliberations on the social agenda? Is that not a humiliating prospect for the Edinburgh summit next year?

Mr. Stewart: The hon. Gentleman is talking absolute nonsense, as will be confirmed when my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister makes his statement to the House later this afternoon. I emphasise that I do not believe that it is right to agree to measures which are damaging to the Scottish or to the British economy, and we have not done so. I also emphasise our excellent record on structural funds from the Community, from which Scotland has gained £1·25 billion under this Government.

Homelessness

13. Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what proposals he has for the alleviation of homelessness in Scotland.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: To help Scottish local authorities carry out their statutory duties towards the homeless, we have among other things made available in the current financial year extra capital allocations of £3·5 million announced earlier, and of £4·1 million, the specific allocation of which will be announced tomorrow. We have increased housing support grant so that all local authorities that incur a deficit in running a hostel will qualify for grant. We have issued an updated code of guidance for authorities dealing with applicants under the homelessness legislation. On 6 December, I announced a further £7·5 million capital allocation for projects for 1992-93.

Sir Russell Johnston: Regarding the £4 million, is not telling local authorities that they have to produce schemes within two weeks and that the money has to be spent by March a disorderly way of doing things? If £4 million is divided by the number of district authorities in Scotland, they will have £355,000 apiece. That is a pathetic response to the size of the problem, which is extremely serious in my area.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The hon. Gentleman's own authority in Inverness will be one of those that will benefit. Authorities that feel that they have not benefited sufficiently will be considered for the £7·5 million allocation for next year. I ask the hon. Gentleman to bear in mind all the other sources of public funds that are available. Scottish Homes has brought back into use 1,000 units that it has helped to create in the past two years. Our revised code of guidance has been warmly welcomed by authorities. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is very gratifying to see such an interest in Scottish questions. I ask hon. Members to listen carefully to the questions and answers because they will find them enlightening.

Mr. McFall: The Minister will remember that the Stopover project in my constituency, which was designed to allow 16 young homeless people to stay in the area, was rejected by the Scottish Office last year. Only last month, my council applied for extra funding for another eight young people to be retained in the constituency rather than making the futile trek southwards. Those positive initiatives have the support of the entire council. Will the Minister respond positively by stating that he will grant both applications to allow that small number of people to be retained in my constituency? That would help the problem of homelessness in Dumbarton.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I can tell the hon. Gentleman that his local authority of Dumbarton will benefit. The details will be spelt out tomorrow. I can also tell him that urban aid of £9·7 million has been made available over the years for homelessness projects in Scotland. That comes within the responsibility of my fellow Under-Secretary of State, my hon. Friend the Member for Eastwood (Mr. Stewart), who will have heard what the hon. Gentleman said about further applications.

Defence Industries Initiative

14. Mr. Strang: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many direct employees of Scottish Enterprise are currently working on the defence industries initiative he announced on 14 October 1991; and if he will make a statement on the actions which have so far been taken.

Mr. Allan Stewart: The allocation of Scottish Enterprise staff to particular projects is a matter for the body itself. So far, a survey has been conducted of companies in the defence sector in Scotland and work is in hand to develop the best approach to assisting these companies. The nature of future activity will depend on the outcome of this work.

Mr. Strang: Against the background of the thousands of jobs that have been lost in the defence industries in the past couple of years, and the thousands likely to be lost in the future, is not the Government's initiative wholly inadequate? When will the Minister accept that only when the Government can find new money for research and development, retraining and investment in new facilities will there be a real impact on this serious problem in the Scottish economy?

Mr. Stewart: I do not accept the hon. Gentleman's criticisms for one moment. The key decisions on diversifying in defence-related companies must be taken by those companies. With regard to the work being undertaken by Scottish Enterprise, it is hoped that early in the new year there will be a version of the work being done —not including commercially confidential information. It will show the hon. Gentleman that his criticisms are wholly unjustified.

Mr. Michael J. Martin: The Minister will recall that when he was a Scottish Office Minister before, he offered Springburn a special initiative to help with unemployment. The demise of the defence jobs has added to the difficulties in my constituency, where many workers travel to Yarrow's and to Barr and Stroud. What action is the Minister taking to help with unemployment in the north end of Glasgow?

Mr. Stewart: The primary responsibility for that lies with the Glasgow Development Agency. I know that it is taking a full part in the exercise being undertaken by Scottish Enterprise. I should be happy to discuss any particular problems with the hon. Gentleman at any time.

NHS Trusts

15. Mr. Nigel Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what further representations he has received on hospitals applying for trust status.

Mr. Lang: My hon. Friend the Minister of State and I regularly receive representations, both for and against, on the subject of NHS trusts. I have now approved three applications.

Mr. Griffiths: Does the Secretary of State agree with Duncan McNeill, whom he appointed to promote his hospital trusts, that trust status provides an alternative to operating and remaining within the mainstream national health service? Does he realise that for patients throughout Scotland, including those in the Edinburgh royal infirmary and the Royal hospital for sick children, that is a chilling message?

Mr. Lang: I have a great admiration for Mr. Duncan McNeill, and also a great approbation for the concept of trust status for hospitals. Contrary to the rumours constantly spread by the Labour party, such hospitals remain in the national health service and continue to provide a free service at the point of delivery.

Mr. Galbraith: Is the Secretary of State aware that the first wave of opt-outs in England were examined by Coopers and Lybrand, which found that 45 of the 57 were financially non-viable? Was a similar exercise carried out in Scotland? If so, will the Secretary of State make the results publicly available? If not, why not? Is this another example of the Government opting out, as they do in Europe?

Mr. Lang: The hon. Gentleman is talking nonsense and yet again trying to mislead the public on the achievements of hospital trusts. The fact is that those hospitals south of the border that have achieved trust status are now delivering more patient care, recruiting more consultants and buying more equipment, and improving the service that they provide to the public in their areas.

Erskine Bridge

16. Mr. Graham: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the future financial provision for the Erskine bridge.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: Financial provision for the Erskine bridge is contained within the overall trunk road provision for Scotland. Arrangements for the financing of the bridge beyond the end of the extended tolling period in 1996 are under consideration.

Mr. Graham: Does the Secretary of State realise that we were promised 20 years ago that after 20 years the toll would be abolished? [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I wish to hear what the hon. Gentleman has to say.

Mr. Graham: I am most grateful for your assistance, Mr. Speaker. When I heard the rowdy noise earlier, I was sure that there was a John Doe—dead on arrival—back from Maastricht.

Is the Minister aware that the people of Dumbarton and Renfrewshire are sick and tired of paying the toll given that, after 20 years, the promise to abolish it has not been fulfilled, even though local business men, the local community councils and even some Tories wish it to go? Why does not the Minister support the local economy in Renfrewshire and Dumbartonshire by abolishing the toll now? Why does not he give freedom to the people of Scotland to move about without dipping into their pockets?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I regard the toll as absolutely fair in the circumstances. The bridge cost £10 million or more to build and successive Governments have supported the tolling of estuarial crossings of this nature. The tolling period will extend to 1 July 1996 and the Government will then make a decision about the future.

Forestry Commission

17. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what is the total acreage of land sold by the Forestry Commission in the last five years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: The Forestry Commission sold 42,800 hectares of land in the five years to 31 March 1991.

Mr. Evans: Is my hon. Friend aware that 40 per cent. of all men and women have walking as their main sport? Can he assure me that the woodlands sold off by the commission will be accessible to all walkers, especially as after the next election a lot of Scottish Labour Members will have a lot of time to do a lot of walking?

Mr. Forsyth: As a walker myself, I agree with my hon. Friend that access ought to be continued in respect of land that is disposed of by the Forestry Commission. As my hon. Friend will know, an agreement dating back to November last year provides for the Forestry Commission to offer land to local authorities prior to disposal so that an agreement can be reached with regard to access. I hope that my hon. Friend feels that that is a step in the right direction.

Lockerbie

18. Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will make a statement on the discussions which the Lord Advocate has had with representatives of the German Government and the Bundeskriminalamt about the alleged use by Libyans or the Libyan People's Bureau of premises in East Berlin in relation to his inquiry into the Lockerbie bombing.

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: No, Sir. Discussions by the Lord Advocate and his representatives with the authorities of other countries in criminal investigations are confidential.

Mr. Dalyell: Will the Government confirm that when the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), and President Reagan dispatched the bombers that had the effect of bombing the residential areas of Tripoli and Benghazi in 1986— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Dalyell.

Mr. Dalyell: Against the evidence of the German authorities and the German police, and given that even the Israeli secret service thinks that others may have been involved, would it not at least be a sensible plan to talk to the Arab League about the very serious problem of Lockerbie and at least consider accepting the request to send British and American judges in the first instance to a trial under Libyan law?

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: I cannot comment on the evidence, but the Lord Advocate has made it extremely clear that the criminal proceedings are the result of an extremely brilliant, thorough and painstaking investigation by the Scottish police services and their colleagues, to whom I also pay tribute. We have rightly increased their allocations this year. The detailed points raised by the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) are matters for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs, who will have heard what the hon. Gentleman has said.

Health Boards

19. Mr. Ernie Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he last met the chairman of health boards in Scotland to discuss finance.

Mr. Michael Forsyth: I meet chairmen regularly to discuss a wide range of strategic issues affecting the management of the NHS in Scotland.

Mr. Ross: When the Minister next meets the chairmen of the health boards in Scotland, will he have had a chance to study the correspondence from Tayside about the relocation of the casualty department of Dundee royal infirmary to a green-field site at Ninewells? Given that the health board has said that it will have difficulty finding the money for that relocation and upgrading, will the Minister consider favourably any requests that may be made at the meeting?

Mr. Forsyth: That is clearly a matter for the Tayside health board. However, it may interest the hon. Gentleman to know that, as part of the patients charter initiative, we will take steps to consider accident and emergency and casualty cover to improve standards of provision applying to Tayside and to all other health boards.

European Council (Maastricht)

3.30 pm

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on the European Council in Maastricht which I attended with my right hon. Friends the Foreign Secretary and the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

The European Council has reached agreement on a treaty on European union. The relevant texts have been deposited along with the presidency conclusions. The House will be invited to debate the outcome next week.

Let me set out the main provisions of the agreements we reached.

The treaty covers economic and monetary union and political union. It follows the structure for which the United Kingdom has consistently argued.

The treaty creates a new legal framework for co-operation between member states in foreign and security policy and in the fight against international crime. That co-operation will take place on an intergovernmental basis outside the treaty of Rome. That means that the Commission will not have the sole right of initiative and the European Court will have no jurisdiction.

On defence, we have agreed a framework for co-operation in which the primacy of the Atlantic alliance has been confirmed and the role of the Western European Union has been enhanced.

As the House knows, there was strong pressure over many months for all aspects of co-operation to come within European Community competence. That was not acceptable to this country. Instead, an alternative route to European co-operation has been opened up. I believe that this will be seen as an increasingly significant development as the Community opens its doors to new members, and more flexible structures are required.

I turn now to the main features of the text. The treaty provides for the possibility that member states will wish to adopt a single currency later this decade, but they can do so only if they meet strict convergence conditions—conditions for which the British Government have pressed from the outset. These cover inflation, budget deficits, exchange rate stability and long-term interest rates.

A single currency may come into being in 1997, but only if a minimum of seven countries meet the convergence conditions, and eight of the Twelve vote in favour. The treaty lays down that a single currency will come into being by 1999, but only if those convergence conditions are met and only for those countries which meet them. It is therefore highly uncertain when such a currency will be created and which countries it will cover.

In the House on 20 November, I said that there must be a provision giving the United Kingdom the right to decide for ourselves whether or not to move to stage 3. That requirement has been secured. It is set out in a legally binding protocol which forms an integral part of the treaty. The protocol was drafted by the United Kingdom and fully protects the position of this House. The effect of the protocol is as follows. We have exactly the same option to join a single currency at the same time as other member states if we wish. We shall be involved in all the decisions. But, unlike other Governments, we have not bound ourselves to join regardless of whether it makes economic or political sense.

The treaty text on political union provides for enhanced intergovernmental co-operation on foreign and security policy, on defence policy and in the fight against terrorism, drug trafficking and other crimes.

International crime knows no frontiers. Terrorists and other criminals must not be allowed to escape justice or to retire abroad with the proceeds of their crime. This text gives us a new basis for co-operation with our partners in bringing these criminals to justice.

The text provides for joint action in foreign policy, building on what was already agreed in the Single European Act. But, as I told the House on 20 November, if Britain needs to act on its own, it must be free to do so. The treaty meets that requirement. Joint action can take place only if we agree. Where there is no joint action, each member state is entirely free to act on its own. If, after joint action has been agreed, a member state needs to take its own measures to meet changed circumstances, it may do so.

There was pressure from other member states to take foreign policy decisions by majority voting. I was not prepared to agree that Britain could be outvoted on any substantive issue of foreign policy. Some of our partners also sought to draw a distinction between decisions of principle, where unanimity would apply, and implementing decisions which could be subject to majority voting. No one was able to explain how that distinction would work. I told the European Council that, if such occasions did arise, we should consider the case for majority voting on its merits. The treaty reflects our view. It provides that the Council may, but only by unanimity, designate certain decisions to be taken by qualified majority voting. But we cannot be forced to subject our foreign policy to the will of other member states. We have, in fact, preserved unanimity for all decisions where we decide that we need it.

We are agreed that Europe must do more for its own defence. We should build up the Western European Union as the defence pillar of the European union, but the treaty embodies the view set out in the Anglo-Italian proposal two months ago, and endorsed at last month's summit of the North Atlantic Treaty Organisation that whatever we do at European level must be compatible with NATO. The WEU must in no way be subordinate to the European Council. It is not. We have avoided the danger of setting up defence structures which would compete with NATO. We have created a framework in which Europe can develop its defence role in a way which complements the American presence in Europe and does not put it at risk.

In these negotiations, we put forward a series of proposals designed to be of direct benefit to the European citizen. All of them were accepted. The Community has agreed to increase the accountability of European Community institutions; to strengthen the European Parliament's financial control over the Commission; to allow the European Parliament to investigate maladministration and to appoint a Community ombudsman accessible to all Community citizens; to build up the role of the Court of Auditors, which becomes an institution of the Community; and to ensure compliance with Community obligations by giving the European Court of Justice power to impose fines on Governments who sign directives but subsequently do not implement them.

We wanted—and secured—a sensible enhancement of the role of the European Parliament. We did not accept the proposal made by other member states for a power of co-decision between the Parliament and the Council. As I told the House on 20 November, the Council of Ministers must be the body that ultimately determines the Community's laws and policies.

I also said then that we were prepared to consider some blocking power for the European Parliament. That has now been agreed. The treaty sets up, in a limited number of areas, a conciliation procedure where there is disagreement between the Council and Parliament. In the last analysis, the Parliament would be able to block a decision in those areas, but only if an absolute majority of its members turned out to vote the proposal down.

The House has been rightly concerned at the creeping extension of Community competence over the last few years. The Commission has often brought forward proposals using a dubious legal base, and the Council has found it difficult to halt that practice in the European Court. We have taken significant steps to deal with that problem.

First, the structure of the treaty puts the issues of foreign and security policy, interior and justice matters and defence policy beyond the reach of the Commission and the European Court. Secondly, the treaty itself embodies the vital principle of "subsidiarity", making it clear that the Community should only be involved in decisions which cannot more effectively be taken at national level. Thirdly, in some areas—notably health protection, educational exchanges, vocational training and culture—we have defined Community competence clearly for the first time. Fourthly, there will be no extension of Community competence in employer-employee relations—the so-called social area.

We have a high standard of social protection in this country. Our national health service, free at the point of use, is the envy of many in Europe, but we recognise the Community's social dimension. Also—unlike some of our European partners—we have implemented that dimension too; 19 out of the 33 measures in the social action programme have been agreed. But there is no reason for the Community to get involved in employment legislation, which must be for each country to decide for itself.

Over the past 12 years, we have transformed labour relations. In 1979, 29 million working days were lost in strikes. Last year the figure was less than 2 million. I was not prepared to see that record put in jeopardy. Nor was I prepared to risk Britain's competitive position as the European magnet for inward investment. I was not prepared to put British jobs on the line. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. A great many people outside the House are interested in what the Prime Minister has to say.

The Prime Minister: Many of our partners have a wholly different tradition of employment practice which is reflected in the separate arrangements which they have agreed, which will affect only their countries and for which only they will pay. But even among these member states there are many who fear the effect of Community measures on their jobs and their ability to compete. Our arguments are based not only on our national interest but on the risks we perceive to the competitive position of the Community as a whole.

This week's events in the Soviet Union were a salutary reminder that reform in the Community is not an end in itself. The Community's primary task must be to extend its own advantages of democracy, stability and prosperity to eastern Europe. At British initiative, we committed ourselves at Maastricht to the further enlargement of the Community, starting with the EFTA countries. When they and, in due course, the new democracies of eastern Europe are ready to join the Community, we shall be ready to welcome them.

With this in mind, the Commission will report on enlargement to next June's European Council in Lisbon. Thereafter, it will be for the British presidency to carry that work forward. I look forward to doing so.

We agreed a number of statements on foreign policy issues. I will single out two of them. On the Soviet Union, the European Council calls on the republics to respect the rights of minorities, to implement international agreements on arms control and nuclear non-proliferation, to control and secure their nuclear weapons, and to honour their obligations in respect of the Soviet Union's external debt.

The European Council has endorsed the demands which we, France and the United States have made to the Libyan Government requiring them to abandon their support of terrorism and to hand over the alleged perpetrators of the Lockerbie bombing.

The founders of the Community knew that they could not create a viable organisation if they established goals that could never be achieved. In talking about European union, we are talking about concepts that have to be cast in the reality of national legislation and everyday life. The Single European Act started as a grandiose design and ended up as a workmanlike blueprint for a free market. Those treaties have followed the same course.

Our role has been to put forward practical suggestions—and sometimes to rein in the larger ambitions of our partners. Where we believed their ideas would not work, we have put forward our own alternatives. Those can be found throughout this treaty. As with all international negotiations, there has been give and take between all 12 member states. But the process was one in which Britain has played a leading role, and the result is one in which we can clearly see the imprint of our views.

This is a treaty which safeguards and advances our national interests. It advances the interests of Europe as a whole. It opens up new ways of co-operating in Europe. It clarifies and contains the powers of the Commission. It will allow the Community to develop in depth. It reaches out to other Europeans—the new democracies who want to share the benefits we already enjoy. It is a good agreement for Europe, and a good agreement for the United Kingdom. I commend it to the House.

Mr. Neil Kinnock (Islwyn): May I first of all welcome aspects of the outcome of the Maastricht Council, including the strong statement against racism, the reaffirmation of policy on the middle east, the commitment to the enlargement of the Community, the statement on the republics of the Soviet Union, and, of course, the statement on Libya as a host Government for terrorism?

The statement that we have just heard is a statement from a double opt-out Government who have isolated Britain—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kinnock: It is a statement from a double opt-out Government who have isolated Britain on the most vital issues of economic and monetary union and the social charter. It is impossible to regard the Government's actions as effective negotiation when they have simply opted out of the two basic economic and social issues and have left an empty chair in the European Community. That is abdication, not negotiation.

Is it not clear that the Government's self-imposed exile from the main stream of the Community will severely disadvantage the British people? Isolation means sacrificing essential influence over the process of European monetary union; it means shadowing the creation of others and ultimately accepting conditions determined by others; it means throwing away all chance of getting the European central bank to Britain. The agreement, which the Prime Minister has accepted, will exclude Britain from any say in the appointment of the president, vice-president and executive board of the ECB.

The way in which the Government have sidelined themselves on EMU means uncertainty for business and industry in their planning for the future. When a major purpose of investing is to take advantage of access to a single market with a growing monetary union, the opt-out country reduces its value as a place for investment. That is how the Government are putting Britain into the economic, financial, industrial and employment second division in Europe.

Will the Prime Minister confirm that the protocol on social policy which he agreed at Maastricht means that, when social policy and employment standards are discussed in the Community, the United Kingdom "shall not take part", shall not vote or have a voice?

How can the Prime Minister claim to be seeking the best deal for Britain when he is determined to get the worst conditions for British workers? By refusing to agree to the social chapter, is not he wanting to exclude British people from the provisions for equal status for 6 million part-time employees, many of whom are women; for fair and equal treatment for women at work; for proper protection for young people at work; for rights to minimum holiday leave; and for better information for employees? He claims that those decent basic provisions for individual employees, whether they are in or out of trade unions, would inhibit competitiveness. But how does he answer his fellow Conservatives like Herr Kohl, or Mr. Eyskens, of Belgium, who says:

"It is a fact that the most competitive countries in Europe are also the ones with the best social and employment provision"?

When will the Government learn the lesson that civilised standards help efficiency and competitiveness, while exploitation and injustice harm them? When will they listen to the British people, the great majority of whom know that there should be improved and common employees' rights for all Community countries in the single market?

After the summit, we must ask how the Prime Minister can claim to be at the heart of Europe when, because of his actions, our country is not even part of the key decisions that will shape the Europe of the future. Our country's interests cannot be served by isolation or opt-out. They will be served by maximising influence, full involvement and insistence on the best standards. That is how a Labour Government will serve the British people.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the Leader of the Opposition for welcoming some aspects of our agreement. At the outset of his remarks, he referred to a double opt-out. I was surprised to hear him say that because he was clearly referring to economic and monetary union. As the shadow Chancellor said on 24 November:

"We should not commit ourselves now, in advance of 1997, to enter into a single currency. That is the point of agreement all sensible people will have".

I agree, and that is what we have negotiated. I am sorry that some others have apparently taken leave of their senses.

As for the second alleged opt-out, the right hon. Gentleman confuses the distinction between the social dimension of the Community, to which Britain is fully committed—it has implemented all 19 of the directives thus passed—and the so-called social chapter, which deals with employment and labour laws where they are best determined in this country and in this House, and not imposed from outside.

The right hon. Gentleman referred to investment, but I fear that his judgment is not shared by others. He said that inward investment will not come to Britain. Perhaps he should have a word with the President of the Commission, Mr. Delors, who said yesterday:

"Britain will become a paradise for Japanese investment".

The right hon. Gentleman wants to know what we shall not accept from Europe. We are not prepared to accept the imposition of other people's directions on many forms of flexible job opportunities now available in this country. We are not prepared to accept restrictions on the employer's right to recruit the best qualified person for the job. We are not prepared to accept new trade union powers to represent individual employees and bargain on their behalf. The right hon. Gentleman may be prepared to hand over the government of this country to trade unions abroad, but that is not the position of the Conservative party.

The right hon. Gentleman said that this country would not be part of the key decisions on economic and monetary union. He should read the treaty: we are part of all the decisions on economic and monetary union, with the additional point that, unlike our European Community partners, we have the choice, when the decision is made, whether to go into stage 3. It is a choice for the House whether we go in or stay out. That choice is best made in the light of the conditions that prevail at the time.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister say that there is to be a debate next week. Perhaps it will help hon. Members to know that those who are called to put a question today may not stand quite such a good chance in next week's debate.

Mr. Paddy Ashdown (Yeovil): Although the Prime Minister did not say it, the agreement that he signed yesterday in Maastricht is historic. It marks the point of irreversibility in the continuing process of the integration and unity of Europe. The pity of it is that the Prime Minister, who said that he wanted to be at the heart of the process, has instead condemned this country to be semi-detached from it. The Prime Minister has told us that it is a good agreement for Britain. He is wrong: it is a bad agreement for Britain.

Does not the Prime Minister realise that, after 40 years in which this country has been dogged by the uncertainty of its position in Europe, he had the opportunity to answer that question once and for all, and he ducked it? The rest of Europe said yes; the best that he could say for Britain was maybe. Does he not realise that his maybe will cost us? [Interruption.] Oh yes, it will. Does he not realise that uncertainty about Britain's future in Europe will mean higher interest rates when the pound comes under pressure? Whatever President Delors says, it will mean lower inward investment. It will mean that we cannot shape the institutions to which subsequently we shall have to submit.

That uncertainty will mean that the City of London will lose any aspirations that it has to accommodate the central European bank. Does not the right hon. Gentleman believe that that is too high a price to ask the people of Britain to pay in order that he may put the divisions of the Conservative party before this country's long-term prosperity?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken in much of what he says. British industry and the City have welcomed the agreement reached yesterday, which is a step towards European co-operation. Most importantly, it opens up new ways of co-operation with our European partners, not just the way of straight-through Community competence and the European court of Justice.

In no sense is the United Kingdom semi-detached from the decisions that will be made in Europe. It will be part of all the decisions made in Europe. That was an odd comment to come from the right hon. Gentleman who, judged from his comments in recent days, would not have accepted the social charter. Like us, he would have opted out. I welcome the support of the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith) on that issue. No doubt the right hon. Member for Yeovil, (Mr. Ashdown) would have regarded himself as semi-detached. We have a part in shaping all the decisions of Europe. That is clearly understood by our partners and has been agreed in the treaty. I am sorry that the right hon. Member for Yeovil did not have the grace to accept that.

Mr. David Howell (Guildford): My right hon. Friend has shown the utmost skill and stamina over the past two days in keeping us away from the dangerous path towards the centralised Europe that none of us who are good Europeans want to see. Does he agree that the time has come to put forward with ever greater clarity the kind of Europe which we want and which he has already outlined in his comments? Does he further agree that that needs to be a Europe which is not only open and ready to trade fully with the rest of the world, but also ready to grapple with the greatest danger facing European stability, a danger which was scarcely mentioned at Maastricht, and which must be faced by ensuring that the nations of eastern Europe make it all the way to open democracies and that the vast and scattered nuclear arsenal of the former Soviet Union is brought under proper control and we prevent a great proliferation of nuclear weapons in the successor states?

The Prime Minister: I agree with my right hon. Friend. We discussed collectively, and I discussed bilaterally with President Mitterrand, the specific points that my right hon. Friend mentions and, in particular, the potential dangers of nuclear proliferation within the republics of the Soviet Union. It is precisely because of our wish to create the sort of free market and wide community that we have in mind that we have included, at our insistence and with the agreement of other colleagues, a declaration in the presidency conclusions about the future enlargement of the Community. We propose to carry that principle forward, both in communal discussions next year and as a key part of the British presidency in the second half of 1992.

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): Since yesterday's decisions are clearly further progress towards European union, can the Prime Minister say whether the United Kingdom has moved any closer to the acceptance of a single European currency? Will yesterday's decisions mean any increase in the United Kingdom's contribution to the European Community budget? Was there any discussion on further Community support for the regions such as Portugal, Greece and Northern Ireland?

The Prime Minister: We are a full part of the process towards economic and monetary union and a single currency. As I said both in my statement and in an earlier answer, we have the option to decide at a later stage, when others enter stage 3, whether that is the right thing for this country to do. It is a choice that is fully there for us to make at the same time and in the same fashion as other countries, except that we have the additional option of deciding that it would not be right for this country.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the regions of the Community. A cohesion fund was agreed that would turn out to be a subset of structural funds with the intention of ensuring that money which is diverted within the Community for the right purposes goes to the areas that most need it.

Mr. John Biffen (Shropshire, North): I join the many others who will welcome the prominence that my right hon. Friend gives to the enlargement of the Community, especially in the context of central and eastern Europe. When the issue of the single currency was being discussed at Maastricht, did its promoters suggest that this would make more easy that enlargement, and how did my right hon. Friend respond?

The Prime Minister: It is a matter that has been discussed among the Finance Ministers on many occasions. I do not think that there is an expectation among people that it will make it easier, and that is one of the arguments that we have frequently advanced against it. One of the difficulties of proceeding with the single currency, particularly if a small number of member states within the Community were to proceed on their own, is that it would become increasingly difficult for others to join them at a later stage. It is for that reason that, if and when the decision is made to move forward, it would be desirable for as many members of the Community as possible to move collectively.

Mr. Peter Shore (Bethnal Green and Stepney): For those who do not want a federal future for this country there are many reasons for concern in the Prime Minister's statement on the treaty of union. If the treaty bears the imprint of our views, how can the Prime Minister explain the acceptance of article 104B, under which present and future Governments of this country would be limited by European authority to a borrowing requirement of no more than 3 per cent. of GDP? Is this not an intolerable interference with the freedom of action of any British Government, and is the Prime Minister aware that, in 12 of the past 18 years, successive Governments, Labour and Conservative, have spent more than 3 per cent. of GDP on their borrowing requirements?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman might have been better advised to raise that matter at a meeting of the parliamentary Labour party than inviting me to answer it. I have two points to make in reply to him. First, as a result of the negotiations by my right hon. Friend the Chancellor, there is considerably more flexibility now than there was with the 3 per cent. figure that the right hon. Gentleman mentioned. Secondly, the 3 per cent. does not apply in stage 2 and, even with that greater flexibility, would apply only to those countries that decided to enter stage 3. That will be a factor that the House will be able to have in its mind when it decides on whether to enter stage 3.

Sir Norman Fowler (Sutton Coldfield): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, entirely contrary to what the Leader of the Opposition has just said, the settlement that he has won will be welcomed by the overwhelming majority of people in this country? Is it not clear that the so-called social measures that he rejected would have led to unemployment and the loss of jobs? Are those not exactly the issues that should be settled in this country and not in Brussels?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend for his remarks, with which I entirely agree. It was precisely because the measures in the social chapter would have damaged first employment prospects and secondly our competitiveness against Japan and the United States that I found them unacceptable. A further reason is that measures of this sort are best decided in the House, in accordance with the traditions of this country, and not abroad by trade unions and others.

Sir Patrick Duffy (Sheffield, Attercliffe): Does the Prime Minister recall my earlier concern that the parameters that he was instrumental in drawing up at the Rome summit, to separate an incipient European Community defence policy from NATO's responsibilities for the defence of Europe, should be preserved? Will he now reassure the House that they have not been breached by article B of the agreement in what The Guardian this morning called a defence compromise? It commits the Community to the "eventual framing" of a defence policy. Do not those words portend an eventual challenge by the Franco-German axis to the primacy of NATO?

The Prime Minister: Of course it was challenged in the discussions, but the outcome is that set out in the Anglo-Italian paper. It is a good outcome for NATO and the United Kingdom. It is the right framework for the European Community in the 1990s. It means that there will be a stronger European contribution to common defence, and that is right. That will be organised through the Western European Union and it will not be subordinated to the European Community.

Mr. Cranley Onslow (Woking): I add my congratulations to my right hon. Friend and his team on what will rightly be seen in the country as an excellent result for Britain and Europe, especially on enlargement. As it is now all the more important that Europe should prove that it can walk before it tries to run, may we look forward to a rigid application by our European partners of all those directives that they have so far chosen to ignore?

The Prime Minister: Yes, we can look forward to that application, for under the provisions agreed in the treaty, if we and our European partners fail to implement directives that we sign up to, we shall be subjected to substantial fines by the European Court of Justice.

Mr. Jim Sillars (Glasgow, Govan): Is the Prime Minister aware that his claim to have reined in the ambitions of our partners is a vain boast that bears no relation to reality, and that going into Maastricht we had a Community of 12 and coming out we had a Community of 11 and a half? The 11 are ambitious, able and united and, judging by history, are likely to be successful, and the half is a self-disabled United Kingdom. Is he aware that what he achieved, or failed to achieve, might please the little Englanders behind him but will be a tragedy for the people of the United Kingdom and the Scottish part of it through the 1990s?

The Prime Minister: An odd comment from a home ruler for Scotland, I must say. The agreement is good for the United Kingdom and good for Europe. It is an agreement to which our European partners were happy to sign up, and they have gone back to their own countries to celebrate. They do not share the views that the hon. Gentleman has just expressed.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Will the Prime Minister take it from me that all right-thinking people would like to congratulate him on escaping unbruised from the street fighting at Maastricht, where he met the heavies of Germany and France? Was the vexed question of extradition discussed at the Council? Is the United Kingdom financially committed to the policies of cohesion and convergence?

The Prime Minister: The question of extradition is one of the matters that would fall under the interior and justice pillar to be decided on an intergovernmental basis. It is likely that under those agreements extradition within Europe would in future be easier than it has been in the past, which I think the hon. Gentleman would welcome.

Mr. Tony Benn (Chesterfield): Is the Prime Minister aware, first, that people will want to study in detail what he has brought back and will need far more time to do that, and, secondly, that a treaty committing us to a European union probably represents an even bigger change than our entry into the Community in 1975, the long-term effect of which over many Parliaments will be great? In those circumstances, does he really think that a dying Parliament, a week after the Maastricht summit, should empower a lame-duck Prime Minister to use the royal prerogative to sign that treaty without any consultation with the British people whose rights will be affected far more than this Parliament? Does he not think that, with a general election coming, if he is confident in his position, the least that he could do would be to put that forward in a general election so that at least people will have an opportunity to give a view before they are committed by the right hon. Gentleman's signature of a treaty of this magnitude?

The Prime Minister: But that is the case. Legislation will need to be drafted and taken through the House in order to ratify the agreements that have been provisionally reached at Maastricht. That legislation cannot be carried through in the remainder of this Parliament and will be a matter for the next Parliament. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman's earlier remarks about opting in, I suggest that he discusses that matter with his right hon. Friends who would have signed the treaty in full without waiting to see what the economic conditions were at a later stage. Does that not give an absolute lie to the belief that the Opposition are united on Europe?

Mr. Julian Amery (Brighton, Pavilion): Is my right hon. Friend aware that the agreement that he has secured will be widely welcomed in northern and eastern Europe, particularly as they are the new frontier of Europe and of all of us? In particular, I congratulate my right hon. Friend on having laid the foundations—not more than that yet—of a European defence and foreign policy as pillars of the European house distinct from the collective will of the European Commission.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend has it exactly and precisely right in terms of laying the foundation for European action on foreign affairs and defence, and that is the right direction in which Britain should go. I welcome very much the options that are now open for both the EFTA states, and, in due course, when their economies are ready, the eastern European states, to join the EC. Perhaps not in the political lifetime of most hon. Members but at some future stage, we may see a Community that stretches from one end of Europe to the other, for which I for one will wish to work.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): The Prime Minister has said that the Maastricht settlement is game, set and match to Britain. Quite apart from the inappropriate Chamberlainesque triumphalism, how can it be game, set and match to Britain if the Government have decided to opt out of future social developments and remain undecided about a single European currency?

The Prime Minister: I set out the Government's objectives in a speech in this House before I went to Maastricht. We met all those objectives.

Mr. Nicholas Budgen (Wolverhampton, South-West): Does my right hon. Friend agree that the lesson that we learned from the Single European Act was that, whenever there is an extension of Community competence, the institutions of the European Community seek to extend that competence? Does he also agree that, where he has extended the competence of the institutions of the European Community, we shall increasingly see, as we have seen in relation to Sunday trading and British Aerospace, the emergence of two forms of law—first, British law, which we encourage the population to obey and honour, and, secondly, European law, which we try to avoid—and thus we shall succeed in undermining the rule of law here?

The Prime Minister: There have been twin forms of law since this House took the decision to enter the Community 20 years ago. I know that that is not entirely agreeable to some of my hon. Friends and to some Opposition Members, but that is the fact of life—and has been for many years. What we sought to do, in terms of Community competence, in the discussions was to extend it in areas where we thought it was appropriate and to define it more adequately than it has been defined in the past in order to prevent, as far as it is possible to prevent it, that element of creeping competence that so offends many people in this country.

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Does the Prime Minister accept that we are pleased that the United Kingdom is signatory to a treaty that commits it to an ever closer union among European peoples, where decisions are to be taken as close to the citizens as possible? When does the Prime Minister intend to implement that part of the treaty in respect of Wales and Scotland?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his earlier remarks. The subsidiarity agreement was particularly an aim of both the United Kingdom and Germany. The intention is to ensure that decisions are taken at national level whenever that is the most appropriate way to deal with the decisions. That is what we have achieved.

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): From a different political viewpoint, may I congratulate the Prime Minister on his ability and the authority that he demonstrated during the negotiations that secured this agreement, which, despite all the odds, will be beneficial to the United Kingdom. I am sure that it will be beneficial to Northern Ireland, in view of the number of unemployed people in the Province and the need for Northern Ireland to become more closely involved in Europe.

Is the Prime Minister satisfied that sufficient steps have been taken to deal with terrorism?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the overall agreement that we have reached. I share his view that it is a good agreement for this country and a good agreement for Northern Ireland. The decisions that we have made on the interior and justice portfolio—to deal with terrorism more closely in an intergovernmental agreement—open up the possibility of much greater co-operation against terrorism. We are studying specific plans, under the Europol heading, that will be geared specifically against terrorism, mafia activities and drug dealers. It will provide for far more cross-European co-operation against crime than we have ever known.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): The Government are great disciplinarians. Can the Prime Minister explain why participation in the exchange rate mechanism is a beneficial discipline for British industry, whereas participation in the social chapter is a damaging discipline? Is not the real answer that the Conservative party has very little time and even less concern for British workers?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is inaccurate, and I believe that he is fair-minded enough to know it. The exchange rate mechanism is a discipline to reduce inflation. As for the provisions in the social chapter, that would be a discipline that would reduce jobs.

Mr. Terence L. Higgins (Worthing): I congratulate my right hon. Friend on the skill with which he conducted the negotiations. Is he aware that the setting of arbitrary deadlines for a move to a single currency is really gesture politics, and that he is right to dissociate Britain from it? I am delighted to see that he has also dissociated us from the objectionable features of article 104B regarding fiscal deficits. Will he not rest on his laurels? Should he not turn his attention vigorously to sorting out the common agricultural policy, which is endangering the Uruguay round and remains a serious blot which is totally inconsistent with the sort of policies that are embodied in the new treaty?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend's third point is right. In recent weeks, I have had several opportunities to discuss that matter with the presidency of the Commission and with the Commissioners who negotiate on behalf of the European Community. There is no doubt that the European Community needs to make amendments to its common agricultural policy and to its agricultural policies to ensure that an agreement on the general agreement on tariffs and trade can be reached. Agreement on GATT is as important to this country as anything else at the moment, and the Community will have to make amendments to its policy to play its part in reaching that agreement.

I referred earlier to article 104B, and I have nothing further to add.

My right hon. Friend is correct about the deadlines. The deadlines refer to the time at which the convergence conditions will be examined. The dates for moving forward must be subordinate to the convergence conditions. Without the convergence conditions, it would be improper and absurd to contemplate moving forward.

Mr. Nigel Spearing (Newham, South): Will the Prime Minister confirm that there is a protocol in the Maastricht agreement calling for greater involvement of national Parliaments and Assemblies in the work of the Community? I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his kind remarks about the work of the Select Committee on European legislation made during the debate on 21 November. Is he aware that that Committee is charged with the responsibility of assessing the legal and political impact of EEC proposals on the United Kingdom and for its reports, together with the proposals, to be debated here before decisions are made by the Ministers concerned? Therefore, is not it inappropriate for the Government to place before the House a motion endorsing the Maastricht deal before comparable examination of the draft treaty has taken place? Is not that against the resolution of the House and its spirit, and is it not a reduction, not an increase, in the involvement of this national Parliament?

The Prime Minister: I can confirm the hon. Gentleman's remarks about the protocol. We shall be placing a motion before the House inviting it to endorse the agreement. However, as I told the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn), there will be an opportunity in due course for the legislation that enacts the agreement to be considered in detail by the House. So there will be ample opportunity for every hon. Member to consider in detail what the agreements into which we have entered would commit the country to.

Sir Michael Marshall (Arundel): Will my right hon. Friend accept that there will be a warm welcome for his commitment to a widening process on his own behalf and that of Her Majesty's Government? Recognising the difficulty that arises in the countries of central and eastern Europe, can he commit himself to the urgent introduction of EFTA applications, recognising the special bridges that they have with those countries and the Baltic states?

The Prime Minister: I can say that to my hon. Friend. I anticipate that at least two of the EFTA countries will place their applications before the Community shortly and that it will be possible to begin examining them in early 1993.

Mr. Terry Davis (Birmingham, Hodge Hill): Is not the Prime Minister saying that he has used all the influence that he can muster to ensure that working people in Britain have fewer rights and less protection against bad employers than the rest of Europe?

The Prime Minister: No, Sir. I have used all the influence that I can muster to ensure that working people do not lose their jobs as a result of a lack of competitiveness and costs on employers that could not be met without shedding labour. I note that the hon. Gentleman wishes to introduce measures that would cost jobs in Britain. We have noticed that in other Opposition policies in the past.

Sir Jim Spicer (Dorset, West): Will my right hon. Friend accept that the outcome of Maastricht, both for the people of this country and for the Community, is a treaty based on common sense and realism? Will he accept the gratitude of every Conservative Member and of the people of this country, because the treaty bears the imprint not only of my right hon. Friend but of the Foreign Secretary and of the Treasury? We are grateful to them.

My right hon. Friend spoke at length about EFTA applications. He will not forget, particularly when we have the presidency next year, that Malta has applied for membership of the Community and that we owe a great debt of gratitude to the Maltese people.

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his remarks. As I said earlier, during our presidency we shall be looking particularly at the prospects for enlargement of the Community.

Mr. James Lamond (Oldham, Central and Royton): But is not the Prime Minister's decision to opt out of the social charter—[Interruption.]—"opt out" were the words that he used—an admission that, after 12 years of Tory rule, the economy is not as sound, robust and healthy as the Government try to claim but is so fragile that it cannot support the most basic workers' rights that will be enjoyed in the rest of Europe?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is wrong in everything he says. What I find so extraordinary is that Opposition Members are so keen to place with trade unions abroad so much of the authority on labour law matters that resides in this House. Just as they are subordinate to trade unions at home, so they yearn to be subordinate to trade unions abroad.

Sir Trevor Skeet (Bedfordshire, North): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on his courageous stand against the 11 who opposed him, but may I ask him a simple question? Compared with the European Communities Act 1972, what additional authority has now been conceded to Brussels from the United Kingdom Parliament?

The Prime Minister: Since the 1972 Act, there have been many additional authorities to Brussels through European Court judgments, individual directives and the implications and effects of the Single European Act, quite apart from the effect of the treaties which we have agreed in the past two days but which have yet to be ratified by Parliament. The detailed information that my hon. Friend requires can be found in documentation that has been placed in the Library.

Mr. Joseph Ashton (Bassetlaw): If legislation is needed to get the treaty through Parliament, if it is so popular with the country, and if it will be such a wonderful thing for unemployed people, for women, for the regions and for business, why does not the Prime Minister dissolve Parliament next week and have a general election in January?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman will get his election in due course.

Mr. Nigel Forman (Carshalton and Wallington): Is it not clear that one of my right hon. Friend's most important achievements at Maastricht was to get a clear definition of subsidiarity written into the treaty as a bulwark against creeping competence by the Commission and other Community institutions? Will he confirm that, once that definition is lawful, it will be possible to ensure that the Community will be able to act on appropriate areas such as trans-border environmental pollution, but on areas where there is no need or justification for action, such as national and fiscal policies, the House will retain its rights?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. The provisions that he refers to are in the agreement that we have signed, which provides greater safeguards than before to ensure that the Community deals with those matters that are most appropriately dealt with by the Community and that other matters are left to national Parliaments.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Will the Prime Minister confirm that the Secretary of State for Employment will no longer be able to participate in the Social Affairs Council —I am sure that many of our partners will not miss him —and, if that is so, will he consider demoting him and reducing his salary?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Lady is mistaken. The social dimension of the Community has been there for a long time. As I said in answer to an earlier question, over recent years we have agreed 19 directives on the social dimension—more than anyone else in the Community—and we have implemented them. All of them have been agreed and discussed with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Employment and his predecessor.

Dame Elaine Kellet-Bowman (Lancaster): My right hon. Friend said that Labour would have signed in full. They would indeed. Yesterday, the shadow Chancellor said on the early morning news that Britain should fall into line with its partners—in other words, that we should give in to them without bothering to do anything to secure the best deal for this country. Is my right hon. Friend aware that my constituents, whether farmers, industrialists or citizens, who obey the law will be delighted that those who do not do so will in future be fined for that failure?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right. The Opposition's position is even more incredible than she sets out. The Leader of the Opposition previously expressed three conditions for joining a single currency. None of them has been met, yet today he says that he would have signed up to a single currency without any opt-out clause.

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): Did the Prime Minister feel no sense of humiliation at having to meet the other 11 Heads of Government and having to explain to them in the most public way why the British economy was so uniquely vulnerable and fragile that we alone were unable to provide the basic minimum provisions of the social charter? If he thinks that he can come back to the House, whatever the supine press may say, and present it as a triumph for Britain that he has managed to prevent those provisions from being applied in this country, although they are being applied everywhere else, he shows that the Government are not only economically bankrupt but bankrupt of values.

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman is an ungracious loser. This country has done very well in the negotiations and we have got an agreement that is right for this country. The reason for not accepting what people call the social chapter, which is in reality the imposition of labour laws that would damage our competitiveness, is that we intend to keep our competitiveness and we are not prepared to lose our competitiveness against Japan and the United States, even though that is the express policy of the Labour party.

Mr. Ivan Lawrence (Burton): Will my right hon. Friend confirm that we in Britain will retain complete freedom to run our own monetary and economic policy, that we have transferred no significant powers from Westminster to the European Parliament, and that, in securing the deletion of the word "federal", he has secured the deletion of the whole federal agenda? Is my right hon. Friend aware that, in securing all his aims at Maastricht, he will have the gratitude and admiration of the entire nation?

The Prime Minister: I am most grateful to my hon. and learned Friend. He is clear about our management of our own economy in the future in the way in which he sets it out. If at some stage we entered into a single currency, we should have to deal with a different matter. That is a matter for the House to decide at a later stage. The words "federal vocation" were unacceptable to the majority of hon. Members. They have been removed from the chapeau and replaced by the words that were in the original treaty of Rome—

"an ever closer union among the peoples of Europe".

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Why is it that German competitiveness can stand the social chapter and British competitiveness cannot? What is the distinction?

The Prime Minister: The Germans have had a different structure of labour laws for many years.

Mr. Anthony Nelson (Chichester): May I join in congratulating my right hon. Friend on negotiating an agreement that meets all our aspirations and protects our national interest? As the way is now open, with the agreement of the House, for us to join a single currency in just over five years, will my right hon. Friend spell out clearly to the House and to the people of this country what benefits will or may derive to them from a single currency?

The Prime Minister: If the House were to decide at a later stage to enter a single currency, it would be, first, because it had decided that the economic convergence conditions in Europe were right for a single currency to be beneficial to this country. A primary benefit that, if successful, a single currency would be likely to deliver for Europe would be low inflation across the whole of Europe. That would be a significant benefit for all the peoples of Europe.

Economic conditions in Europe at the time when the decision is taken will be crucial in determining whether that will be achievable. Because no one can know at this stage what those conditions might be, it would be unwise for anyone now to decide irrevocably to take that decision at a future date.

Mr. Doug Hoyle (Warrington, North): May I remind the Prime Minister that the predecessors of his Back-Bench colleagues waved their Order Papers for a Prime Minister who promised "peace in our time", just as he has promised "no single currency in our time". Wrath turned on that Prime Minister when it was realised that he was not right, just as it will turn on the present Prime Minister. As one who has never thought that we have got much benefit from the European Community, I say that the right hon. Gentleman is following the path of his predecessor, which is, "Negotiate nothing but accept everything."

May I add——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is enough. The hon. Gentleman should ask only one question.

The Prime Minister: I notice that another strongly anti-European Labour Back-Bench Member is giving the lie yet again to the newly found Europeanism of the Labour Front Bench. The hon. Gentleman has it precisely wrong on European policy. The Labour party's policy is, "If it has a European label on it, buy it, even if it is worthless; but if it is the British national interest, sell it, even if it is valuable."

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have to protect the business of the House. We have two other important debates today. I shall allow questions to continue until 4.45. Then we shall move on. May we have brief questions, please?

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Will my right hon. Friend note that, in comparison with the Labour party, which has changed its mind many times, the Conservative party has been consistent since the 1960s—a policy that has led to greater union among the peoples of Europe? My right hon. Friend is to be congratulated on showing that that can happen, and that a further step can be taken towards "ever closer union" on an intergovernmental basis, and not just on the basis of the treaty of Rome.

Will my right hon. Friend also confirm——

Mr. Speaker: No.

The Prime Minister: Labour Members have changed their minds and their policies on Europe at least seven times, but in that they still lag behind the changes of mind of their leader.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): Does the Prime Minister accept that for many people of my age and younger in this country the British leaders' performance at Maastricht was rather embarrassing? Pasty-faced Englishmen waving their union jacks and shouting boo at Johnnie Foreigner are never an edifying sight—whether on the football terraces or in intergovernmental relations.

Is it not time that the older Members of the House realised that the empire has gone, that the idea of Britain as east America—Athens to America's Rome—is a phantom of their imagination, and that our future lies in Europe? It lies at the heart of Europe, which means that we must be not in a minority of one but right there where the decisions are made.

The Prime Minister: That is precisely where we have been, which is why so many of the decisions reached in the past two days have been on British initiatives that have been accepted across the whole of Europe. The hon. Gentleman is not a very convincing advocate of the policies of youth.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton (Macclesfield): Although I remain strongly opposed to any closer political or economic union with Europe, will my right hon. Friend accept that the leadership that he has shown at the Maastricht conference and his toughness in the negotiations clearly display that he is the only party leader competent to govern this country during the next few years?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to agree with my hon. Friend. I am grateful for his remarks.

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Instead of erroneously portraying the social charter as a formula for increased unemployment and as a dangerous capitulation to the trade unions, should we not realise that a policy of co-determination that gives employees a say and a stake in the running of their firms is the very reason why the economies of so many western European countries have been so successful? Even though the Prime Minister has not incorporated the provision into the agreement at Maastricht, does he not agree that it is high time that we in this country also took those steps for ourselves?

The Prime Minister: I have great sympathy with the premise on which the hon. Gentleman bases his question, but such matters are best determined by individual employers and their work forces and not by the imposition of general blanket rules that may not be appropriate to individual countries or companies.

Sir Anthony Durant (Reading, West): May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on what he has done at Maastricht in limiting the powers of the Commission, about which my constituents have been concerned for a long time?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I think that that view was held widely across Europe, and I was delighted that our European partners were content with the proposals that we advanced.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Did I hear the Prime Minister correctly? Did he refer to the high standards of social protection in this country? What, if anything, will the Maastricht agreement do to eradicate the real inequalities throughout Europe, which mean, for example, that pensioners in this country receive about 43 per cent. of average net earnings compared with the European Community average of 73 per cent.?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman did indeed hear me correctly. He may recall that it was his party and not mine that cut health and welfare expenditure in the 1970s. On the pensions point, he does not compare like with like. He is comparing the state pension in this country with the cumulative state and private pensions abroad.

Mr. Jonathan Sayeed (Bristol, East): It has been estimated that signing up to the social charter would have cost Britain a minimum of £5,000 million a year, decreased competitiveness and increased unemployment. Is my right hon. Friend aware of any Opposition party—it is the Opposition parties that are so keen for the social charter—ever having contested those figures, and, if not, why are they so keen to go into something that would disadvantage Britain? Or are they just keen for a pat on the back from M. Delors?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is quite right about the costs. He will, of course, know that the Leader of the Opposition has said in the past that "Sweden is certainly a model for us".

If the right hon. Gentleman does not accept what I say about industrial matters, he will perhaps listen to the head of the Swedish employers federation, who said that the Community should learn from Sweden:

"It could above all avoid mistakes when it comes to regulations based on the social charter. The ideas behind the proposal for the working time directive have been proved wrong in Sweden."

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): Has not the Prime Minister managed to get the worst of all worlds by vetoing what he should have accepted—the social upgrading that we all want—and by half accepting what he should have vetoed—economic and monetary union, which will be deeply damaging and which will lock both this country and Europe into a decade of deflation? Has he not ignored the main problem of Europe, which is to get a realignment of currencies so that the deutschmark goes up and sterling down and we can get out of the present debilitating recession?

The Prime Minister: We have heard yet another consistently anti-European Labour Member. The hon. Gentleman has been consistent in his opposition to the Community and, if he stands his ground—as I have no doubt he will—in due course those on his Front Bench will agree with him once again.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): May I congratulate the Prime Minister both on his performance at Maastricht and on his performance here today? Does he agree, however, that what we need to pursue now is cross-nation inspection of the implementation of rules and regulations emanating from Brussels to ensure enforcement in other nations and not just in Britain? Will he ensure that the Italians and French do not get away with a failure to put into practice the rules and regulations that this country puts into practice immediately?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend touches on a serious problem. A certain amount of cross-border examination to ensure that European Community rules are met already exists and, as my hon. Friend knows from what I said earlier, in future we shall have much tighter enforcement rules to ensure that those countries—all of them—that sign up to European directives will have to obey those directives or face fines for not doing so. I think that that will ensure two things: first, greater equality of action across the Community; and, secondly, to a greater degree than ever before that every nation that signs up to a directive considers in detail the implications and costs of that directive before it becomes law.

Mr. John Evans (St. Helens, North): The Prime Minister alleges that the social charter will cost jobs, but will he confirm that nearly three quarters of a million British citizens have lost their jobs since he became Prime Minister? Is he aware that the best of British companies, such as ICI and Pilkingtons, which already provide their employees with far better conditions than anything that is in the social charter, are increasingly concerned about unfair competition from their sweatshop competitors? Is not his rejection of the social charter a kick in the teeth to the best employers and a massive boost to sweatshop, anti-union employers in Britain?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman has been more than usually maladroit in his choice of example. He referred to ICI, whose chairman, Sir Denys Henderson, has this morning warmly welcomed the agreement that I reached.

Mr. Anthony Beaumont-Dark (Birmingham, Selly Oak): Does my right hon. Friend accept that the one existing example of convergence in Europe is the convergence of west Germany and east Germany, which has resulted in the highest inflation and interest rates that Germany has ever had, and which is costing Britain at least 1·5 per cent. more in terms of our interest rate than would have been the case had the two countries remained separate? What guarantee do we have that, when we have to converge with, for example, the Greeks, Portuguese and Italians, the money transferred from our pockets to theirs will not merely impoverish us and give money to those who have not earned it while we have to work harder for less and pay higher interest rates?

The Prime Minister: It is, of course, largely for that economic reason that convergence of the economies before a single currency becomes operative is absolutely essential. If there were a single currency without convergence, it would have several serious effects on the smaller countries. There would certainly be a collapse of asset values and large regional unemployment and, as a result of those two factors, there would undoubtedly be a demand for very large transfers of resources from northern states to southern states. All that argues strongly for proper convergence conditions.

My hon. Friend referred to the merging of the economies of west Germany and the former German Democratic Republic—the merging of one large economy with one small economy. The merging of 12 mature economies is a much bigger undertaking than that. That is why it is essential, as a preliminary to any future action that the House has to consider, that there is a proper convergence of the economies.

Points of Order

4.48 pm

Several Hon. Members: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am on my feet.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Call Mr. Skinner.

Mr. Speaker: Sit down, please.

I shall bear in mind some—I emphasise "some"—of those hon. Members who have not been called today when it comes to the debate next week.

Mrs. Maria Fyfe (Glasgow, Maryhill): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. There is no need to point out to you the extent to which women are under-represented in the House, and many women will be disappointed to note that, on an agreement affecting the female population—especially in relation to maternity rights and pay—we have not had a proper hearing today. I hope that you will do something about it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that the hon. Lady is complaining about the fact that she was not called. She knows, as she is an Opposition Front-Bench spokesman——

Mrs. Fyfe: No, I am not.

Mr. Speaker: If she is not, she should be. I thought that she was a Front-Bench spokesman. I will bear her very much in mind when we debate the matter next week.

Mr. Denis Howell (Birmingham, Small Heath): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you consider what you have just said? Front-Bench spokemen also represent their constituents, and their constituents are as entitled to be heard on this matter as they are——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I entirely agree and I do not exclude them wholly. However, I bear in mind the fact that Front-Bench spokemen have an automatic right to speak on their subject from the Front Bench—and sometimes at considerable length.

Mr. Robert N. Wareing (Liverpool, West Derby): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. In view of what you have just said, are you likely to be more generous to members of the Whips Office who may wish to speak in a debate?

Mr. Speaker: I am very generous to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Harry Ewing (Falkirk, East): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I know that the hon. Gentleman is going to be helpful.

Mr. Ewing: I raise a point of order in relation to Scottish questions. In accordance with the procedures of the House, two weeks ago today I tabled a question asking the Secretary of State for Scotland to meet Scottish chief constables to discuss the need to inform the public about when nuclear waste material was passing through their areas. The question appeared as No. 16 on the Order Paper. The Scottish Office decided on Wednesday or Thursday of last week to transfer that question under the priority written procedure to the Secretary of State for Transport.

It is Wednesday today, and Scottish questions have been answered. Obviously, I did not receive an answer to my question from the Scottish Office and, even under the priority written procedure, I have not yet received an answer from the Secretary of State for Transport. Having tabled my question two weeks ago according to the procedures of the House, I have not yet received a reply. That is unfair.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has a legitimate complaint. I notice that the Government Whip is making a note. I am sure that he has recorded what the hon. Gentleman said. The hon. Gentleman should have received an answer by now.

Social Security

Mr. Speaker: We now come to the Social Security orders and the Opposition prayers.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will notice that in relation to the Opposition prayers, the three instruments concerned have not yet been considered by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. When it was announced that the orders were to be considered this week, the instruments were not in the hands of our clerk and our counsel. If our Committee can consider an instrument and make a report —as we are obliged to under Standing Orders—in time for a debate, we use our best endeavours.

It is a matter of deep regret that the Department of Social Security failed to provide copies of the instruments in time for the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments to consider them and report to the House. The House has not had the opportunity to consider the instruments in detail or subject them to detailed technical examination. Your Counsel, with his expert advice, has not been able to run a fine-toothed comb over them. My Committee has an important job to do.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman has made an important point. The House should be grateful to him and for what his Committee does in examining statutory instruments.

4.53 pm

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I beg to move,

That the draft Social Security Benefits Up-rating (No. 2) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 4 December, be approved.

I understand that it will be for the convenience of the House if we also discuss the following Government motions:

That the draft Social Security (Contributions) (Re-rating) (No. 2) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 4th December, be approved.

That the draft Guaranteed Minimum Pensions Increase (No. 2) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 4th December, be approved.

That the draft Statutory Sick Pay (Rate of Payment) (No. 2) Order 1991, which was laid before this House on 4th December, be approved.

That the draft Social Security (Introduction of Disability Living Allowance) Regulations 1991, which were laid before this House on 26th November, be approved.

That this draft Disability Working Allowance (General) Regulations 1991, which were laid before this House on 26th November, be approved.

That the draft Social Security (Disability Living Allowance) Regulations 1991, which were laid before this House on 26th November, be approved.

That the draft Social Security (Adjudication) Amendment (No. 3) Regulations 1991, which were laid before this House on 26th November, be approved.

Perhaps we can also consider the three Opposition prayers:

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Social Security (Attendance Allowance) Regulations 1991 (S.I., 1991, No. 2740), dated 5th December 1991, a copy of which was laid before this House on 5th December, be annulled.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Social Security (Claims and Payments) Amendment Regulations 1991 (S.I., 1991, No. 2741), dated 5th December 1991, a copy of which was laid before this House on 5th December, be annulled.

That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that the Disability Living Allowance and Disability Working Allowance (Consequential Provisions) Regulations 1991 (S.I., 1991, No. 2742), dated 5th December 1991, a copy of which was laid before this House on 5th December, be annulled.

In view of the plethora of material for debate and the fact that the debate is starting rather late for reasons that the House understands, I think that it will be sensible if I curtail my remarks to some degree. I will not therefore take the time of the House with the conventional lengthy explanation of the detail of what are in fact relatively routine pieces of annual business, such as the guaranteed minimum pensions order and the draft contributions rerating order, which are very much in line with their predecessors over a number of years. The detail of the proposals on contributions was, of course, fully set out in the very full statement that I made to the House by way of a written answer at the same time as my right hon. Friend the Chancellor's autumn statement on 6 November.

Similarly, I will refer only briefly to the statutory sick pay order, which gives effect to the SSP proposals announced in my uprating statement to the House on 21 October. The order increases the lower rate of SSP by the full retail prices index increase of 4·1 per cent., from £43·50 to £45·30 a week, while leaving the higher rate unchanged at £52·50. At the same time, the earnings threshold which forms the boundary between the two rates, which is now aligned with the earnings threshold for payment of full-rate employers' class 1 contributions, will go up from £185 per week to £190 per week. In no other respect does the order make changes in arrangements put in place last year which were extensively debated at the time and which, as I said to the House in October, appear to be working well.

My speech is therefore directed principally to what will no doubt be the two main areas of interest to the House: that is to say, the benefits uprating generally and the voluminous regulations that provide or pave the way for the introduction of disability living allowance and disability working allowance in April 1992, to the advantage of tens of thousands of disabled people.

First, I deal with the general uprating order. As the House knows, for those benefits which are not income-related, the basis for the uprating is the full increase in the RPI for the 12 months from September 1990 to September 1991, which was 4·1 per cent. With the exception of the higher rate of SSP to which I have already referred, this has been applied to all the relevant main benefits rates—notably retirement pensions, war pensions, widows' pensions, invalidity benefit, severe disablement allowance, the disability living allowance rates equivalent to the present mobility and attendance allowances, invalid care allowance, industrial injuries benefits, and the national insurance benefits for unemployment, sickness and maternity. It has also been applied to the special Ministry of Defence payment to the pre-1973 war widows.

In particular, we have thus once again honoured in full our commitment to increase in line with prices the basic retirement pension, which will thus rise from £52 to £54·15 a week for a single person and from £83·25 to £86·70 for a couple, entailing additional expenditure of about £1 billion.

Just over a year ago, I told the House that child benefit is, and will remain, a strong element in our policies for family support. It is fair to claim that those words have been amply borne out in the intervening period and are confirmed again in this order. Following the increase for the eldest eligible child last April, we have made a further increase for all children in October, with corresponding increases in income-related benefit rates to make sure that the less well-off families also gained to the same extent.

This order now provides for the full year's 4·1 per cent increase to be applied from April to the October rates, even though they will have been in place for only six months. Thus the rate for the eldest eligible child will rise in April by 40p to £9·65 a week and the rate for other children by 30p to £7·80.

If I may anticipate a point which, I know from experience, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) may in due course seek to make, those increases mean that, when looked at alongside the extra help that we have made available in the past four years through income-related benefits for the less well-off families with children, which will amount to some £600 million next year, total expenditure on help to families next year will be higher than if we had simply increased child benefit each year since 1987-88.

Turning now to the income-related benefits, as the House knows, the uprating is, in this respect, based not on the full retail prices index, but on what is known as the Rossi index, which, in essence, is the RPI less housing costs but which we have this year brought more exactly into line with what the benefits are intended to cover by including in the calculation 20 per cent. of community charge, certain miscellaneous housing costs previously excluded and—perhaps most importantly—water and sewerage charges.

That more exact calculation has, I think, met with general approval and as I said in my statement about our proposal for council tax benefit in a written answer on 28 November, we intend to maintain that closer alignment in the wake of the changes in local taxation that are intended to take effect in April 1993. That is to say, the Rossi index would then need to reflect that there will be no minimum contribution to the new council tax, but water rates and the other miscellaneous items that I have mentioned would, of course, continue to be taken into account.

The House will also recall—I know that hon. Members of all parties will welcome this—that I have also made it clear that there will be no downward adjustment in 1993 in income-related benefit rates to correspond to the nearly £700 million which, in terms of 1992-93 benefit rates, is included in them in respect of the 20 per cent. contribution to the community charge.

The Rossi calculation on the basis that I have described produces this year an uprating index of 7 per cent. Thus, those on income-related benefits, who are the least well-off, will have their benefits uprated next April, under this order, by nearly 3 per cent. more than the rise in prices generally over the relevant period. Again, with one exception to which I will come in a moment, all the main rates of income support and the related applicable amounts for housing benefit and community charge benefit, together with the credits in family credit, will rise by the full 7 per cent.—producing, for example, an increase in income support for a couple with two children aged 10 and 12 from £104·55 to £111·85, and for a pensioner couple aged under 75 from £83·15 to £88·95.

The exception, of course, is those less well-off pensioners who are disabled or over 80, where the order provides for additional increases of £1 a week for a single pensioner and £1·50 for a couple, over and above the 7 per cent. Thus, the benefit for a pensioner couple over 80 will rise from £88·45 a week to £96·15 a week—an increase of 8·7 per cent., which is more than double the increase in the retail prices index.

I remind the House that this is the third year running in which, using the new pensioner premium structure introduced by the 1988 reforms, we have directed real extra support to those over pension age who are least well-off. Overall, by next April—when nearly 1 million people will gain from this year's real increase, either directly through income support or through increased entitlement to housing or community charge benefit—we shall in three years have steered an extra one third of a billion pounds in real extra benefit to less well-off pensioners, in a way which I believe the whole House will welcome and support.

Before leaving the uprating order, there are three other points on the income-related benefits on which I should touch. The first, which is, of course, also a point of particular although not exclusive concern to large numbers of less well-off people over pension age, is the further large increase in the special income support limits for those in residential care and nursing homes. Following the very important increase last year, which focused especially on the needs of those in nursing homes in the light of the survey information that we had received, the increase next April will give an additional £15 a week across virtually all the main categories and with an even larger increase, of £20 a week for two residential care categories—the very dependent elderly and the mentally handicapped—which together account for nearly two fifths of all residential care cases on income support.

The only increase smaller than the £15 is in what is known as the terminal illness category for nursing homes, for reasons that I explained to the House in my uprating statement, where we have instead thought it more appropriate to make, through the Department of Health, an additional grant of £1 million specifically directed to the funding of hospices. I am, of course, aware that these increases have not removed all controversy from this area of the benefit system. Indeed, if I had thought that, I would no doubt have been disabused of it by last night's debate, to which my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) so ably replied.

I think it can fairly be claimed that the increases are widely regarded as having appropriately addressed a number of important concerns. Certainly, at a cost of nearly £200 million, they are a further reflection of the Government's continuing commitment to disabled and elderly people in need of residential care.

Secondly, I should refer to one aspect of the uprating order which does not reflect the proposals in my uprating statement, which is in respect of the non-dependant deductions made from housing benefit, or income support for housing costs, in cases where the claimant's home contains another adult who could reasonably be expected to contribute to those costs. The present order contains the current structure and rates of those deductions, simply because the amendments that I outlined in the uprating statement require a separate set of amending regulations.

following statutory consultation with the local authority associations and referral to the Social Security Advisory Committee.

I expect to lay those regulations shortly, to provide, as I indicated in the uprating statement, for four rates of deduction, ranging from £4 to £18, to replace the present two, which are at £5·70 and £13·50. The effect would be to reduce the contribution expected from the least well-off non-dependants by over a quarter, while expecting somewhat more than at present from those with incomes of £130 a week or more. This has been generally thought to be fairer and more sensible than the present arrangements and, indeed, the Social Security Advisory Committee decided not to undertake a formal consultation.

Lastly on the income-related benefits, although for the most part not arising directly from the uprating order itself, I should remind the House of two other important changes that are taking place in April 1992, when we are introducing a new maintenance disregard of £15 a week into family credit, housing benefit, community charge benefit and the new disability working allowance, and at the same time reducing from 24 hours to 16 the number of hours of work required for someone to be able to qualify for family credit. Those changes will be of particular benefit to lone parents who wish to work, and I am glad to be able to announce today a further measure which I believe will contribute to making those changes even more effective.

I am providing a grant of £1 million to the National Council for One Parent Families to enable it to run courses for lone parents who are thinking of returning to work. The council has an impressive track record in this area and I am very pleased that the Government are joining it in this venture. Its work will be complementary to the services already provided by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Employment. I believe that that adds to what is a package of solid and practical help from which many lone parents and their children will stand to derive real benefit.

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Before the Secretary of State leaves the issue of income support and income-related benefits, could he tell us what further progress has been made towards ensuring that those pensioners who are now eligible for income support take it up? I know that the right hon. Gentleman chased up this issue with the local authorities and that he has issued a circular on it.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman has asked a fair question, but I cannot give him a report on the outcome of that effort—our biggest single effort—to encourage local authorities to use what the jargon terms their "housing benefit computers" to notify people aged over 80 who might be expected to gain. It is expected that those notices will go out early next year. We are well on the way towards achieving that notification, but obviously I cannot tell the hon. Gentleman what result has been achieved.

Nevertheless, I assure him and anybody else who is interested in such matters that I am not in the business of putting up benefit rates, as we have done, with a view to minimising the number of people who are helped by them. We shall do everything that we can, in that way or through more normal publicity in magazines and the specialist press, to ensure that people who are entitled to additional payments as a result of the increases actually get those additonal payments.

The other major area covered by the regulations before the House is the introduction next April of disability living allowance, which will embrace the existing mobility and attendance allowances for those of working age and at the same time extend help with mobility or care costs to some 300,000 disabled people who at present get no such help at all, and of disability working allowance, a completely new benefit to help those disabled people who wish to work to some extent but who feel inhibited from doing so by the present benefit system.

The number and bulk of the regulations perhaps indicates just what a major undertaking the new disability benefits represent, involving as they do not only the payment of benefit to substantial numbers of new beneficiaries but a comprehensive improvement of the way in which we assess and adjudicate benefits.

Taking the latter aspect first—it is certainly not the least important—the amendments to the adjudication regulations and claims and payments regulations indicate radical changes in the way in which we assess disability benefits. I highlight particularly the proposed self-assessment process, which is the key to both disability living allowance and disability working allowance and to the new regime for attendance allowance, which continues for the over-65s.

The new system changes the basis on which the benefits will be assessed to give disabled people themselves more say and an opportunity for the first time to tell us about their everyday needs, with the help and support of their carers and those professionals, including their GPs, who know most about their needs. That means that we will be able to minimise the requirement—a feature of the benefit arrangements often criticised—for claimants to be subjected to medical examinations. That objective will be widely supported.

In devising the new self-assessment procedures for the three benefits, we have consulted widely with disabled people and their organisations. My right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People deserves great credit for that. We have tested the leaflets and claim forms with disabled people and taken their advice on ways of improving the process. We are also consulting disabled people on the best ways of publicising the new benefits, using every possible means at our disposal.

In that regard, I echo the words that I uttered a few moments ago in reply to the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen). The process of involving disabled people and their organisations in a wholly different way from what happened before, perhaps under either Administration, has been widely welcomed. It has brought a helpful response from disabled people and their organisations.

Mr. Allen: I will try not to bother the Secretary of State again. He has probably seen early-day motion 356, tabled in the names of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Withington (Mr. Bradley) and myself, about the distribution of claim forms. The claim forms will be the property of the individuals. There is great anxiety that groups or welfare rights people who may assist individuals to fill in those forms will not be able to get hold of the forms. If they could get them, they could short-circuit the process and assist the Department. Will the Secretary of State undertake to look at the early-day motion and comment on it constructively?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman has asked a reasonable question in an extremely reasonable way; I do not mean to express the surprise that might be detected, but I am always anxious to give credit where it is due. He will no doubt have noticed my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security Disabled People muttering in my ear as he spoke. My right hon. Friend assures me that there is no question of seeking to deny forms to those who feel that it would be helpful to have them to perform the role mentioned by the hon. Gentleman. My right hon. Friend will say more about it when he replies to the debate.

I assure the hon. Gentleman again, in line with what I have said twice in a sense, that we are in the business of doing everything that we reasonably can to help disabled people, elderly people or whomever we are seeking to help. If disability organisations, Age Concern, citizens advice bureaux or other organisations can be assisted by being provided with forms, I would not want to put any impediment in the way. That is the spirit in which we shall approach it.

As I was about to say before I was so politely interrupted, the other point for particular mention is the right of appeal to a new form of independent tribunal. All the new disability appeal tribunals—for appeals on disability matters on all three benefits—will include not only a legal chairman and a doctor but, most importantly, someone with practical experience in the needs of disabled people. Indeed, we intend that as many tribunals as possible will include a member who is himself or herself a disabled person.

The complexity of the next set of regulations, on disability living allowance, arises from our decision to introduce the new benefit in a single step, unlike the many years of phasing which occurred when mobility allowance was started in 1976. I do not want to go over the difficulties or the sense of unfairness that the phasing caused, but I am sure that our decision to introduce the new regulations in one go is right.

The first and most important function of the regulations is therefore to provide for a smooth transition from the old benefits to the new disability living allowance. More than 600,000 people getting mobility allowance and about 300,000 people under 65 getting attendance allowance will all be automatically transferred to the appropriate rate of disability living allowance. If I emphasise that it is because I hope that it will help to allay finally any misplaced concerns about the position of existing claimants. There is no question of the transfer being used as an opportunity to review and remove or downrate anyone's existing benefit entitlement.

The other "technical" regulations, the consequential provisions regulations, cover the consequences throughout the social security system of the introduction of DLA and DWA. I draw the House's particular attention to the fact that people on income support, who from April qualify for one of the new rates of DLA, will automatically get title to the disability premium in their income support. That means that someone who may currently be getting £39·65 in income support at this year's benefit rates could from April 1992 get £71·80 in income support and disability living allowance, an increase of around £30 a week for several thousand of the least well-off disabled people.

What might be called the "main" sets of regulations in that area are the disability living allowance, disability working allowance and attendance allowance benefit regulations. Taking disability working allowance first, the regulations are a voluminous bundle from which I draw particular attention to the radical new functional disability test which underpins DWA. I hope that hon. Members who, understandably, in debates during the passage of the Act expressed concerns about how the Department might be planning to adjudicate the definition of will gain reassurance from what the regulations provide.

The functional test will be set out in a simple-to-answer claim form in which all that the claimant has to do is tick the boxes which apply to him. Most claimants, particularly people making the transition from incapacity back to work, will not have to fill in even that simple form. All that we will ask for is a straightforward declaration that the claimant has a disability which puts him at a disadvantage in getting a job; we think that in such cases the supporting evidence from the disability benefit or recent incapacity benefit is sufficient confirmation of the person's disadvantage.

Disability working allowance is a totally new depature in social security. It provides a benefit not only for those who can work but whose disability prevents them from achieving their full earnings potential, but for those on the road to recovery from long-term illness who need some short-term help to re-enter the labour market. The majority of people who will claim disability working allowance could not afford to take a job at present, to put the matter very clearly. The aim of DWA is to change that.

I acknowledge that it will inevitably take some time for that large change to work through: it will take some time for disabled people to start taking DWA into account when deciding whether to seek a job; and, because it provides a new opportunity for disabled people, it is bound to take time to build up the case load.

I assure the House that we shall monitor progress closely to see what we can do to ensure that disabled people are aware of the new opportunities for independence that the new benefit will offer—my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People may want to say a word more on that. If matters come to light which we can tackle and which will help to make the benefit even more effective, we shall consider them.

Disability living allowance regulations and the accompanying attendance allowance regulations are, happily, much less lengthy. That is largely because the conditions of entitlement for disability living allowance are clearly set out in the primary legislation.

The regulations, however, also give effect to important improvements beyond those contained in the Bill that we published last autumn, including changes for children who are in hospital for up to 12 weeks, and the higher rate of benefit for severely mentally handicapped people with severe behaviour disorder—10,000 of whom can now look forward to £73·65 a week from DLA—or rather more than £90 per week in recognition of their disability needs if they are on income support.

I have necessarily taken a good deal of the time of the House in describing the content and purpose of the orders.

Let me conclude by saying simply this. The orders themselves are inevitably often complex and technical—sometimes wearisomely so, even to those of us who are enthusiasts in such matters—but underneath the technicalities lie some very straightforward points.

We are honouring our commitment to 10 million retirement pensioners. We are directing real extra help, over and above that, to nearly 1 million pensioners who are among the least well off.

We are making the third increase in a year in help to all families with children; we are reinforcing the growing success of family credit for low-income families in work, and not least for lone parents; and we are carrying forward a programme of improvement and reform of disability benefits, from which hundreds of thousands of disabled people will gain.

In agreeing these orders, the House will have done a good day's work.

5.21 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): We have just listened to a speech by the Secretary of State which was, as he said, quite detailed and technical, but was also quite effusive, especially in his peroration, when he set out how the Government had carried out all their commitments, how much expenditure had increased and how generous the Government have been to this, that or the other group with regard to the minutiae of social security provisions.

It was the sort of speech which is listened to with respectful deference, if, I suspect, with a measure of blind incomprehension on the Government Benches, and it will no doubt earn congratulations or plaudits later in the debate from Conservative Members, who will say how well he has done for the various groups, with minute improvements eulogised out of all proportion.

I sometimes wonder whether I am the only person who finds these debates predictably sentimental and not a little hypocritical. The truth is that the Secretary of State, having commended the measures to us as not only decent but even generous, would be horror-stricken if he, or any members of his immediate family or any of his hon. Friends who will be supporting him, had to live on the benefit standard of living that he enthuses about. I do not suppose that most of them know, or have any understanding of, what that standard of living is.

I suspect that the truth is that most Conservative Members would rather be dead than seen claiming benefit in a social security office. It is that lack of identification with the victims of our society which I regret seems to give these debates such an unreal air of ministerial mutual congratulation. That is a pity, because the standard of living of about 17 million people in our society depends, technically at least, on the result of this debate.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Does my hon. Friend remember a former Conservative Member of Parliament who was challenged to live on the same amount of money that one would receive in income support? He lost his seat—I am not suggesting that that was a result of the experiment, which was shown on television. He found that it was impossible to manage on that sum of money, which ran out before seven days were up. Are any Conservative Members willing to try to live on the state pension plus income support? If they are—perhaps the Ministers or one of their Back-Bench supporters would like to try—I should certainly like to know.

Mr. Meacher: I should like to know, too. My hon. Friend raises a significant matter. We know that Mr. Matthew Parris tried to live for one week—I give him credit for trying—on such a sum. At the end of the week, he had a far better understanding of the appalling standard of living to which we in the House condemn about one in seven of our fellow citizens for months or for years on end.

If hon. Members had to live for a week or two on income support, I do not think that it would remain at the present level. No one can keep themselves together, eat healthily, get the basic clothing that they need, or participate as an active citizen in society, on £42 a week.

I would be the first to admit that the numbers that I quoted—17 million—are so enormous that any substantial or significant improvement in their living standards could not be brought about overnight or by any realistic adjustment of one year's uprating orders.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Let us suppose that the hon. Gentleman is right, for the sake of argument. Is it not the case that he has no proposals to do anything substantial about it, because his proposals relate only to child benefit and pensions, and not to any other social security benefit? Can we have that on the record, please?

Mr. Meacher: One thing that we would have done differently, and that we shall do differently, is that we shall not allow the poorest in our society not to share in the rising living standards of the rest of the Community. That applies to 10 million pensioners and to people on income support, which is not merely extremely low, but has fallen steadily as a proportion of average earnings in the past few years. That is unforgivable. I would be the first to admit that, under the last Labour Government, supplementary benefit was not a prince's ransom. However, it is unforgivable to allow it to fall further, and not to use the vast extra resources available to the Government through North sea oil, privatisation assets—and the money that they gave away in taxation to the richest instead—to give more to the poorest.

Mr. Newton: I shall try to approach my intervention in the same way as the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen), and simply try to establish a fact.

An important development seems to follow from what the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) has said. I previously understood that his reference to uprating by the increase in earnings or prices was confined only to the pension area of the benefit system. The implication of what he has just said is that uprating factors of earnings or prices—whichever is the larger—would be applied throughout the benefit system, including to income-related benefits. Can he confirm that?

Mr. Meacher: It is, indeed, confined to pensions, but if the Secretary of State looked at the experience of what happened to supplementary benefit under the last Labour Government, he would see that it did not fall. It is in the discretion of the Government. The Labour Government used their discretion to ensure that the poorest at least maintained their living standards. We intend to do that again, although it is not a commitment like the one that we made on pensions. We intend to reduce the number of people on income support—we certainly do not intend to let income support levels fall further behind.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I wanted to intervene before the Secretary of State did so, with regard to what the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) said. He was the candidate in Ashfield in 1979. The blue posters that he placed in windows at that time talked about cutting public expenditure, particularly on social security. He stood on doorsteps saying that the Labour Government were pouring money into people's pockets.

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend exposes the hypocrisy of some Conservative Members' interventions.

Our case against the Government is not that a £2 a week increase in pensions is a penny-pinching and niggardly exercise—although it is—but that in the past 12 years the Government have consistently and deliberately pursued a policy of pushing down the poor even further and penalising them for their poverty. It is not that the Government have tried but failed to redress the cancer of poverty in our midst, nor even that they did not try, but that they actively made the problem worse, either by indifference or by design.

They made it worse by indifference in 1986, when 8·25 million people were on income support and the right hon. Member for Chingford (Mr. Tebbit) declared—I have never forgotten his words:

"Poverty is just not an issue".

They made it worse by indifference in 1987, when the Secretary of State, the right hon. Member for Croydon, Central (Mr. Moore) declared that poverty had ceased to exist, despite the fact that 8·25 million people were still on income support.

The Government made matters worse by design in 1988, when 7·5 million people were on income support and the so-called reforms of the right hon. Member for Sutton Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) cut benefits by more than £1 billion a year. They are making matters worse by design in 1991 when, once again, 8·25 million people are on income support and the Government say that their first priority is to cut income tax by a further 1p in the pound.

Our charge is that, under this Government the poor are "the disappeared ones"—tolerated so long as they are invisible and resented if they obtrusively sleep in shop fronts or badger pedestrians for money in subways, or if their poverty and unemployment prove a cause of inner-city disorder or riots, as the chief constable of the West Midlands police claimed a month ago.

Our charge is that, after all the small print and technicalities of the orders that we are debating are set in place, Christmas will still be typical. On current trends, 50 or 60 pensioners will probably die of hypothermia in the next month, nearly 1,000 more people a day will join the income support queues, and a further 100 or more 16 to 17-year-olds a day will probably find themselves not only without further education, jobs or training but without benefit and often starving. It is hoped that, so long as they all do it quietly, no one will notice.

Our charge against the Government is that none of that need be so. Let us consider each of the groups that will be affected by the orders. Had Labour's link with earnings not been broken by the Government in 1980, single pensioners would celebrate a pension next April not of £54 a week but of nearly £70 a week, and married pensioners would receive not £86 a week but £111 a week.

Mr. Tim Smith: Where would the money come from?

Mr. Meacher: That is exactly the point that I am coming to. Every time we suggest the slightest improvement, Tory Members ask where the money will come from because, deep down, they do not really want to make improvements. They claim that improvements cannot be afforded. May I call in aid an important witness who has stated unequivocally that they could be afforded? Speaking about the financing of the state pensions framework which the Government inherited from Labour —that is, the earnings-related increase in the basic state pension plus SERPS—he said——

Mr. Newton: Who is he?

Mr. Meacher: I shall come to that. He said:

"There is no immediate cause for alarm. The main growth in pensions expenditure has come from improved benefits, not more claimants. Over the next 20 to 25 years, there is expected to be virtually no growth in the number of claimants, because of the low birth rate in the 1920s and 1930s. Indeed, the number of people over pension age is actually expected to fall as a proportion of the whole population, from about 17·5 per cent. now to 16·7 per cent. at the end of this century. Even as a proportion of the working population, which is what really matters, the numbers over pension age will be fairly stable until 2010 AD. So, unless decisions are taken to improve pensions further in real terms during the next 25 years, there is no major problem of finance."

I think that that person will carry great weight with the Secretary of State, because it was Sir Michael Partridge, his permanent secretary.

A Labour Government would have ensured that pensioners enjoyed their fair share of rising community living standards, whereas the Government deliberately decided to deprive them of it. According to a parliamentary answer that I received just a couple of weeks ago, this year alone pensioners have lost £5·7 billion as a result of that link being broken. One must conclude that the Government have cruelly neglected pensioners. Even on today's issue—the protection of occupational pension rights arising from the Mirror Group Newspapers scandal —there has been a deafening silence from the Secretary of State, who is rapidly becoming the Government's "invisible man".

The right hon. Gentleman is still dithering on the regulations on self-investment and on disclosure. Millions of pensioners whom the Government have cheated of a decent state pension are now deeply worried about the security of their occupational pensions, yet the right hon. Gentleman has been as silent as the grave.

What does the right hon. Gentleman propose for the unemployed? I do not think that he even mentioned them in his speech—if he did so, I did not catch it—yet, according to documents that were leaked about a week ago, the Government expect unemployment figures to rise to 2·9 million next year—that is, if they have not already reached that figure on a proper count, as many of us suspect. Our charge against the Government is not just the indifference to the unemployed shown by the right hon. Gentleman today, but the vendetta that the Government have waged against the unemployed in the past 12 years.

A few months ago, I tabled a parliamentary question asking the right hon. Gentleman to list the cuts in benefit to the unemployed in the past dozen years and the annual savings to the Government as a result of each cut. I can now tell the House that 11 separate cuts were made in unemployment benefit, and the total annual saving to the Government from all those cuts is now £1·5 billion a year. If Labour's benefits framework had been preserved, the unemployed would receive £1·5 billion more than they receive at present.

It is bad enough running an economic policy that makes the unemployed bear the price of the Government's crass mismanagement of the economy, but it is unforgivable gratuitously to force them down into poverty by repeatedly cutting the benefits for which they have paid through their own national insurance contributions.

As we know, the Prime Minister last night rejected the social chapter of the EMU treaty on the ground that it would be uncompetitive for British industry. He confirmed that again today. What he meant was that the Government are now placing the burden of competing squarely on the shoulders of British workers. Why is it that, under this Government, we can compete only if we make the terms and conditions of British workers—and those out of work—worse than they are even for Spanish, Portuguese and Greek workers?

Mr. Tim Smith: They will not get jobs.

Mr. Meacher: The unemployment rate in those countries, with the exception of Spain, is below that of this country, where it is still rising rapidly. Why is it that the employers in every other Community state can turn a profit while ensuring proper social rights and benefits for their employees, whereas in Britain we must have poverty wages, topped up by social security through family credit, before employers can make a profit? That is the worst way to compete. It is not competition based on efficiency, productivity or product innovation, but lower wages for those in work and lower benefits for those out of work.

No wonder the Prime Minister rejected the social dimension when unemployment benefit today in Italy is about £60 a week, in Germany it is £125 per week, in France it is £147 a week, in the Netherlands it is £211 a week, and in Denmark it is £271 a week.

Perhaps the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith), who likes to intervene, can give the House the level of unemployment benefit that he and his hon. Friends intend to impose on the 2·5 million to 3 million unemployed people in this country. Does he know what the level of unemployment benefit is in this country? Would he like to tell the House? Would the Secretary of State or indeed any Conservative Member like to tell us the level of unemployment benefit? Perhaps they need a note from those who can provide the information. It is significant that not a single Tory Member——

Mr. Newton: The hon. Gentleman has used the figure on a number of occasions and knows perfectly well that if we are talking about the most relevant rate—probably the income support rate—it is £39·65 per week at present. One fact to which he has not adverted is that many of the countries he mentioned have far more restrictive rules on the relation of such benefit to contribution payments. Many people who receive help here would not receive anything like the rates that the hon. Gentleman gave.

Mr. Meacher: That is an interesting point. Without looking into the full details—which I certainly intend to do—I should be very surprised if the right hon. Gentleman were right. After he and his right hon. Friends have imposed the actively-seeking-work rule, the restart procedure and the extension to two years for the contribution requirement, and after they have knocked out benefit for university and polytechnic students, I should be extremely surprised if what he said was correct. I was referring not to income support levels, but to unemployment benefit, which is a national insurance benefit for which people have paid and to which, under insurance principles, they have a right. It is perfectly clear that not a single Tory in the Chamber today knows the figure.

Mr. Newton: If the hon. Gentleman wants to proceed with this discussion, I can tell him that the rate for a single person is currently £41·40.

Mr. Meacher: I am pleased that the Secretary of State has finally tumbled to the figure: he is right in saying that it is £41·40. It was clear than none of his hon. Friends, certainly none of those behind him—those who are to impose that level on the people of this country—know what the figure was. The rate is indeed £41, when the average wage today is about £300. That is not just slightly lower than every other EC country, but five or six times lower than that of some of our competitors.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): My hon. Friend was right to say that unemployment benefit is paid for from national insurance contributions. Under the Government's rotten legislation, a person whose employer claims that he or she left work without reason—for example, a woman working at night who feared an attack and who left work without an excuse that the employer found valid—could have his or her unemployment benefit reduced for up to 26 weeks. In practice, unemployment benefit offices cut the benefit for the total 26 weeks.

Mr. Meacher: My hon. Friend makes an important point. I imagine that the Secretary of State was deeply embarrassed when, as a Minister, he introduced that legislation in Committee. I credit him with being embarrassed because it was iniquitous to increase from six weeks, initially to 13 and then to 26 weeks, the period when such people are not entitled to unemployment benefit and to reduce income support by 40 per cent. below the extremely low levels that I have already mentioned.

Such a policy does not just provide a disincentive, but places an intolerable penalty on some of the most helpless victims in society. That policy is dependent not on "industrial gross misconduct"—the imposing, solemn words used—but on the say-so of the employer. If, for any reason, the employer has a grudge against the employee, the employer's word will be taken by the DSS, not the employee's. My hon. Friend was entirely right to raise that issue.

We often hear about the Prime Minister having suffered dole hell when he was 19. What a pity that, when he became a Social Security Minister, along with the present Secretary of State for Social Security, he imposed the rule that created a much worse dole hell for those who came after him. When the Prime Minister left work in order to look after his father and cared for him for a time—a creditable thing to do—he sought to claim, and received, unemployment benefit. For the sort of reasons outlined by my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr.

[Mr. Meacher]

Cryer), I doubt whether the Prime Minister would receive unemployment benefit today. If he did, he would probably be disqualified from receiving it for 26 weeks.

No one is suggesting that differences of the order of magnitude to which I have referred can be made good in a single uprating order. I am not saying that sufficient changes to make our system comparable with those in the EC can come overnight. Our charge against the Government is that, instead of seeking to close the gap, during the past 12 years they have deliberately widened it by a massive degree. That is what we oppose.

We have one of the lowest levels of child benefit in the EC. Despite what the Secretary of State said as he tried to make excuses by talking about alternative ways of providing help to families, the orders do nothing to remedy the losses to families and children that resulted from three years of Tory freeze. For the second and subsequent children, those losses amount to more than £2 a week. Despite the rhetoric about choice, the Secretary of State and his hon. Friends have done nothing to provide mothers with increased opportunities to work and paths to independence, which is what they want.

It is not enough to increase child benefit; mothers want the opportunity to be independent and stand on their own two feet. The Government have made no attempt to secure nationwide child care provision for working mothers. In addition, the Secretary of State has made no attempt to remove the poverty trap whereby if a mother stays home on income support, the mortgage interest on her home is paid, but if she works and receives family credit, the interest is not paid. As a result, many mothers are often forced back into unemployment and dependence.

The uprating orders are equally disappointing for disabled people. I listened carefully to what the Secretary of State said and I do not disagree with a good deal of it. However, I disagree with the fact that, after 12 years, the Government have not implemented a strategy of steadily working towards a comprehensive disability income benefit. That is what we should have had, but instead we have had 10 years of procrastination because the Government did absolutely nothing until 1990. I cannot blame the right hon. Gentleman personally for that. Reshuffled minutiae is not an unfair description of disability living allowance and disability working allowance.

The legislation was amended on Report to allow the affirmative procedure, and it is absurd that we have not been given proper time to debate these long and quite complex technical documents. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South said, the Government were determined to have them debated today, and documents have been pushed into the debate before the instruments have been examined by a statutory instruments Committee. That is an abuse of the House, and it is impossible in an hour or two of open debate such as this to go into the detail of the orders in the way that is required.

Before I run out of time, I should like to raise some of the key issues to which we expect full answers from the Minister. Will provision be made for visiting officers to help claimants who ask for assistance to complete the self-assessment forms? Will the disability working allowance claim packs clearly alert claimants to the fact that if they delay they may lose benefit? Why have several commonly occurring disabilities been excluded in devising the DWA tests? The Minister looks puzzled. Urinary incontinence is one and respiratory disorders are another. Will there be at least one specialist benefit adviser in each local office to deal with the likely huge influx of inquiries about DLA? Will the Government introduce rules to prevent disabled people from losing benefit if they serve, as I hope they will, on disability appeal tribunals?

The debate should be about a major further step towards comprehensive disability income. Every time that we debate disability benefit, which is a huge gap in our system, that is what we should discuss. Nothing more starkly reveals the parsimony of the Government than the fact that we are debating a £1·50 a week increase in the pathetically inadequate £10 lower care component of the DLA.

The last and biggest group of those covered by the orders are those on income support, and here, more than anywhere, the Government and especially the right hon. Gentleman should be ashamed. The Minister looks terribly tired. No doubt he finds tedious my repetition of these facts. I repeat them, because they get worse all the time.

In 1979, there were 4,400,000 people on supplementary benefit. I agree that that figure was too high. There are now 8,300,000 people on income support. When unemployment rises, as the Government expect and forecast, to 2·9 million next year, the total number on income support will rise to about 8,800,000. That will be the highest number for 50 years of those forced to live on the poverty line. That is the Government's memorial after 11 years of rampant Thatcherism and one year of the classless society. In that year alone, the number of people on income support has risen by more than 1 million.

The Prime Minister speaks about the power to choose. Where is the power to choose on £42·50 a week? One can scarcely survive on that, let alone have the power to choose healthy food or essential clothing. It is time for the House to ask on what basis it is right for one seventh of our population to be paid £42 a week when they cannot work, while the average worker receives £300 a week, MPs £600 a week, Ministers £1,200 a week and many directors more than £5,000 a week.

What makes the situation far worse is that the Government have pushed a record number of people to below the poverty line, a line which is worth less as a proportion of average earnings than ever before. The right hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister, who as I have said was a Social Security Minister in 1986, have produced a new category of poverty. They have pushed more than 1 million people below the poverty line, below £42 a week.

A parliamentary answer to me of 21 October showed that, as a direct result of the right hon. Gentleman's policies, more than 1 million people have been forced below the poverty line because of deductions of income support due to the poll tax, the social fund, and rent and fuel arrears. In addition, again as a direct result of the Act that the right hon. Gentleman and the Prime Minister together placed on the statute book, it is estimated that there are now about 115,000 16 to 17-year-olds with no education, no training, no jobs and no benefit entitlement. Many of them have not eaten for several days.

By contrast to these miserable orders, the next Labour Government will immediately raise the pension by £5 and £8 a week and the recipients, without deduction, will include those on income support. We shall restore the link with earnings so that pensioners will get their proper share of rising living standards, and we shall consolidate Labour's SERPS which already grants an entitlement of more than £40 a week for someone retiring on average earnings this year.

We shall restore to child benefit what was lost during the three years of Tory freeze, and it will also be paid without deduction to those on income support. We shall provide pathways to independence for lone mothers, restore benefit entitlement to 16 and 17-year-olds, introduce a minimum wage of £130 a week and implement the social charter. For the 17 million who are the subject of these orders, that day cannot come too soon.

5.57 pm

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): I went to Moscow for the weekend. In that city where the Soviet Union was slowly disintegrating I saw much poverty. Many people were queuing for food and I saw people with insufficient clothing for a temperature of minus 15 deg C. I also saw much unhappiness. As is the way with disintegrating socialist and communist economies, the guidebook took a rather different view. It was only two years old, but it painted a glowing picture of all the benefits that the communist and socialist system offered its people. It said much about the happiness of people. It showed happy faces and splendid statues and clean streets without queues. It gave not promises but statements, which it claimed to be accurate, about plenty of food and consumer goods.

When I listened to the overlong and turgid speech by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) I was reminded of that guidebook. He paints a picture that bears no semblance of realism to the United Kingdom today. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman's feelings and inadequacies were encapsulated most beautifully in his question about where the money would come from and by his claim that that was some sort of Tory threat. The great weakness of the socialist system is that it has no money at all. All the hon. Gentleman's grand statements about what the next Labour Government will do—they will not, because a Labour Government will not be elected—will come to naught because there will be insufficient funding to do what the hon. Gentleman anticipates and would dearly love to do.

The hon. Gentleman's statement also displayed his great lack of understanding of the statistics—either that, or I have to conclude that he was putting before the House statements that were not absolutely valid because they were so selective that they did not give a proper picture. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman does not know that statistics have to be soundly based before one can use them. For example, he spoke about unemployment in Greece, but how does he feel about the 1 million mythical olive trees that the common agricultural policy so sweetly supports because Greece has reported to Brussels that they are in need of being set aside and nurtured?

Statistics are only as good as the base from which they are taken. That is why I suggest that, when the hon. Member for Oldham, West claimed that we had the lowest level of child benefit in the European Community, although he was not exactly misleading the House, he should perhaps also have said that we have a significant scheme of family credit that is not shared by any other member of the European Community.

When the hon. Gentleman spoke about high unemployment payments and the levels of funding supplied by the state to the unemployed by other European countries, why did not he also add that in those member states there is no wife's pension, so that unemployment payments have to go towards providing a larger pension than the state provides? He spoke about the social charter, although he did not use the word "harmonisation", but why does not he admit that in Denmark, for example, men and women alike have a mandatory retirement age of 67? Why is it that he selects statistics that support only his own most abnormally inaccurate statements?

It is difficult for the hon. Gentleman, because he is trying to pursue an untenable case. I saw my right hon. and hon. Friends on the Front Bench look surprised when the hon. Gentleman spoke about the young being without a job or anything else, because he overlooked the largest youth training programme in the European Community.

The hon. Gentleman said about the elderly—this was his largest misunderstanding and cannot have been by accident—that people have paid and therefore have a right to have back in equal kind. I must correct that large and crucial misunderstanding. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will have better statistics on this than I do, but surely to goodness the hon. Member for Oldham, West understands that, as we are a rapidly aging population, the people over 65 or 60 now, whom we deem to be elderly and who are of pensionable age, are taking more back from the state than they ever put in. I do not deride them for that—it is merely a question of understanding that there is no equal balance in our society between the amount that one puts in and the amount that one gets back. That rapidly aging population is placing an ever larger burden on the younger people who are earning. [Interruption.]

I see that this accurate statement wholly eludes Opposition Front-Bench Members, who are merely laughing and jeering at it. It is a pity that they are doing so, because with a rapidly aging population what we need above all is intelligent and careful planning of social security benefits rather than the mediocre statements that we get from them.

Mr. Meacher: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Miss Nicholson: The Opposition Front-Bench spokesman has had his say, but I will give way to him because I know that he will merely trot out more nonsense for me to knock down.

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Lady is so anxious to lay about her, claiming misapprehensions, that she seems rather to have overlooked the obvious point that it is an insurance system, that there is such a thing as a contributory principle, and that the problem with the national insurance system is not the increasing number of elderly people taking more out of it. The Government increased national insurance contributions from 6·5 to 9 per cent.—that is, by 38 per cent. If there is a problem with the national insurance system, it is that the Government have spent billions bribing people to take up personal pensions and at the same time have ended the Exchequer supplement, which was 18 per cent. of the total income in 1979. Perhaps the hon. Lady needs a bit of a lesson about the nature of the national insurance system before she makes accusations against others.

Miss Nicholson: It was unparliamentary to claim that the Government have bribed the electorate, and it was not accurate either. It should not have been said. The hon. Member for Oldham, West has again picked selective statistics to support his untenable premise. He wholly overlooks the enormous investment in the national health service and other benefits and the way in which the elderly press heavily on the younger people who are putting the money into the system. My statements are accurate, and I should be happy to take the hon. Gentleman out to coffee afterwards to explain the matter to him. Exactly the same phenomenon occurred, a little ahead of us, in the United States.

The hon. Gentleman spoke about the social charter, or, more accurately, the social chapter that was taken out of last night's treaty, but he overlooked entirely the fact that the social chapter delineates gaps in the social service provisions of member states which do not exist here. For example, other member states do not have a national health service. There are many more benefits that our people have but that the hon. Gentleman would not dream of bringing to the attention of the House.

As the hon. Gentleman rightly said I would, I warmly welcome the statement by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State. It is good, for example, that income support is going up to 7 per cent. and I am particularly pleased, having served on the Committee considering the Local Government Finance Bill, which sets up the council tax, that those on income support will keep the payments given for the 20 per cent. poll tax, or community charge, payment and will not, on top of that, pay anything towards the council tax. That is an excellent thing, and I am delighted that it should be so.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West spoke disparagingly about the disabled benefits that my right hon. Friend announced today. With characteristic quietness, my right hon. Friend made a statement towards the end of his speech that highlights the purpose of these benefits. He said that they gave new opportunities for independence and that has been the key to both the disability working allowance and the disabled living allowance.

The disability working allowance is an important move forward. I should like to see it matched by something else —disability rights in employment. In a report, the Select Committee on Employment, whose meeting I am missing so that I can contribute to this important debate, asked the Secretary of State for Employment to look into such a concept. The disability working allowance will empower disabled people who wish to work to go to work and, one hopes, to reach their full potential. I am glad that it applies also to those with long-term illnesses.

We have a long way to go when personnel managers still do not allow someone an interview if he mentions on his application form some disability. Even something as minor as a small fit of epilepsy may disqualify somebody for interview. From the social security point of view, the disability working allowance, far from being something small and modest, is an important marker. I hope and believe that it will give the disabled new opportunities for independence, as my right hon. Friend suggested.

I do not consider a comprehensive disability allowance to be a desirable goal, because it would reflect a paternalistic attitude. It would not empower disabled people but rather depress and marginalise them, telling them that they are different and so must have a comprehensive disability allowance. Far more important is to give people the ability to follow the path that they wish. In this instance, I particularly welcome the disability working allowance.

I am glad to learn that there will be a self-assessment programme which will again help disabled people, who may feel different from the rest of society, to take charge of their own fate. That is a crucial part of the proposal that we are debating. I am also glad to hear that those on mobility allowance, for example, will be able to transfer automatically to the disabled living allowance.

I cannot help but remind my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People of the excellence of the independent living fund. Only yesterday I sent him a letter congratulating him on introducing that excellent measure which will not yet have reached him. Some of my friends who are active in various areas of disability are still concerned about the independent living fund's short life, and I again ask him to consider that once more. It is an extraordinarily positive measure, which is immensely important.

I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on the grant for the National Council for One Parent Families. It is difficult for one-parent families to learn skills which will enable them to bring up their children in the way that I am sure they would wish and the grant is excellent.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West accused Conservative Members of being hypocritical and sentimental. That is surprising from a man who was a Minister in a Labour Government when the Christmas bonus was denied for two years to some of those in greatest need.

The hon. Gentleman talks about the victims of society. Conservative Members do not see their fellow citizens as victims; we see them as citizens of the United Kingdom and people whom we wish to assist to achieve their potential. Throughout the hon. Gentleman's too lengthy speech, I detected not just the outdated guidebook to a defunct socialist philosophy, but a hefty dollop of hypocrisy and unacceptable sentimentality. I would not have confidence in his ability to bring home the British bacon were I a member of British society who needed help.

Finally, I do not want to let the Minister off too lightly, so when he replies will he be kind enough to tell me how he will treat the transitional payments on housing benefit from next April onwards?

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): It is always a pleasure to follow the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson). I was interested in what she said, particularly towards the end of her remarks. I agree that some of the recent changes in the area of disability have been commendable. The Government have moved quite a distance in a short space of time. The introduction of the new living allowance and disability working allowance scheme is another welcome improvement.

However, I profoundly disagree with the hon. Lady when she says that a comprehensive disability benefit would not be sensible in principle. I am sure that she is wrong about that. Those who study such matters have certainly persuaded me that it is the only sensible and fair way in which to deal with disability in the long term. I do not doubt that it would be more expensive, but we must move towards the situation where people can be fully compensated financially for the physical and learning effects of their disability.

Individuals need the help and support that is tailored to their needs and is right for them, so that they can play a full and proper part in the community in which they live. I am sure that that is a principle on which we should make progress. It may take time to achieve, but I should be much happier with that general approach. The hon. Lady seemed to be saying that she did not want to move in that direction, which I think is a mistake on her part. However, I agree with much of what she said towards the end of her speech.

I certainly agree that the grant that has been announced for the National Council for One Parent Families is extremely welcome. A retraining grant will be of considerable assistance to many single-parent families. However, there are between 300,000 and 400,000 single-parent families in Britain and £1 million, welcome though it is, will not go too far towards dealing with the sort of difficulties that single parents have in trying to fight their way back into the employment market.

I endorse the criticism made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West with regard to the disability living allowance and disability working allowance regulations. It is regrettable that the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments has not had a chance to consider them. The draft regulations amount to 80 or 90 pages and are fiendishly complicated. I have never been a Minister, but the Minister must be able to tell the business managers that he will not go before the House without at least the protection of such regulations having been considered by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments. If he has not, he should quickly arrogate that power to himself. Without such consideration, it is difficult for us to be sure that the regulations are intra vires. These are important and complicated regulations.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): The hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) raised that matter, and it seems to be a slightly running issue. Three sets of the regulations referred to by the hon. Gentleman are subject to the negative procedure. There is no requirement to send them to the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments, but it is always open to the Opposition to pray against them. That they have done, so the proper procedure has been followed.

Mr. Kirkwood: I entirely take the Minister's point. I was confusing those regulations with some others, because I happened to be dealing with the lack of adequate time for the disability working regulations. As the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said, dangers and difficulties arise as a result of the shortage of time that is available to consider the regulations. The Minister is right. Scrutiny by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments applies to other affirmative regulations.

Mr. Allen rose——

Mr. Kirkwood: I am obviously considered to be in need of some help.

Mr. Allen: I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not accept the Minister's explanation too readily. In Committee, an Under-Secretary of State agreed to a debate on the Floor of the House under the affirmative procedure. It was not the Committee's understanding, nor, I am sure, was it in the Under-Secretary of State's heart, that those crucial regulations would be bodged together with the uprating statement so that there would be insufficient time to discuss them.

Mr. Kirkwood: That is helpful. I do not want to make a meal of this, but the point has obviously been well made. If Ministers were tempted to give undertakings to the Committee, on which unfortunately I could not serve because I was dealing with other orders such as the Scottish seed potato order at the time, what has happened is a bit below the belt. I hope that the Minister will reassure us that the fact that some of these orders have not been considered by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments will not happen again.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman knows, as I do, that these arrangements are not made by Ministers. The intense interest displayed on the Opposition Benches tonight about these matters hardly suggests that their desire to debate them is being frustrated.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Minister may be surprised to learn that I am not responsible for what is said by Her Majesty's official Opposition. However, if hon. Members had been given more time to study these complicated regulations, more of them might have realised how adversely they affect some of their constituents and would have made it their business to be here. This complex system of social security is beginning to get out of hand.

Mr. Allen: Conservative Members say that this is a stupid procedural diversion. The Disability Alliance, Mencap and other disability groups are outraged at the way in which these four affirmative orders have been spatchcocked on to the normal debate. Although Conservative Members have had a lot to say on the subject, in Standing Committee E the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe) said:

"The effect of the amendments"— in other words, an amendment to the Bill in order to make these affirmative orders—

"would be that all regulations under the Bill would be subject to the affirmative procedure."—[Official Report, Standing Committee E, 24 January 1991; c. 268.]

Opposition Members and all the organisations which were present at the proceedings were under the clear impression that all affirmative orders would be the subject of a separate debate so that these very important matters could be gone through line by line, if necessary. That is not the case when they are added on to the normal uprating statement, as has happened today.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am grateful for that helpful clarification. I had not originally intended to make a great issue of the fact, but it is true to say that the pressure groups that study these matters in great detail are incensed at the way in which the orders have been introduced. In his comprehensive speech, the hon. Member for Oldham,

[Mr. Kirkwood]

West was able to touch on only some of the detailed and complicated matters that may receive scant attention tonight.

Mr. Haynes: I am a bit surprised at the Minister. Social Security Ministers are ducking about all over the place. They are not accepting their responsibilities. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) has being doing a first-class job on the Committee. When I have been in the Chamber, he has raised the matter regularly with Mr. Speaker. He is appalled at what is going on; the orders have not been considered by the Committee. My hon. Friend does not raise the matter just for the fun of it; he raises it because of its serious nature. Ministers make excuses in their own interests, but they are responsible for these matters and they should do their job properly. Incidentally, the Minister of State knows that he has got a real pressure group round his neck when it comes to disability and the disabled. He knows what I am talking about.

Mr. Kirkwood: These are difficult interventions to deal with. I am not responsible for what is said by Her Majesty's official Opposition. Even less am I responsible for what is said by the Minister of State. Nevertheless, I subscribe entirely to the hon. Gentleman's helpful intervention.

Self-assessment may lead to difficulties. To the extent that it avoids medical bureaucracy and so on, it is an improvement, but self-assessment is a radical change. The pressure groups want a clear assurance that they will be able to ask, as of right, for a visit from the visiting officer —at least in the initial stages so that the new self-assessment procedure can be carried through correctly. By 3 February 1992, we know that all fresh claims for attendance allowance and mobility allowance will be treated as claims for disability living allowance. One can imagine, in such a relatively short period, the delay and uncertainty that will be caused if the transitional arrangements are not properly set out.

Even with the help of highly motivated and expert Benefits Agency staff, I cannot see how, with the best will in the world, that can be achieved in an ordered way. Correct information must be made available to people who claim the new allowances. If it is not provided, it may prejudice some of the other benefits to which they are now entitled. I am told that the Under-Secretary of State gave an undertaking in the House of Commons that steps would be taken to warn claimants about the possible loss of benefits. Failure to do so now would be a breach of promise. I hope, therefore, that appropriate information packs will be made available so that benefits are not inadvertently lost.

A number of the regulations have given rise to concern. They omit some of the qualifying disabilities. The pressure groups consider the omissions to be flagrant discrimination. The hon. Member for Oldham, West referred to respiratory problems and incontinence. The Minister of State must reassure the pressure groups. He would go some way to doing so if he told the House tonight that he intends to monitor carefully what is happening and to initiate independent research into the strengths and weaknesses of the new system in its initial stages.

I am the secretary/treasurer of the all-party pension group. I have followed the pension changes and difficulties that have been experienced by my constituents and the work that has been undertaken by the all-party pension group. The 1992 pension increases are welcome, as far as they go. The Government's pledge on price protection has also been honoured, so far as it goes. Nobody, however, would deny that there is a growing gap between those who rely for the majority of their income on state benefits and the average working population.

That disparity causes me great concern. The increases of £2·15 or £3·45 that have been announced for next April are not enough in terms of the basic state pension, which supplies most of the income for the majority of our pensioners. Those who sit on the Treasury Bench make claims about average net income increases. I do not doubt the figures and I welcome the fact that, on average, there has been a 33 per cent. increase in income over the period 1979 to 1988. To a certain extent that was inevitable as a result of the changes that have occurred over the past three or four Governments and I am certain that it will continue to improve.

I hope that I shall not be retiring too soon, but if I see out the rest of my working life as a Member of the House, I shall retire with a pension that should look after me comfortably. I am concerned about the people who are retired and over 70 between now and then. The Government can say that increased amounts have been devoted to pensions and that their pledges have been kept. However, Age Concern has done some research and found that the percentage increase in the average income of the lowest quintile of pensioners over the period 1978 to 1988 is 15 per cent. and for the second lowest quintile it is 19 per cent. I see the hon. Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) looking puzzled. If those figures are right—they bear out the experience of some of my casework—there is a group of pensioners in deep financial trouble.

I understand that the Government's policy is to target pensioners and, as I said, the increase in premiums is welcome as far as it goes. I hope that, in his discussions with the Treasury, the Minister will not just look at the statistics that he quotes with monotonous regularity, and I guess with some justification, about average incomes, but that he will say that some people below that average have real problems.

The only way in which that can be addressed sensibly is by putting extra money into the basic state pension. Current average adult earnings are about £263 per week. The disparity between that and even the increased pension rates of £54 and £86 for a single person and married couple is enormous and it is getting worse every year. It is unacceptable. The Minister should tell the House that he is prepared to go to the Treasury and argue not just for increases that provide price protection, but that he will start to look at the experience of those in the bottom two fifths of the pensioner population and make arrangements to do something significantly better for them.

The Minister could use all sorts of devices to achieve improvements. He could make substantial increases in the severe weather payments scheme. I know that there have been improvements, but as I represent part of the country where the climate is meteorologically colder, I know that there is a great deal of scope of increases in the support that we provide for heating allowances for our elderly population. Also, the 20 per cent. community charge payment should have been abolished completely this year.

I welcome the Secretary of State's announcement that the poll tax compensation of £700 million will not be clawed back. However, the Government should have done something this year to mitigate the costs of that 20 per cent. contribution. That, taken together with water charges, is driving pensioners into real poverty and will wipe out any increase that the uprating orders will bring in April.

I receive more complaints from retired people about standing charges than anything else. The reason for that is obvious. The recent announcements of salaries and profits being made by the new privatised energy companies whether gas or electricity, are galling in the extreme. The same is true of British Telecom and the BBC television licence increase that has been announced recently. Older people are incensed that those companies are making huge profits and that their chief executives are receiving huge increases in their salaries to bring them up to the so-called market rate, while they are paying high standing charges. It is indefensible.

The Christmas bonus has also been neglected for too long. The Minister should make a statement of intent about that. It should have been substantially increased, as it is a useful contribution to the income of retired households at this time of year. The Government should index it or come clean and abolish it. It is unforgivable to leave it to wither on the vine.

Increases in the costs of transport, housing and health charges and other costs for food, heating and clothing, are becoming unbearable for retired people in my part of the world. I have given the Minister credit for what has been achieved, and I am disappointed that he has not been able to go further.

There is now an overwhelming case for the Government to undertake an urgent investigation into simplifying the structure of the benefits system. Their public excuse was that they attempted to do so in the Social Security Act 1986, but it has clearly been a failure. We have been discussing the DLA scheme, which is good in principle. However, when the regulations are published, even good schemes become a nightmare of complexity for those of us who are supposed to make sensible policy and for those to whom the schemes are supposed to apply.

I make a plea for the Government to consider a matter of urgency, either through independent research or their own officers, finding a long-term method of achieving a much more comprehensible system that is easy to use and that can be understood by ordinary people.

Mr. Tim Smith (Beaconsfield): Like the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood), I was concerned when I first saw the complexity of the disability regulations. I do not like complex subordinate legislation. As far as possible, it should be included in primary legislation; otherwise it makes it difficult for the House to consider the issues. However, if we choose, we can continue the debate for nearly an hour and a half. I am struck by the paucity of hon. Members in the Chamber. I do not think that it will be difficult for all those present to make a contribution to the debate. That is why I described what happened earlier as a stupid procedural diversion. It is better if we consider the merits of the orders before us.

I do not want to be predictable, because the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) does not like people to be predictable. He was fairly predictable except in one important respect. I congratulate the hon. Gentleman on his speech—I am sure that he would not have predicted that—because he attempted to deal with the question of who would pay for increased benefits by quoting a statement apparently made by the permanent secretary to the Department of Social Security, Sir Michael Partridge. I listened to that with great interest. There is something in what he said about a prospective demographic change over the next 10 or 20 years.

However, I do not think that one could increase pensions in line with earnings each year if one did not address oneself, not to the rate at which contributions are made, but to the income on which contributions are assessed. Under the present arrangements, the minimum and maximum limits are increased each year in line with prices. If we were to move to an earnings-linked set-up, we should have to make changes accordingly. Working people, especially those at the top of the range, would have to understand that they would be paying more. Of course, under a Labour Government they would be paying more anyway, because the Labour party proposes to undermine the contributory principle further by extending the 9 per cent. contribution rate with no maximum limit.

The point is rather academic for the Labour party. It is all very well for the Labour party to say that it will increase pensions in line with earnings, but that presupposes that earnings will rise faster than prices. Of course, that has been the case over the past 12 years—the record is remarkable. Over the past 12 years, the take-home pay of a married man with two children has increased by more than 30 per cent. Take-home pay hardly increased under the Labour Government of 1974-79. Indeed, in some years, prices increased faster than earnings and people's standard of living fell. Therefore, the fact that pensions were to be increased by earnings rather than prices was academic; it meant nothing to pensioners.

The previous Labour Government not only robbed pensioners of the Christmas bonus but, in one year, failed to uprate pensions for eight months—there was a gap when no improvement was made. Unlike some young people, pensioners can remember exactly what happened under the previous Labour Government. They will want to place the promises that Labour is now making to them in that historical context.

Mr. Meacher: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will confirm, if he is aware, that under the previous Labour Government the pension increased by 20 per cent. in real terms, whereas in the past 12 years the 2 million pensioners who are dependent entirely on the basic pension or on income support have had a zilch increase in their standard of living.

Mr. Smith: The hon. Gentleman may be right—I am not in a position to argue with him—and I am prepared to concede the point for those 2 million pensioners; but millions of other pensioners have benefited enormously under this Government, not only from increases in the standard pension but from rising income from the state earnings-related pension scheme, rising occupational pensions and increased income from savings. That fact must be put in the wider context.

If I may be predictable for a moment, I should like to welcome the benefit increases. The Government have a fine record on increasing benefits in line with prices every year, but I have a particular point to raise with my right hon. Friend, although it is principally a matter for the Treasury. Pensions are increased each year in line with the retail prices index. Some pensioner constituents have written to me to say that they think that their cost of living is rising by more than 4·1 per cent. I think that they are right. I have had to try to explain a rather sophisticated argument; last year their pensions were increased by more than 10 per cent., when the increase in the cost of living was lower.

The RPI is a broad-brush measure of inflation, especially for pensioners. Housing costs account for a large proportion of the RPI, and mortgage interest rates play a significant part in housing costs. That is relevant to people who are in work, as those of us who have mortgages know, but, generally speaking, it is not very relevant to pensioners, who, if they had a mortgage, have usually paid it off.

What has happened is a swings-and-roundabouts operation, whereby last year pensioners received more than the cost of living that they had incurred, whereas this year they will receive less. It is rather difficult to explain that. A different index, the Rossi index, omits housing costs. It was not surprising to learn that that was rather higher—7 per cent.—as it takes into account the point that I have just made.

There is no simple solution to the problem, which was examined recently by the Public Accounts Committee. Therefore, although the RPI is a widely followed and widely understood index, it is not entirely satisfactory for the indexation of pensions.

My next point is on a relatively minor announcement that was made on the same day that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State announced the changes in benefits and contributions. It dealt with something about which I had been writing to Social Security Ministers for about six months—abuse of the benefit-in-kind regulations, whereby highly paid people were paying themselves in gilt unit trusts. The loss of revenue amounted to about £1 million a week. I was concerned about that and very much welcomed the change that was made. It is wrong that people should be able to abuse the social security contribution system, and I hope that Ministers will keep a close eye on the matter because the smart people who offer advice may be looking for further ways of getting around the regulations.

Quite rightly, social security contributions are applied to benefits in kind, but it creates an extra burden for employers if the system of assessing the benefit that will be subject to contributions is out of line with income tax. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will keep closely in touch with the Chancellor of the Exchequer so that the system for taxing benefits in kind runs parallel with the system that he operates in his Department. Most people do not think of the Department of Social Security as a great taxing Department, but it raises enormous sums that go into the national insurance fund to pay benefits. That is welcome, but I should like that element of the contributions to be kept in line with income tax to minimise compliance costs for employers.

6.45 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): In the spirit of affability, may I congratulate the Government on one of the changes that they made some time ago, in which they followed fairly accurately the views expressed in early-day motion 488, which noted that when

"the Social Fund cold weather payments scheme trigger mechanism was put to a serious test it collapsed three times under the weight of its own absurdity . . . the scheme is inadequate, inefficiently targeted and wasteful as the cost of advertising and administration are unjustifiably high; and urges a new saving limit of £3,000 that would create a fully automatic scheme".

The Government followed that early-day motion, except in the principal respect of the claim about the inadequacy of a payment. I say that to show that the payments are ludicrously inadequate—£6 last year, £6 this year and presumably the same next year.

The other matter with which I wish to deal is the false feeling among Conservative Members that the Government have acted correctly on child benefit. That was said by the Secretary of State and by the Prime Minister, who said that the Government

"attach particular significance to support for families through the provision of increased child benefit".—[Official Report, 29 November 1991; Vol. 199, c. 667.]

It is worth noting what has happened. The Prime Minister could not have said that between 1987 and April 1991—the four years when child benefit was frozen. Nor could he have said it in 1985, when the uprating was 35p per child below inflation. Can he honestly say it now? After next year's uprating, child benefit will still be worth substantially less than in 1984, the last year before the process of erosion began. Even for the first child in a family, despite the fact that this year's uprating mainly benefited first children, there is still a shortfall of 75p a week. For other children, the losses are much higher—£2·60p a week for every child from the second onwards.

For instance, if child benefit had been uprated fully in line with prices since 1984, a three-child family would receive £31·20 a week from next April, whereas they will receive only £25·25p—£5·95p a week less than in 1984, or a loss per child of £100 a year. That is little for the Government to congratulate themselves on.

The logical basis for uprating child benefit is not prices but average earnings, as the main purpose of the benefit is to reduce inequalities in living standards due to family size. A similar comparison of 1984 and 1992 child benefit rates, taking into account the increase in earnings, shows that the benefit from next April should be £12·55p per child; instead it will be £9·65p for the first child and only £7·80p for each subsequent child. For a three-child family, child benefit has fallen below earnings by £12·40 a week or £645 a year. The value of child benefit for a three-child family relative to average earnings has fallen by 33 per cent. over a mere eight years. Yet the Secretary of State says that child benefit is one of the main elements in support for the family, and the Prime Minister says that he attaches "particular significance" to it.

I shall continue to pursue another matter on which I touched in an Adjournment debate, although it is difficult to arouse great interest in it among Conservative Members or among anyone else. It is a matter of great importance, on which the Government are at it again. As there were signs of some useful action by the Government on cold weather payments, I believe that the struggle may avail something, so it may be worth pursuing the point.

The Government's commitment to child benefit has been shown to be only lukewarm, and they regard the benefit as a politically necessary extravagance. We have heard the argument time and again because the benefit is paid to all families, whether rich or poor. However, dependency additions are paid to people who have suffered greater losses and who are the most deserving, whom the Government claim to target. The additions are paid to people such as widowed mothers, retirement pensioners with children—surprisingly, there are many—invalidity pensioners, guardians and other carers who receive invalidity care allowance. There are 200,000 such families, and more than half of them include a sick or disabled parent.

Those families have lost in two ways. First, like other families, the value of their child benefit has fallen since 1984. Secondly, there has been a dramatic erosion in the value of the children's allowance which they receive as part of their national insurance benefit—the child dependency addition. Since 1979, with one exception, every increase in child benefit has been deducted from the additions. If the increase in child benefit had been a real increase, there might have been some logic in that. However, child benefit has fallen in real value, so there was no justification for reducing the dependency additions. The Government have offered the excuse that that happened under a Labour Government in 1977, as if it was right to continue to do something that was done once before for a short time. There is no justification for the policy to continue.

The cumulative effect has been dramatic. When the Government took office in 1979, child benefit was £4 per child and the child dependency addition was £5·35—a total of £9·35 per child. The 1992 equivalent, simply adjusting for inflation, would be £25·50 per child. Instead, the combined amount payable from next April will be £19·40 for the first child and £18·65 for the second onwards. Those most deserving families have lost more than £6 a week for each child. For a widow or for a chronically sick parent with three children, the total loss is almost £20 or £1,030 per annum.

The one occasion on which the Government did not cheat on the payments was earlier this year and we hoped that it had something to do with the Adjournment debate. Under attack from hon. Members of all parties, the Government decided that the increase in child benefit in October would not be deducted from other benefits. The conversion was short-lived. I understand that next April's increase will be deducted from the national insurance dependency addition, just as all previous increases have been.

The Secretary of State has argued today that at least part of the money saved has been spent on other benefits and he has implied that on balance, people are no worse off [illegible] familiar argument. The fact is that the people who have lost out from the erosion of children's allowances have also lost in other ways. Widows and the long-term sick, for example, have suffered big losses in the breaking of the link between benefits and earnings from 1980 onwards. Widows have suffered an additional loss from the freezing of the £1,000 widow's payment, a matter on which the Government are curiously shy.

I hope that I can catch the attention of the Secretary of State. The widow's payment was introduced at the level of £1,000 in 1988. Like so many other worthwhile benefits, it seems destined to wither away year by year, even though the benefit that it replaced, the widow's allowance, would have been uprated annually if it had continued.

Cold weather payments, child benefit and the dependency allowances are important matters on which the Government have cheated in the uprating statement. They affect the poorest and most vulnerable families in the land. When will the Government start to do the proper thing and uprate the benefits as they should?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): There is certainly no room for complacency when we debate pensions and the other provisions in the orders. There are far too many pensioner households in which the total income is very small. The obvious reason for that is that the state pension is low.

I listened carefully to what the Secretary of State said about the reasons for the 1980 decision whereby the pension was no longer increased in line with earnings. Whatever the Government say, there can be no doubt from the answers given to parliamentary questions that, if the pension had been increased in line with earnings, a married couple would now receive more than £20 a week extra. That extra sum is very much needed by people who rely on the state pension or on income support and by those who rely on the state pension and a small occupational pension which disqualifies them from receiving income support.

Many people live in poverty through no fault of their own. Some pensioner constituents who come to see me ask why they are penalised and punished. The hon. Member for Derby, North (Mr. Knight) seems to consider it a matter of amusement. I do not know whether he, although a Whip, wants to intervene. If he does, I shall give way. Do those of his constituents who have to live on the margin, as many of mine do, consider the subject to be a matter of amusement? The hon. Gentleman continues to be amused. He is a Whip who receives about £35,000 a year or more and he does not have to worry about the daily necessities of life. He should consider pensioners who have to rely simply on the state pension and income support or a small occupational pension.

We all know how bitterly cold it is now outside; it is not very cold here, of course. How many of our constituents cannot keep their homes adequately heated? They simply have not got the money, and they are frightened to put the heating on and to keep their homes warm because of the bills which they know they will not be able to pay. We should be concerned about that.

The main reason why pensioners are in this plight is the Tory Government's decision in 1980. Another reason is the drastic reduction in housing benefit in 1988. Local authorities no longer have the discretion to decide on rebates, and the rebates are very limited. What shocks me and should shock every hon. Member is that those whose total income is so small have to pay out of that income far too much in rent and poll tax. I hope that a Labour Government will change that system.

We debate the orders against the scene that my hon. Friends and I have described. Literally millions of elderly people live in poverty or in near-poverty through no fault of their own. It is understandable when pensioners who come to see me ask, "Who won the war? What crime have we committed that we should have to live in this way?" They have to struggle desperately every day to make ends meet.

I welcome the changes affecting cold weather payments. I understand that the payments will be triggered automatically so that people on income support will not have to apply for them. Anything along those lines is welcome, however modest, but let us understand clearly that those payments are triggered only when the temperature reaches zero or below for seven consecutive days. It is bitterly cold outside today, but probably not cold enough to trigger the payments.

Help should be given to pensioners—certainly to those on income support, and if possible to those whose income is just above that level. In winter, they face many difficulties in trying to keep their accommodation warm. How shocking that must be. When we go home, we put the heating on. We may worry a little about how much it will cost, but we know that, by and large, we shall be able to meet the bill. That is not true of the people about whom I am talking. I see that the Under-Secretary is nodding in agreement. I wish that she would use whatever influence she, as a junior Minister, may have to bring about a more generous cold weather payments scheme.

I began by describing the position as Labour Members see it. While my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was speaking, I said that I challenged any Conservative Member of Parliament to spend just one week—I do not ask for longer—living on the money that so many of our constituents who are pensioners have to rely on—the state pension and income support. Conservative Members should try that for a week.

When Matthew Parris and another Tory MP who has since lost his seat tried to live on income support for a week, they both found it virtually impossible. By the fifth or sixth day—certainly by the end of the week—their money was exhausted. Would any Conservative Member here tonight accept my challenge to try to live on the state pension and income support? They know the answer. They know that it would be almost impossible for them, even though it would be for only a week, after which they could return to their comfortable lives.

Much has been said about what a Labour Government could and could not do, but I am certain that a Labour Government would set out with the best of intentions to improve the situation. Between 1974 and 1979, we kept the pension in line with the increase in earnings or prices, whichever was the greater. As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West has already said, during those years the pension increased by 20 per cent. in real terms. That is far better than anything achieved for pensioners during the past 11 years.

I welcome the fact that, when we are returned to government at the next election, pensions will go up by £8 and £5; those are steps in the right direction. If we can do more—if we can do what I have described—so be it. The basic difference between us and the Conservatives is that Conservative Members do not want that to happen. They believe that the miserly increases being made now are enough for pensioners.

We take a different attitude. We believe that retired people who have worked all their lives are entitled to a decent standard of living. There is no reason why they should have to live in poverty and near-poverty. We want that to end as quickly as possible, and an effective way to achieve that would be the election of a Labour Government.

7.4 pm

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): This is the last uprating debate before the general election. We are thankful that we have also had the last uprating statement that will be issued in the name of the Conservative party for many years to come. This is a suitable time to examine the record of this Administration, of the Secretary of State and of the Prime Minister.

It is also a suitable time to look forward to a new Government which will use the Department of Social Security to defend the interests of pensioners, the disabled and others in need, rather than the interests of the Treasury, the wealthy and the political constituencies of the Conservative party.

Sadly, this uprating, like all the others announced by the Secretary of State, is a civil servants' uprating—a shuffling of the pack. It is an uprating after the Treasury officials have filleted it. It is the first draft—one which the officials probably expected Ministers to beef up and argue about. Instead, the civil servants have had a walkover. This is not so much "Yes, Minister" as "Yes, Permanent Secretary".

The uprating, like its predecessors, betrays a Department on autopilot—a Department and a Secretary of State both suffering from advanced anaemia. They can do whatever they like provided that it is what the Treasury has already agreed. Those terms of reference seem to suit the Secretary of State down to the ground. If a pre-election bribe is needed, the Government can knock a penny in the pound off income tax, and social security will probably deliver the cost. I can tell our friends in the Box that after next May that will not happen any longer. They might now begin to turn their minds to the new opportunities that will arise for them, as well as for the people whom we shall seek to represent.

The uprating deals with the expenditure of the largest Government Department—it spent some £60 billion this year. When the history is written, for what positive things will the Secretary of State's tenure be remembered? I shall be glad to give way to any Conservative Member who can think of any. Sadly, there do not appear to be any takers.

Unfortunately, many people will have cause to remember the Secretary of State and the Government—for all the wrong reasons. The pensioner couple, who even after the uprating will still be £25 a week worse off, will remember him. As my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) said, that is not this week or next week but every week. Pensioners will be worse off every week because the Government broke the link with earnings. Single pensioners, too, will be worse off by £16 every week.

What an indictment it is that people wholly dependent on the state pension, with no other source of income, are now almost automatically eligible for income support. The compression of the state pension down to income support levels has gone so far that it has superseded the income support level, so that every pensioner, as of right, should be on income support. What a pass we have come to when state pensions have been screwed down so far.

Other people who may remember the Secretary of State and write his epitaph are the mothers whose child benefit is still worth £2·15 a week less than it was worth in 1987 for second and subsequent children. There is a whole litany of people. There are the unemployed who, as my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) told the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson), have suffered 11 separate cuts in benefit. A total of £1·5 billion a year has been taken away from the unemployed. That is a record of shame.

Those cuts apply not only to the group of people whom the Conservatives would like to have us believe are claimants—the little group of scroungers whom Labour Members wish to prosecute at least as much as Conservative Members do, because of the vast number of people in need who are tarred with the "scroungers" brush that the Government choose to use.

In fact, the biggest section of people involved in the social security system are ordinary working people—the 20 million or so people who contribute every week to the national insurance fund, those mugs who pay in every week in the mistaken belief that at the end of their working days, or if a crisis should arise, they will have benefits to fall back on when times get tough.

There is a long catalogue of people who will queue up to write the Secretary of State's epitaph. Sadly, his tenure has been characterised, too, by an affront to the House and to our democracy. Even during my brief tenure at the Dispatch Box, the Secretary of State has been party to several actions to which parliamentarians and democrats should not be party. First, the Government made law when Parliament was not even sitting. In the summer, the statutory instruments arrangements were abused when certain backdated benefits were effectively eliminated in instruments moved after Parliament had risen. That law came into being when we were not even here.

Secondly, the Government have evaded parliamentary questions by placing the Benefits Agency and other agencies beyond our reach: we could not find out the answers without going through ever more tortuous procedures.

Today, despite assurances given by the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security in Committee, crucial regulations on disability have been botched together with the uprating measures so that they cannot be effectively and properly considered by Parliament. [HON. MEMBERS: "Not true."] Disability organisations and their members may dispute Conservative Members' sedentary interventions. They know very well from their reading of Hansard, and because they were present during the Committee stage, the assurances given and the spirit in which they were made. They are aware of the fraud, and my hon. Friends and I will make them even more aware of it. Like everyone else, they will be able to pass judgment by means of the ballot box.

The very principle of social insurance lies not merely threatened but broken by 12 years of abuse by the Government. Its restoration will be one of our first and continuing tasks at the Department. The violation of the state pension fund by the Secretary of State and his predecessors makes Robert Maxwell's activities look like those of a dabbling amateur. They have ripped off £6·7 billion from our state pension fund—a process that started when the current Prime Minister was a Minister at the then Department of Health and Social Security.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West said, by the end of the decade, they will unilaterally have slashed £12 billion from the value of SERPS, transferring funds paid in by all of us for the future into private funds run solely for the benefit of the few. Even those few are now being bled dry by charges and commissions just when they thought that they had entered the land of milk and honey.

The Government have given themselves a permanent contributions holiday by no longer making an Exchequer contribution to the national insurance fund. As was said earlier, before 1979 18 per cent. of that fund was paid in by the Government, but now the Government have taken a holiday. It is little wonder that the private sector mimics the Government in its disrespect for pensions. It is not so much a case of Captain Bob as of Major John and Petty Officer Newton. I hope that you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, will impound the Secretary of State's passport because it may well be needed when the full inquiry gets under way.

Mr. Flynn: My hon. Friend caused some agitation on the Government Front Bench when he quite fairly referred to the Government's policy of denying information by diverting answers through the agencies. He will be aware that only the most diligent of hon. Members and outside organisations used to go to the Table Office or the Library to get those replies.

Perhaps my hon. Friend does not know that the Government have just announced that they intend to nationalise the private enterprise operation that I am running, which entails my sending those replies to all Opposition Members—as I have been doing for the past three months—and, this month, to Conservative Members, following an offer made to their Whips some time ago. My hon. Friend will be glad to know that the denial of information will shortly come to an end.

Mr. Allen: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his intervention—although anything that the Government nationalise they may flog off at a profit at a later date, so I ask him to keep an eye on the situation. As a member of the Procedure Committee, I was one of those who urged —not least at my hon. Friend's insistence—that the House should once again be able to see the answers to parliamentary questions on social security matters. I can promise him and you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, that we shall examine the new arrangements. I can say fairly confidently that those arrangements are inadequate and will be reviewed by my hon. Friend and his team when we come into office next May.

The Conservatives' strategy of holding back the state pension on the ground that the deficit could be made good by additional private sector pensions has been blown out of the water, not least by the vulnerability of occupational pensions which we have witnessed recently and by the under-performance and the milking of private pension schemes themselves.

Labour will put that right. We will legislate to ensure that the Maxwells, Hansons and Lucases cannot raid our occupational pension funds. We will also need to restore an honest state pension fund that can be kept at arm's length from the rip-offs of future Conservative Governments if necessary. No doubt, as the election approaches, the Conservatives will seek to blame everything on the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher)—a close friend of the Chancellor, whom I am glad to see in the Chamber. How very convenient to have the right hon. Lady to blame. One is reminded of how those huddled in the dock at Nuremberg pointed towards the bunker. We shall see ever more frantic gesticulating in the direction of Finchley, Dulwich or the American lecture circuit as the election approaches.

We must remember, however, that today's uprating comes more than a year after the Conservative leadership coup and that there can be no excuse for the provisions. In the intervening year, nothing has been done to right the wrongs of the decade, so what profit has been gleaned in the first year of the new leadership of the Conservative party? What has been the harvest?

More than 300,000 more families are on income support as a result of the economic mismanagement and incompetence for which the Government and the Chancellor are responsible. Thanks to the Prime Minister's ban on benefit for unemployed 16 and 17-year-olds, another 21,000 youngsters have been sucked into a black hole where there is no job, no school, no training and no benefit.

This year, 25,000 pensioners, sick and disabled and others have received no increase whatever in their weekly benefit, which was frozen in 1987 when the Prime Minister was pushing through the Fowler cuts. The right hon. Gentleman was the grinning accomplice of those who reduced benefits for people injured at work. He was the accomplice of those who pushed for the 20 per cent. poll tax contribution required from the poorest. His fingerprints are also to be found on the introduction of the hated social fund. He was at the Department when it abolished the maternity grant. He was Minister at the Department when the Government halved help with mortgage interest repayments for the newly unemployed.

That is the Prime Minister's social charter for Britain. That is the way in which he devised his social charter when he had the ability to make policy at the Department. That is the right hon. Gentleman's pedigree. Little wonder, then, that the Tory party is laughed at even by its continental sister parties for being so backward and Victorian.

The present uprating puts none of that right. The Conservative Government are content with their decade of work on the jobless, the disabled, mothers, pensioners and others who deserve better. I am sorry to say that there is no joy here, only despair. The only cause for celebration tonight is that is that this uprating will be the Secretary of State's and the Government's last.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): Whatever that was, it was not a winding-up speech. It is said of some speeches that they smell of the lamp. The speech of the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) smelt of a weekend with the thesaurus and a few reference books, and was made without reference to what had preceded it.

I am not one to accuse the hon. Gentleman of misrepresenting the position; I know and like him too much for that. Nevertheless, he betrayed a total and absolute misunderstanding of the public expenditure survey process and the part that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State played in it. I am not one who crawls, but I feel bound to respond to such attacks on my right hon. Friend. Anyone who has served with him at the Department—and I am talking not just about his present ministerial team—knows that he not only brings a greater degree of expertise to his job than anyone I can remember but does it with great inventiveness in terms of improving benefits and with an exceptional degree of compassion and, above all, integrity. I say that with absolute passion about a man who is my boss and my friend and with whom I am proud to serve in this Government.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) takes a close interest in these matters. He wanted to know whether we would monitor the introduction of the new disability benefits and their impact in policy terms and with regard to their administration. I give him that absolute assurance. All Ministers in the Department of Social Security are conscious of the fact that in social security very little is for ever. Society changes and the social security system must change to reflect those changes. We will monitor the matter very carefully.

I must apologise for returning somewhat dryly to the procedural point that has been raised during the debate. I am puzzled by the widespread misunderstanding and the suggestion in certain quarters that the Government have tried to do something underhand. Nothing could be further from the truth.

We are debating seven sets of disability orders. Four sets, which come under the affirmative procedure, have been considered by the Joint Committee on Statutory Instruments and have all been declared intra vires. The three sets which have not been to the Joint Committee come under the negative procedure and are consequential upon the main affirmative orders. We would not have considered the orders today if the Opposition had not prayed against them and agreed that they should be debated with the main affirmative orders. Had the Opposition wished to debate the issues, they should have delayed their prayers until after today's debate and that debate could have been arranged through the usual channels. The Government have done nothing underhand. For the convenience of the House, we are discussing the motions together, and I understand that that has the agreement of the Opposition.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire made a plea for a comprehensive disability scheme. My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) responded to that. I share many of the reservations expressed by my hon. Friend about the wisdom of that course of action—certainly in the short term. However, the practice of incremental change under this Government has led to a much more comprehensive coverage of meeting the needs of disabled people.

When we came to office, 300,000 people received help with the costs of their disabilities. The figure will now be 2 million. In that regard, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire will be aware that since we took office in 1979 the expenditure has risen from £4·5 billion to more than £12 billion. We are moving to more comprehensive coverage. However, as we are using incremental change instead of wiping the slate clean and trying to move to a new system, we are avoiding huge extra costs at one fell swoop and also avoiding creating a system in which there would be many losers as well as gainers at the point of change.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Minister will acknowledge that I paid credit to the Government's work in respect of disability. However, does the Minister of State accept the principle that a comprehensive disability benefit is the goal, or is he going to operate on a piecemeal basis in the short term?

Mr. Scott: I can simply call in aid the Government's record so far. We have steadily improved the coverage and generosity of the benefits system. I cannot commit myself or anyone else to what may happen in future. That will depend on the available resources and the needs that become evident. However, we have a first-class record of incremental change. Indeed, we have a much better record than that of any Labour Government. We can build on that in future.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire also referred to cold weather payments. I wonder whether the news has reached him that the system has been triggered in one station in Scotland today. We will for the first time be able to see the new system work. It will be automatic and payable in advance. People will not need to make a claim. As we have made the choice of stations more sensitive, particularly in Scotland, the system itself will be more sensitive.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): How many people will benefit from what the Minister has just announced?

Mr. Scott: That depends on the weather. It is impossible to say how many until we know what the winter will be like. If we have the same amount of cold weather this winter as we had last winter, we will more or less double the coverage of the benefit as a result of the changes that I announced earlier this year.

Mr. Winnick: What would the Minister say to the pensioners outside that one area in Scotland who are suffering as a result of the bitterly cold weather and who cannot receive payment if they are on income support? Why should it be zero or below before they receive the small amount of assistance of £6 a week?

Mr. Scott: If the hon. Gentleman followed that matter with any care, he would know that over the past four or five years we have steadily improved and made more generous the cold weather payments. Indeed, we have very substantially improved them this year. My statement was widely welcomed by hon. Members on both sides of the House.

We will have to wait to see how the new system works. We increased the amount and introduced the automaticity principle—the lack of need to make a claim—and the ability to forecast cold weather in advance and the ability to pay in advance.

My hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West asked about the housing benefit transitional payments. She will recall that last year we eroded those transitional payments by £3. We have decided that in April 1992 there will be a flat rate reduction of £2 rather than the £3 of last year. As a result, the majority of transitional payments recipients will gain overall in cash terms from next April's uprating.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield (Mr. Smith) vividly illustrated the performance of the Labour Government in respect of provision for pensioners. He referred to the retail prices index, the so-called pensioner index and the Rossi index. I am sure that we are right to stick to uprating the retirement pension in relation to RPI over the years as that has proved to be the most generous index available to us. The so-called pensioner index has risen more slowly than the RPI: Rossi exceptionally this year is ahead of RPI, but is normally significantly below it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beaconsfield also said that the tax and contribution systems should stay as much in line as possible, particularly with regard to payments in kind. I understand his point. Because the tax and contribution systems serve different purposes, they may never be totally in alignment. However, I recognise my hon. Friend's point.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) revealed his traditional obsession, not with the overall income of retirement pensioners, but with the level of the state pension. That is not what matters to pensioners in our society. What matters is the money in their pockets. The Opposition and the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire recognise that pensioners' average total net income grew by 34 per cent. between 1979 and 1988—an average of 3·3 per cent. each year compared with 3 per cent. overall between 1974 and 1979. That is to say, for each year of this Government, the increase in total pensioner incomes has been as much as was achieved over the whole period of the Labour Government. That is what matters in terms of the standard of living of pensioners.

Mr. Meacher: Those figures are continually bandied about, but they are absolute nonsense, for three reasons. First, the Minister was not comparing like with like. The majority of those who were pensioners in 1979 are unlikely still to have been alive in 1988—[Interruption.] We are talking about a completely different group of pensioners. If we are referring to the bottom 10 per cent., that 10 per cent. will not comprise the same people now as then. Secondly, in so far as there has been an increase, it is overwhelmingly because of SERPS, which was introduced by a Labour Government. Thirdly, the figures are available only until 1988. It will be interesting to have the figures for 1991. I suspect that they will show a very different picture.

Mr. Scott: Not only do I doubt that, but the hon. Gentleman's earlier point was totally ludicrous.

I had been about to say that, of course, the Government recognise that not all pensioners have benefited to that extent. We all know that some pensioners—perhaps those whose careers were interrupted by the war or whose savings were decimated by the inflation of the 1970s—are not in the position of the average pensioner these days. That is why, over the past three years, we have found an extra £330 million to help the poorer pensioners. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has been particularly inventive at finding ways of making resources available to help those pensioners.—[Interruption.] I hope that the House will have the grace to acknowledge that we have recognised the problem of the poorer pensioners and have addressed it to the extent of providing an extra £330 million in the past three years.

Two hon. Members referred briefly to pensions and pension funds as a result of matters that have recently been in the news. Obviously, there is a limit to what I can say about that today, but we acknowledge that trustees have a clear duty to act at all times in the interests of the beneficiaries of the scheme. They are required by law to disclose certain facts to their pensioners, the trade unions and the members of their funds. The actuarial valuation of the funds is an important part of that. When we have considered the outcome of the Maxwell situation, we shall consider whether any further changes to the law are needed. I am not prejudging that issue when I say that, if somebody deliberately sets out to commit fraud on a massive scale, there is precious little that the law or regulatory agencies can do to prevent it entirely.

I turn now to the issue of disability benefits which, as the House knows, are particularly close to my heart and which I want to see being introduced as effectively and as smoothly as possible. As there appears to be some misunderstanding, I advise the House that all those under 65 years of age who are currently receiving mobility and attendance allowances will be transferred automatically and will receive the new disability living allowance. There may be some misunderstanding at the point of change, but we shall do our best through advertising campaigns, mailshots and providing information to the organisations of and for disabled people, the welfare rights organisations, the citizens' advice bureaux and our own offices, to minimise possible misunderstandings. We want to ensure that the provisions are implemented smoothly.

I should like to make one or two things clear about claiming the new allowance. First, the claimants' pack for the disability working allowance—the new allowance—will be widely available from all the places that were listed in early-day motion 356, plus the citizens' advice bureaux and from any other organisation that asks for supplies of the claim forms.

The disability living allowance form will not be distributed so widely, not least because it is not an entirely new benefit; it is subsuming the mobility and attendance allowances. However, it will be widely advertised in leaflets with coupons attached so that people can send in for a claim form. When they send in their claim, the claim form will be date-stamped with the date of its despatch, which will normally be within 24 hours of the arrival of the leaflet, and the claim will be deemed to have been made from that date as long as the claim form is returned within six weeks of that date.

That will allow people to carry out their own self-assessment procedure and to have that self-assessment endorsed and reinforced by a professional, carer or general practitioner, according to their choice. The claim will be dated from the date on which the coupon is sent in. That is a sensible, flexible and fair way of handling the matter.

Mr. Allen: I thank the Minister of State for his helpful reply about the disability living allowance. Are there any reasons why the form for the disability working allowance cannot be made available to the interest groups that wish to help disabled people so that they can in fact help them? Is there any reason in the Department why the form cannot be made available?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman may not have heard what I said. The form will be available not only to all those who were mentioned in the early-day motion, but to the citizens advice bureaux and anybody else who helps, including many of the organisations of and for disabled people. We consulted widely on the claim forms for both benefits with a substantial cross-section of the disability organisations, and with an independent panel of disabled people. Both the consultation process and the final claim forms were widely welcomed.

Mr. Allen: I apologise if I misunderstood the Minister, but my understanding is that there are two separate forms, one for the DLA and one for the DWA, and that the Minister's remarks referred to the DLA forms. Is he now saying that the forms apply to both? If he is, many people who were extremely worried about the availability of the forms will feel reassured.

Mr. Scott: If the hon. Gentleman reads Hansard, he will see that I referred first to the DWA forms, which I said would be widely available, and that I then said that the DLA forms would not initially be distributed so widely but that they would be available to people who sent in the coupon from one of the leaflets. Those people will then receive a form that will be date-stamped.

I believe that we have met most of the concerns on that point. Of course, there will be visiting officers. In addition, help will be available from our district offices to enable people to fill in the forms. Inevitably, because we are moving towards self-assessment, the forms are now longer. We depend no longer on medical examinations but on self-assessment. That is why the forms are longer and may be daunting to some people. We will have a visiting facility and specialists in our district offices.

Above all, we will have a free benefits inquiry line that will be specially dedicated to those benefits and if people want, an operator in the centre will be able to complete a form on behalf of a claimant who is on the other end of the telephone. The form will then be sent to the claimant or the customer who will be asked to check the details and, if the details are correct, to sign it and send it in as a claim. We are doing everything in our power to ensure that the system is as friendly and helpful as possible to those who need the help of the disability benefits.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Minister is being helpful, and what he has said will be welcomed. However, I should like to ask him about the potential loss of additional benefits. It has been my experience in the past that, unless people specifically ask questions about their specific entitlement to other benefits, their claims for those other benefits are likely to be prejudiced. Will such questions be an integral part of the self-assessment procedure?

Mr. Scott: When the hon. Gentleman sees the forms and the advertising campaign, I am sure that he will be reassured on that matter. I have no doubt that the very fact that we are introducing a benefits line and running a greater awareness campaign will lead to a substantial number of new claims. We are geared up to cope with that.

I have been present on other occasions when the hon. Members for Oldham, West and for Nottingham, North have travelled around the country making commitments —sometimes "absolute commitments", sometimes just ordinary "commitments"; sometimes "absolute priorities", sometimes "high priorities", sometimes just plain "priorities" and sometimes "increasing priorities", which is a phrase that crept in earlier; and sometimes they have just plain "aims". But today we have had another nudge or wink or two from those hon. Gentlemen suggesting that various things might happen. When pressed, however, they were unable to make a firm commitment about exactly what they would do. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs. Beckett) has a laptop computer, a pocket calculator or an abacus, but she must spend a lot of her time trying to keep up with the nudges, winks, priorities and commitments of the shadow social security team.

During the past year or so, those hon. Gentlemen have promised the earth to every pressure group in the country. One of two things is happening: either a cruel deception is being practised upon those pressure groups or the Opposition intend, if and when they come into office, to spread the available resources so thinly that they will not make a significant difference to anyone.

Mr. Allen: Will the Minister put on record one specific occasion when I personally made any pledge beyond the two which he already knows about?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Member for Oldham, West has made such a commitment.

Mr. Allen: What about the hon. Member for Nottingham, North?

Mr. Scott: I understand that it is a team. I thought that the hon. Gentleman, being a keen cricketer, was a great team player. I assumed, therefore, that he was part of the team.

In essence, Labour is promising the earth. What we have done in government is to deliver the goods—to pensioners, to families with children, and to disabled people and their carers. The two new benefits are a particular manifestation of that. We can continue to produce the goods for the people most in need in society, and we will continue to do so.

Question put and agreed to.

European Community (Fisheries)

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Mr. Speaker has selected the amendment in the name of the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) and his right hon. and hon. Friends.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. It might assist hon. Members to know that the reports of the Select Committee on European Legislation relating directly to the debate could be deposited in the Vote Office only at 6 o'clock tonight. That was because the documents were capable of consideration by the Select Committee only at its meeting this afternoon. I have raised the point of order because the documents contained important information which I understand became available only at lunchtime today.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The House will share my regret that the information was not available earlier, but the House is grateful to the hon. Gentleman for the information which he has now provided.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Curry): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 9134/91 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 27th November 1991, relating to guide prices for fishery products for 1992, the proposals described in the unnumbered Explanatory Memoranda submitted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 10th December 1991, relating to total allowable catches and quotas for 1992, the reciprocal Fisheries Agreement between the Community and Norway for 1992 and duties on certain fish imports for 1992 and of the Government's intention to negotiate the best possible fishing opportunities for the United Kingdom fishing industry for 1992 consistent with the requirement for conservation of fishing stocks.

I begin, as my right hon. Friend the Minister did last year, by reminding the House that fishing remains a dangerous and difficult industry. Last year we acknowledged that 30 lives had been lost in the industry; this year 31 lives have been lost. I am sure the whole House would wish to acknowledge the loss to the close-knit communities involved in fishing which that represents.

In response to the point of order raised by the hon. Member for Greenock and Port Glasgow (Dr. Godman), I am sorry that the documents were late. It was for the reason which he gave. We only had the preliminary documents over the weekend. They cannot be produced by the Commission until we have reached agreement with Norway because so many of the waters are jointly managed. We got the explanatory memorandum out as rapidly as we could. Even then, there were gaps, because the talks with Norway did not conclude until 7 December and the Commission had to make proposals consequent on those talks. Therefore, we produced a supplementary explanatory memorandum to fill the gaps. I signed that at lunchtime today, the earliest that I could do so. I acknowledge the problem, but we have done our best to surmount it.

Dr. Godman: I am grateful to the Minister. Will he give the House an assurance that the explanatory memoranda are a faithful replication of the proposals that will come from the European Commission some time in the future?

Mr. Curry: I give that undertaking to the hon. Gentleman. In the final stages of some of the working groups that will be meeting between now and the Council meeting, the Commission may come forward with new proposals on matters such as tariffs, but in regard to total allowable catches and quotas, I give the hon. Gentleman an undertaking that what is in the explanatory memorandum is the latest state of play. We put the information there in complete faith. I examined the memorandum line by line to make sure that it was as accurate and up to date as possible.

I will move directly to the package in front of us because many hon. Members wish to take part in this important debate. The guide prices for 1992 were agreed in November, with no major changes. The important point for the United Kingdom was the dual price system for herring. That is particularly important to the Scottish fleet. There is a lower price for August and September. We managed to maintain the dual price system. That part of the package was settled, as it always is, in November.

On the key issues facing the Council on TACs and quotas, the scientific advice is sombre, generally advocating no change or reductions. In the North sea no increases are proposed, except for haddock, where the total allowable catch is increased from 50,000 to 60,000 tonnes. The upturn, partly because of its rarity, is welcome to us.

On the west of Scotland, all stocks are under pressure, but the proposed reductions reflect a greater pessimism than they should. We will press for modest increases in the proposals within biologically safe limits.

In the Irish sea, a real problem area for fisheries, we acknowledge that the Northern Irish fleet, with its dependence upon whiting and its heavy dependence upon the nephrops fishery, and with the sensitivity of the Hague preference as it applies to Northern Ireland, finds itself in a difficult position. We recognise the difficulty. We believe that there can be an increase. Only a modest increase is needed to avert the triggering of the Hague preference. We will seek to increase to those levels. We are anxious to safeguard our position on nephrops, which is a particularly important species to the Northern Ireland fishery.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Can the Minister tell us what protection he is giving to the Northern Ireland fleet from others who are coming into those fishing grounds?

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman will know that the Northern Irish fleet depends heavily on fishing in the Irish sea. In the past when the Hague preference has been triggered, that has led to a decline in the stocks available for Northern Ireland, and they have gone to the Republic. We have managed to correct that with swa – ps with the Irish Republic, to the benefit of the Northern Irish industry. This year we will seek to avoid the triggering of the Hague preference. If we can make up any shortfalls with swaps which will benefit the industry, we will undertake to try to do that.

In the Channel we think that there is an undue restriction on the cod and whiting TACs and on some of the flat fish. Our general position is to try to maximise the possibilities within safe biological limits.

As I have said, the proposals trigger the Hague preference for North sea haddock and North sea cod, although only by 500 tonnes. We will seek to get that TAC up to the level where it is not necessary to trigger. On the west coast, the Hague preference would be triggered for whiting and saithe, in the Irish sea for cod, whiting and plaice, and in the west of Scotland for cod, haddock, whiting and saithe.

We will seek TACs which would avoid triggering the Hague preference. We are sensitive to its problems. Certain communities benefit from it, but others feel that they are victims. We have always regarded the Hague preference as part of the fabric of relative stability. In the past we have succeeded in winning the Hague preference in respect of some of the quantities for which it was claimed. We shall seek to achieve an equitable balance if the problem presents itself at the Council.

Once again, we do not have mackerel flexibility in the proposals from the Commission. That is an important issue. It is essential to be able to take mackerel east of the 40 deg west line. The agreement with Norway allows the Norwegians some flexibility. We will seek to reinstate mackerel flexibility. I regard it as silly of the Commission to keep it out of the package every year. Clearly, the Commission wants to force us to fight to put it back. We will not disappoint it; we will fight to put it back in the package.

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): Will the Minister undertake that in seeking to reinstate the flexibility, it will be to the full extent of 62,000 tonnes?

Mr. Curry: I can give the assurance that we will aim to get the full 62,000 tonnes. As the hon. Gentleman knows, in trading in the Community we have to get a majority vote to do that. I am outlining a number of the things that we are asking from the package, but I assure the hon. Gentleman that it is our objective to get the full tonnage, because we regard it as justified. He will know that, during the past two years, we have not succeeded in getting the full tonnage. That is an important issue for the United Kingdom.

The most important issue—certainly the main preoccupation in the fishing industry—will be the effort control proposals in the package. As the House will know, at present there is an eight day tie-up. As the eight days are consecutive, it makes for an inflexible system and adds up to 96 days of tie-up during the year. The recommendation is for 200 days of tie-up a la carte—taken as the fishermen wish. There is no explicit gear option, but the language upon which we used to get a gear option last year is in the package this year. I am sorry to be slightly elliptical about that, but it is the situation.

The Commission is proposing that coverage should be the same—in other words it should be boats which catch 100 tonnes of cod and haddock, and those fish must represent 40 per cent. of the total catch. The twin criteria are the same as last year. It is also proposed that fishermen can fish under the whiting derogation during the period in which they are formally tied up, subject to a 90 mm, one-net rule.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Does the Minister accept that some of the real anger which greeted this proposal derives from the fact it will be directed against the same people who have been obliged to observe the eight day tie-up rule this year? There is considerable annoyance that, for example, Denmark and France appear to have got round it in some way. If it is a common fisheries policy, surely it should be common throughout.

Mr. Curry: I recognise that there are a number of reasons for the fishermen's objections. First, one cannot fish under that system—a 200 day tie-up means that one cannot fish economically. It is not a practical proposition and I must make it clear to the House that we shall oppose it.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Is there not a question mark placed over the restrictions when we hear —as was reported last week—that some fishing boats are illegally landing fish late at night at ports in different parts of the country? Their landings are not being recorded. What will happen? What will the Government do about that? Do they intend to put in place sufficient enforcement officers to ensure that that does not happen, or will the Government ignore what is happening, in which case fishing communities will lose.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman poses a real problem of enforcement. Our policy in the United Kingdom is to allow fishermen to land anywhere. Some fishermen have asked why we do not have designated landing ports. I can imagine the problem which would result if we did not designate every port where landing takes place. We would have a problem, especially in places with an irregular coastline, such as Scotland.

The enforcement problem is real—we cannot put an inspector on every boat all the time, and it is also a practical impossibility for there to be an inspector at every landing place all the time.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North) rose——

Mr. Curry: I shall give way once more during this section of my speech, as many hon. Members wish to speak. As the hon. Lady asked first, I shall give way to her and then I shall give the Floor to the hon. Gentleman.

Mrs. Ewing: The Minister has already said that the 200-day limit is unacceptable because of the devastating effect that it would have on the fishing community. Can he tell us what the Government's position will be on that, or will it be like last year when a 10 day tie-up was suggested and the Government came back with an eight day tie-up and claimed it as a victory? Will the Government come back with something less than 200 days and claim it as a victory?

Mr. Curry: I was about to come to that part of my remarks. I have taken two interventions since then on a slightly tangential question. I promised the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) that I would give way, but I am happy to plough on for a while.

Mr. Wilson: I sympathise with the Minister, but it is unreasonable to discuss the intervention about alleged illegal and unrecorded landings without establishing the factual basis. Without that it is a smear. Has the Minister any factual evidence for the allegation? Does it have any substance in fact?

Mr. Curry: We all know that the fishing industry is alive with reports of what other people do. Some of them are legal practices, some are illegal. I could not say that all fishermen are saints; nor do I wish to say that the fishing industry is an organised crime syndicate, because that is not the case. There is bound to be some infringement, as is the case throughout the Community. Our enforcement is by far the best. I should be glad if enforcement in other countries were a little more rigorous and were similar to the enforcement which we carry out at considerable cost.

There is no way that we can accept the proposed length of tie-up. It is anti-conservation, in the sense that it would be unenforceable if one tried to impose it on the industry. It would drive fishermen to precisely the sort of wholesale cheating which the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) spelled out. It is not the way to conserve stocks.

Two years ago, when I was first appointed, I said that the job was to conserve stocks and fishermen's livelihoods, and that there was a balance between the two. The proposal does not achieve the balance, any more than the equivalent propposal last year did—a 10 day tie-up and 120 mm square mesh. That was an opening bid which was wholly unrealistic in terms of what the industry would accept and what would deliver effective conservation.

I have said that we will not accept the present proposal. However, continuing effort control is necessary. We shall be seeking significantly fewer days and flexibility, so that there will not be eight consecutive days of tie-up—I accept the arguments against it. We are examining the possibility of a modification of the criteria to overcome some of the objections about categories of boats, and the equity of the boats caught in tie-up last year.

We are seeking a gear option, and it is important that there should be one. For example, the Humberside industry, which is a long-distance fishery, could not operate on the basis of tie-up. We are seeking that it should apply more widely in the Community fleet. One of the strong reasons for a sense of injustice in the fishing industry is that it was caught by the proposals, but there were means by which other people avoided being caught.

The hon. Member for Cunninghame, North asked whether we had up-to-date information. We understand that the Commission may propose a sliding scale to include partial exemptions for vessels taking certain gear options—for example, in respect of the part of the year that they spend fishing for pelagic species. We must wait to see what the Commission comes up with during the negotiations. Traditionally, the Council goes through the night, into a fairly tight clinch, and it is impossible to forecast what type of proposition will be on the table as it develops.

I must pay some attention to tariffs, because I am conscious of the needs of the people who work in processing as well as those whose job is catching fish. More than 22,000 people work in processing imported frozen fish material and it is an important source of employment. It would be wrong not to take account of their interests when we take the decisions.

The Commission has proposed a reduction in the tariffs on Alaskan pollock, from 10 to 5 per cent. There is no quota restriction on that fish, as it is a cod surrogate, as are a number of species. The Commission has proposed duty cuts on fresh, chilled or frozen whole cod, saithe and Greenland halibut. There may be a proposal for some liberalisation on hoki, which is a New Zealand cod-type species, although I understand that, as there has been large-scale purchasing by the United States, there is no ready availability. We do not expect a proposal on hake because it is central to the negotiations with Argentina. The Commission is reserving hake as a fish to negotiate in the Argentine-Community agreement.

All the current concessions operate from April until December, so there is a moratorium on the first three months of the year. I accept that there is a case for some liberalisation, for the reasons that I have given and to ensure supplies to the consumer. We do not want the consumer to be driven out of the habit of consuming fish because of the price.

I shall balance those concessions against the needs of the catching industry, because I recognise that the maintenance of price levels has been important to the industry at a time of reduced supplies. We expect the Commission to present its paper on the state of the fisheries sector—that will form the basis of the mid-term review—in this Council.

There is no such thing as a homogeneous United Kingdom fishing interest. Different communities have different concerns and they are often competing concerns. I am often faced at one port or in one community by demands for protection against the activity of a different British community; so there is a balance to be struck. For example, in Scotland the interests of the white fish fishermen at the east coast ports, fishermen in the Clyde and the west coast, or the Shetlanders are not the same.

I have already mentioned the particular importance in Northern Ireland of whiting and nephrops and the difficulties of the Hague preference, and we shall seek to return to last year's position on that.

In England, there is no absolute homogeneity between the interests of Humberside's deep water fleet, which can fish with large-scale meshes, which has its interests in north Norway and which will benefit significantly from the EFTA concessions, and the interests of Fleetwood, where the fishermen are concerned with the activities of south-west beamers inside the 12-mile zone. Fishermen in Lowestoft are preoccupied with flat fish and with the sensitivities of the swap with the Dutch for some of their fish species. Fishermen in the south-west, who have a more mixed fishery, are preoccupied with the importance of a mackerel box, which has been made into a permanent instrument there.

If we satisfy one community totally, others will not be satisfied, so it is a difficult task. We must add to that the needs of the processors and consumers. If consumers go on strike, there will be no point in trying to preserve the industry for anyone. We must bear all that in mind.

We have had close contacts with the industry. I met members of the two principal fishing organisations—the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations and the Scottish Fishing Federation—last week. I shall meet the NFFO again at the beginning of next week to go over some of the ground in more detail. Both organisations are traditionally in Brussels and I have made arrangements to keep in contact with them during the negotiations. We already have two meetings planned with both organisations next year to discuss other relevant issues.

The negotiations will be difficult, as they always are. It will be difficult to satisfy everybody, but we shall argue the case of fishermen in all quarters of the United Kingdom. We shall do our best to come to a fair and equitable arrangement that gives them a reasonable prospect of a livelihood, which, given the difficulties of the industry, they certainly deserve.

8.2 pm

Mr. Elliot Morley (Glandford and Scunthorpe) I beg to move, To leave out from "duties on certain fish imports for 1992, and" to the end of the Question, and to add instead thereof:

'condemns the Government for its failure to produce policies to bring stability to the United Kingdom fishing industry, including a decommissioning scheme to reduce fishing effort in order to conserve fishing stocks and guarantee a sustainable fishing industry.'

It is a great shame that, yet again, we are discussing further reductions in the total available catch of fish species for our fishermen. Every time we discuss that issue, there seems to be a lack of direction in the management of fisheries. There is crisis management in terms of the problems, pressures and changes in the industry and the ever-greater restrictions that are being placed on it. It is time that we came out of the negotiations with a consistent policy to introduce stability into the industry. We would then not have to stagger from crisis to crisis.

Will the Minister consider some of the following points in his discussions with the Commission? It is proposed to reduce the minimum landing size of whiting from 27 to 23 cm. That seems surprising, given that whiting is becoming an important fish species for human consumption. I suspect that the hand of the Danish industrial fisheries is involved, because they want to reduce the minimum landing size of whiting for their own reasons. I hope that the Minister will resist that reduction strongly in order to maintain that fishery. Indeed, there is a case for increasing the minimum landing size and my information is that the Scottish industry would support that.

Mr. Curry: The hon. Gentleman raised a specific point to which I shall reply. As he knows, that reduction was one element which we did not like in the October package. I voted for the package as a whole because I thought that the other elements were satisfactory enough to make it sastisfactory overall, but I have never disguised the fact that we found that element objectionable: we agree entirely with the industry about it. If I get a chance to reverse it in Brussels, I shall do so. However, we shall consult the industry shortly on the possibility of introducing a unilateral measure that would increase the minimum landing size for whiting to 27cm—back to where it was—or to 30 cm if the industry wishes and on a one-net rule for the whiting derogation.

We shall issue papers shortly to consult the industry on whether the square mesh panels should remain compulsory when we adopt the new technical conservation measure in June. I hope that that information completes the picture.

Mr. Morley: I am grateful to the Minister for those assurances, and I am sure that the industry will welcome them.

The TAC in saithe is being cut drastically by 18 per cent. I do not see the scientific argument to back up a reduction on that scale. Saithe is an important fish species for east coast fishermen in particular and I hope that the Minister will try to justify that cut.

I welcome the increase in the haddock TAC and I am sure that it will be welcomed by our North sea fishermen. However, the cod TAC is to be reduced by what may seem a marginal 2 per cent.

The Minister mentioned the Hague preference, particularly as it applies to Ireland. I hope that in the negotations, cod quotas will be agreed which would remove the need for the Hague preference. If the Hague preference is implemented, it will tend to complicate matters, especially as in the Irish sea the cod quota allocated to the Republic of Ireland has not been totally taken up, so there is a distortion in the amount of cod available to our fishermen.

Mr. Curry: To ensure that the House is absolutely clear, may I explain that we shall try to get the TACs increased for the Irish sea so that the United Kingdom quota will be about the same as if no Hague preference had applied to the Commission's proposed TACs for 1992.

Mr. Morley: Again, I appreciate the Minister's assurance. We seem to be making a fair amount of progress.

I should appreciate an assurance from the Minister on the question of the 400 tonnes of cod which, for the past two years, have been given to the Danes as part of a swap. I realise that, in the cut and thrust of negotiations, there tends to be give and take, but the Danes appear to have been doing the taking in that negotiation and we appear to have been doing the giving. I do not see why we should give so much cod to the Danes at this stage in the negotiations. I strongly urge the Minister to resist that and I should appreciate an assurance that he will do so.

I hope that the Minister will maintain the status quo for English channel cod. I take his point about the importance of the processing industry. I understand that it currently employs some 22,500 people, many of whom work in my area. It is an important industry, which relies on stability of supply. There is no doubt that fish prices have been pushed up recently because of shortages and there is a danger that, if prices are pushed up too much, although it helps the fishing industry because it receives more money, consumers will resist buying fish.

The Minister will be aware—we have discussed it before—of what happened in Great Grimsby with the closure of Findus and a loss of 900 jobs, which was fiercely resisted by my hon. Friend the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell). One reason claimed for that closure was the high price of fish and the fact that it was no longer economic to produce fillet fish products, so I recognise that there is a real problem. The scale of the problem illustrates the fact that there is a basic shortage of fish, which brings us back to the fact that Britain needs a basic stability of supply. Concessions are being made on tariffs and I suspect that they will continue to ensure a supply to the fishing industry.

The scale of the problem was illustrated by the UK Association of Frozen Fish Producers, which produced figures to show that imported fish account for 88 per cent. of fish used in the fish processing industry. That figure is depressingly high and I should like much more of our local fish to be used for the benefit of the fishing industry and the processing sector. To deal with the problem, we need more available fish and we must ensure that we achieve that aim through proper management schemes.

I was disappointed at the outcome of the EFTA and European economic area agreement which allowed tariff concessions to the EFTA countries, particularly Norway and Iceland, while we did not get much out of it. The Minister will have received representations from the industry, which has made clear its feelings on the issue. It is a shame that, when we had the opportunity to negotiate greater access to the fishing grounds of Iceland and Norway, we obtained little from Norway and virtually nothing from Iceland, other than a small quantity of red fish. I understand that the increase in Norwegian waters must be met by quota swaps, so the overall deal for our fishermen has been poor. I am sorry that that deal has been concluded, because it is unlikely that we shall have the opportunity to try to improve on it.

Mr. Curry: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will acknowledge that our success in ensuring that there was no tariff liberalisation on salmon, mackerel and herring was welcome, as it was important, particularly to the Scottish industry. He asked about the material advantage. He will know that the agreement was strongly in the national interest in that it created economic space. We succeeded in pushing up the Community share in Norwegian waters from 2·14 per cent. to 2·9 per cent. on the basis of an expanding TAC, which will mean an extra 10,000 tonnes of cod by 1997. Next year, when we shall be halfway towards the implementation of the agreement, we shall get 2·5 per cent. The tonnages are small, but well worth having in the context of the global amounts available. I still maintain that the United Kingdom achieved an acceptable deal in those negotiations, given that it was overwhelmingly in the national interest to conclude it.

Mr. Morley: I appreciate the Minister's position in the negotiations. However, I believe that those increases—which are, of course, welcome—could have been achieved through bilateral negotiations, without the deal having to include access to those waters for Portugal and Spain, which have no historical track record there. Therefore, I do not think that it was that great a deal.

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): Would not the hon. Gentleman agree that we had a particularly strong claim in relation to Iceland as, historically, one of the main districts for fishing from the Humber ports were the cod fisheries around Iceland? The Humber ports were devastated when we lost those fisheries. Therefore, when we had a chance to regain a share, it was regrettable that we did not do better.

Mr. Morley: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman, who comes from Humberside and knows what happened to the Humberside fleet when it lost access to the Icelandic waters. Our fishing fleet paid a terrible price when it lost the Icelandic waters while Iceland received all the benefits. Iceland now wants the benefits from close relationships with the European Community and tariff advantages. It achieved those goals, while we received a paltry amount of red fish—not even a prime species. I thought that it was a poor deal for what is left of our long-distance fleet.

Everything that we have discussed so far has been underlined by the decline in fish stocks and the problems faced by the industry in meeting that crisis. Therefore, we must consider our management and how it is guided. The cuts in the TACs are influenced by scientific advice and it is right that the Government and the Opposition should take note of it. I am worried at what happens to reports such as the east coast salmon review—a detailed report based on proper scientific advice. Not only were the report's findings delayed while it sat on a desk for a year and no action taken on it—because, I understand, the Scottish Office did not like its conclusions—but when the Government finally acted on the report, they ignored its main recommendations. They have decided to close the east coast salmon fishery and their only justification for that seems to lie in the fact that the Scottish landowners wanted the fishery closed.

I am extremely disappointed that the Government have caved in to a small pressure group and put at risk more than 1,000 jobs on the east coast. They have taken away an important traditional fishery and those people who have lost, or will lose, the opportunity of using that fishery are likely to turn their attention to other stocks such as crabs and inshore species. That will add to the fishery's problems, for no scientific reason.

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): I do not know where the hon. Gentleman got the idea that there was no scientific justification. There is plenty of scientific evidence about the lack of salmon coming up the River Tay, in which I declare an interest as it runs through my constituency. To suggest that only landowners are interested in the well-being of fishing on the Tay is nonsense and the hon. Gentleman should not repeat it. Thousands of jobs in my constituency depend on tourism, an essential part of which is fishing on the River Tay and its tributaries. If the hon. Gentleman ignores that, he ignores the economic well-being of an essential part of the Scottish industry.

Mr. Morley: With respect, I think that the hon. Member is himself ignoring the findings of the report, which said that there was a limit to the amount of salmon that could be contained in a river. Even if the numbers of fish running are increased, that does not necessarily increase the escapement levels of fish. There has been an increase in the amount of salmon in some rivers that have traditionally had interceptory netting at their mouths. The jobs of constituents of the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) will not be under threat as the salmon will still be in the river, but the jobs of the people up and down the east coast will certainly be under threat and will be lost. Those were the report's findings.

The Opposition are prepared to support what might be difficult decisions in relation to fisheries management when scientific evidence justifies them, but how can we support a Government who ignore the findings of their own specialists and reports? That brings the process into disrepute.

Mr. A. J. Beith (Berwick-upon-Tweed): The hon. Gentleman knows that my constituency will be the most affected. The Government did not merely ignore the scientific evidence: they even admitted that they were doing so when they said that they were going to close the fisheries.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman is absolutely right and many of his constituents will pay the price. The Government said that although the evidence was not there, they would still close the fishery. Such decisions do not give credibility to the management regime. The Government do not transmit the right signals to the industry when they are not prepared to follow proper scientific evidence, but give in to vested interests.

Another management issue involves the increase in mesh size. We recognise that there is an argument for the mesh size to be increased to 100 mm, but how does the Minister expect us to support what must have been a difficult decision when he does not support the salmon industry? The Opposition have mentioned square mesh panels in previous debates and certainly support those. We were greatly disappointed that the proposal was not adopted by all EC member states in previous Fisheries Councils. We hope that the Government and the Minister will press for that suggestion to be adopted.

The issue of black fish—illegal landings of fish—has already been mentioned. Everyone in the industry knows that there are large-scale landings of over-quota and undersized fish caught illegally. The Scottish Sunday Post contained an article which estimated that the scale of such landings amounted to about £100 million a year.

Every fisherman and fish merchant involved in such illegal landings is cutting the industry's throat. It is true that we need to know the precise scale of the problem and see the evidence, but I do not doubt that law-breaking on that scale is occurring. I hope that the Minister will give more attention to enforcement measures in our country. I hope that in the Fisheries Council he will discuss measures such as fitting satellite transponders to fishing vessels so that they can be tracked and encouraging the European Commission to carry out spot checks on member states to ensure that all of them are obeying the law. I accept that Britain is not the only country in which the law is broken in that respect and that other member states do not enforce the law as rigorously as they should. The Commission should introduce a spot check system to make sure that enforcement takes place throughout the Community.

Mr. Curry: I am slightly puzzled. A short time ago the hon. Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) said that such reports were a smear, but the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) validates them. We all agree that there is a problem, but at the end of the day it is the fishermen who will have to decide that they will not permit such things to happen. If people are determined to break the law, we cannot stop them. We cannot run a police state with an inspector in every boat. We might even need two inspectors, one to protect the other. It is not a practical proposition.

Mr. Morley: We do not know the scale of such law-breaking, but there are allegations and smears for all sorts of reasons. People in the industry are pointing fingers at each other. Everyone knows that illegal fishing takes place and it must be stamped out. People in the industry who are engaged in such fishing are doing themselves and fishermen and processors who are abiding by the law and playing by the rules no good whatever.

Unlicensed vessels also contribute to fraud and in that context I know that the Minister is discussing the extension of licensing. I encourage him in those discussions. The central theme of any package of management and change is decommissioning. The Minister met some of his hon. Friends recently in a delegation of which I was a member. I thank him for doing that and for the constructive and positive way in which the problems of decommissioning were discussed. He said that decommissioning was not ruled out as part of an overall package. Will he say in the near future whether he will introduce decommissioning as part of that overall package?

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): I am in favour of a decommissioning scheme, but can the hon. Gentleman say how that would reduce the effort rather than simply leaving it as it is and removing some vessels from the fleet?

Mr. Morley: I shall come shortly to that important issue, which is the main theme of one of the Government's arguments against decommissioning. They say that if the fleet is reduced, the boats that are left will simply increase their efforts and the fish stocks will not be any better off.

I hope that the Minister will discuss with the Council the proposal by the Advisory Committee on Fisheries Management for a 30 per cent. reduction of effort in the North sea. That is linked to the proposal for a 200-day effort limitation which, it is suggested, will be a days-in-port restriction. A 200-day limitation is better than an eight-day consecutive restriction, but I am concerned about fisheries management that is simply based on tying up boats in port. It is wasteful and difficult for the industry and presents grat problems for the fishermen. It is not efficient fisheries management.

Mr. Curry: Is the hon. Gentleman saying that a 200-day tie-up is better than the current 96 days of consecutive restriction periods of eight days?

Mr. Morley: I am grateful to the Minister for his assistance. Any sort of effort limitation based on a number of days rather than on consecutive days tied up in port every month, such as the eight-day consecutive tie-up, is certainly an improvement.

I am not arguing for a 200-day tie-up, because that would be unsatisfactory. If the European Community went down that road, the Council would throw in the Minister's face the fact that this country does not have a decommissioning scheme. If we start arguing for a reduction of the number of days in port, the Council will oppose it on the grounds that we have not made a move on decommissioning to reduce fleet capacity. That would make it harder for the Minister to get concessions and would impose a heavy burden on the fleet.

In terms of the Government's attitude, it is an insult to suggest that fishermen who have to meet fixed costs and pay off loans are not fishing to capacity. Given our fishing patterns and the fact that I have talked to fishermen about this issue, there is not much scope for fishermen to make a great deal of extra effort. The Minister has not advanced any arguments to back the allegation that fishermen are working below capacity.

If the Commission introduces a days-in-port scheme, it should pay compensation to the fishermen who are forced to tie up, because that is the equivalent of a set-aside scheme. Farmers who take land out of production are paid, sometimes quite handsomely, for doing so. I do not want to be controversial, but many Conservative Members have taken up set-aside payments and have received many thousands of pounds of public money. If some Conservative Members owned fishing boats we might see more sympathy and more support for compensation for taking those boats out of production.

Mr. Salmond: I saw some signs from the Treasury Bench indicating that Ministers do not agree with the proposal for a comprehensive lay-up scheme. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that, in the three years up to 1989, some 86 million ecu was paid by the Commission to other countries for such a lay-up scheme in certain fisheries that were under preasure.

Mr. Morley: The hon. Gentleman is correct. Other countries have made use of that fund. However, payments for tying up are not a good use of money. Problems of over-capacity should be solved by using the money for a decommissioning scheme. That is better than spending it on tying-up grants.

If there is to be any such restriction, there must be a gear option. It has been alleged that previous gear options have been abused, but it can be enforced. People who take a gear option and abuse it should suffer substantial penalties, including a possible suspension of their fishing licence. People who break the law in that way undermine the industry's future and the Minister would be quite right to take strong action against them.

I hope that we can have a rolling reference period for the calculation for restricted fishing boats to take into account boats that have switched their fishing patterns over the previous year. I agree that any restriction or scheme must apply to all member states. The previous days-in-port regulation did not apply to one or two member states' fleets and there can be no justification for this country abiding by such restrictions when other countries do not.

The Government pay lip service to conservation through their conservation policies, but they have not been prepared to introduce a definitive policy for fisheries management and control. The hands-off policy that the Government have pursued for so long is not working and even peripheral policies, such as the privatisation of the trust ports and of Associated British Ports, have been damaging the industry.

Fishing fleets have many problems apart from fish stocks. The fishing fleet in Whitehaven faces severe problems because of the recession and the fall of trade in the port. My hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) is actively pressing that case, but reduced prosperity for the industry means that fleets such as that one which are based in small ports can barely afford the dredging fees that are needed to keep those ports open. I hope that the Minister will bear such issues in mind when he considers an overall strategy for the fishing industry.

I hope that the Minister will take up the points that I have made about the TAC. I thank him for the assurances that he has given. However, the time has come for the Government to make a statement on a decommissioning scheme. We know that, on its own, this is not the answer to the problems of the industry, but, given the pressures, difficulties and restrictions that the Government are putting on the fishing industry, it may help. It is curious that the Government seem to think that it is all right to limit fishing days—the amount of time that people spend fishing—but do not think that it is all right that the European Community should limit working hours. There is a contradition in their approach.

[Mr. Morley]

In any sort of restructuring or management, a decommissioning scheme is essential. It will assist those who want to get out of the industry and reduce effort. It should be allied to the social fund so as to take into account the effect on local communities and those who earn their livelihood on the ships.

Mr. Mans: I am interested in what the hon. Gentleman said about the social chapter. How does he feel that the 48-hour rule, which I understand that his party supports, would apply to the fishing industry?

Mr. Morley: The 48-hour rule would not apply to the fishing industry because of the pattern of its work and because many in it are self-employed, and therefore free to work for as long as they want. The question is not relevant.

We cannot have the two approaches. The days-in-port scheme is a restriction on people's livelihood. There is no sign of any compensation for those who are affected. There are European Community funds available for this, but, above all, decommissioning must be used as part of restructuring. The social fund will assist the communities as well as the individuals. The resources are there, the structures are there and it is time that the Government took up this opportunity.

8.31 pm

Mr. David Harris (St. Ives): The hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) is a fair man, but he was a little harsh on my hon. Friend the Minister towards the end of his speech.

Mr. Morley: Never.

Mr. Harris: I thought that the the hon. Gentleman was. My hon. Friend the Minister has worked tirelessly for the fishing industry. He has a thankless job.

Mr. Wilson: But the hon. Gentleman would still like it.

Mr. Harris: I am sure my hon. Friend likes his job, but it is a thankless task. On behalf of the industry, he has to deal with an impossible situation. We all know what it is —the dreadful task of trying to match the ever-increasing catching capacity with ever-decreasing fish stocks. It is as simple and difficult as that. He is to be commended for his hard work on behalf of the industry and for the great courtesy with which he receives every hon. Member who represents a fishing constituency and who therefore has great problems. His door is always open to us, as it is to the fishing industry and its organisations. I am sure that the whole House will thank him for that.

It was my sad duty and privilege once again in the past year to visit the relatives of fishermen lost at sea—in this case the two men lost in the Margaret and William II. I mention that partly because I know that all hon. Members who represent coastline constituencies are increasingly concerned by the number of hit and run accidents. Responsibility in such matters is split between Government Departments. The Department of Transport takes the lead in maritime safety matters, but I know that my hon. Friend the Minister is concerned as well.

I hope that the one message that will go out from this debate—a united one from those of us who represent fishermen—is that we are alarmed at the number of these accidents. Many of them can be prevented by better watch-keeping on merchant ships. Earlier this week, I saw hon. Members, mainly from Scotland, who are concerned about another aspect—the loss of fishing boats in accidents involving submarines. That is extremely worrying, and I hope that, while we concentrate on the financial and conservation aspects, we never lose sight of the dangers that our fishermen face at sea.

The debate is primarily a review of the fishing industry in preparation for the Fisheries Council meeting next week. Once again, that is being dominated by the ever-downward pressure on quotas for many species. Looking at this problem from the south-west of England perspective, the aspect that I find most worrying is the pressure on quotas in area VII for plaice and sole.

I pay tribute to the work that the National Federation of Fishermen's Organisations does for the industry and in briefing Members of Parliament for debates such as this. Its chief executive estimates, for example, that the proposed cut in quota for flat fish in area VII could reduce the income of the entire European Community fleet by as much as £15 million. If those figures are accurate, a large proportion of that loss of income will be borne by United Kingdom fishermen and in particular fishermen from Cornwall and Devon. The ports of Newlyn and Brixham stand to be hit considerably by such cuts in TACs.

If one measures not TACs but the proposed reductions in quotas, the most startling example is that for plaice in area VIIf and VIIg. I know that you are familiar, Madam Deputy Speaker, with such technicalities, but just in case you are not, that is the Bristol channel and Celtic sea. That reduction is a startling 27 per cent. Those waters are very important for south-west fishermen and the consequences of such a reduction, if that is what it turns out to be and it is not mitigated by other measures to offset it, would be serious.

That is why I urge my hon. Friend the Minister not just to look closely at those figures but to negotiate strongly on them. Again, I share the view of the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe that many of these proposals are not based on sound scientific advice. To put it mildly, there is room for argument on the views put forward by the scientists. I also press my hon. Friend to try to offset the damage caused by such drastic reductions by arranging swaps with other countries. I see that he is nodding with agreement on that.

Another feature of next week's meeting of Fisheries Ministers will be the review of the mackerel box—a matter of great importance to the south-west fishermen. I have always been in favour of the mackerel box, and I played some part, both as a Member of the European Parliament and as a Westminster Member of Parliament, in getting it in place. Dreadful harm was being done to juvenile stocks by the gross overfishing of those waters several years ago. I have always recognised that the box is a blunt instrument. It has certain advantages, but it has disadvantages, and some people have suffered as a result.

The most worrying aspect of the box has been the way in which, unlike some of the boats specialising in pelagic fishery—I am thinking particularly of one example in my constituency—the south-west fishery has been unable to build up a track record, and has therefore found great difficulty in obtaining quotas.

The difficulty of obtaining a reasonable quota also applies to the hand liners. My hon. Friend the Minister and his officials have spent many hours on that problem and I thank them for it, but the situation is still worrying.

The hand liners pose no threat to fish stocks. Most have small boats going out from the Cornish coast and I hope that some way can be found to ensure that they can continue on a reasonably sound basis. I ask my hon. Friend to look at the matter again.

Reference has already been made to the Hague preference. I regarded it as a scandal that the south-west was not granted such preference when the agreement was struck. It was a political deal before the common fisheries policy. I believe that it was the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) who signed that agreement when he was a Foreign Office Minister in the Labour Government. I am not sure whether he foresaw then what the consequences would be for the south-west fishery, but he represents a south-west constituency.

Mr. Salmond: Before the hon. Gentleman gives the right hon. Member for Plymouth, Devonport (Dr. Owen) the credit for the Hague preference, I should tell him that the initiative was taken by Garret FitzGerald, the then Irish Foreign Minister.

Mr. Harris: I was not giving the right hon. Member for Devonport the credit or the blame; I was simply pointing out that I think—I am open to correction—that he signed the agreement as a Foreign Office Minister. In those days, negotiations with Europe were carried out by the Foreign Office. Thank goodness that that situation has changed. I speak as a former Parliamentary Private Secretary to a Foreign Secretary.

The Hague agreement has done terrible damage to the south-west fishery and its shadow is cast forward in so many ways. If some regions or other countries in the current round of negotiations are given additional quota as a result of the Hague preference, those who stand to lose will be those who do not enjoy that status, and that includes the south-west, even though parts of it are dependent on fishing. Again, the ports of Newlyn and Brixham will be particularly affected, but so will a number of other ports in Cornwall and Devon. I was heartened by what my hon. Friend the Minister said on that, but the Hague preference is a dangerous area.

As the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) said, my hon. Friend the Minister received a delegation—it was meant to be an all-party delegation, but for reasons which we understand, the Liberal Democrats were unable to come along—[Interruption.] I hear someone say "cheap", but that is no reflection on the hon. Members concerned, one of whom was giving evidence to a Select Committee. I am in no way blaming the Liberal Democrats.

Those of us who did see the Minister were somewhat heartened by what he said. All of us who keep a close eye on the fishing industry have noticed the Government's considerable move away from their previous position; we all welcome that. The Government are seriously considering decommissioning. However, we all understand that a price will have to be paid if a decommissioning scheme is brought in. Technical measures will not be such a controversial element, but, again, as the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe said, the question of effort control will undoubtedly be a controversial aspect if that forms part of a wider conservation package. Fishermen will rightly need to look with great care at what is being proposed.

Sometimes we use euphemisms in the Chamber and perhaps instead of talking about "effort control" we should be talking about "tying up". That, as we know from experience in the north and in Scotland, has been a hot issue. I welcome my hon. Friend the Minister's opposition to a 200 day tying-up proposal. My guess is that we shall probably see moves towards greater tying-up, but I hope there will be greater flexibility. At the moment, the boats in the south-west are not affected and I hope that they will not be, but I hope that when my hon. Friend replies he will confirm that the Commission's proposals apply to the areas which are at present covered.

Mr. Curry indicated assent.

Mr. Harris: In conclusion, we all wish my hon. Friend well in the horrendously difficult task that he faces week in week out, month in month out. I hope that there will not be a Division tonight, but I suspect that that is wishful thinking. We need to back him strongly on a united basis as he defends United Kingdom interests in the negotiations next week.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. If those hon. Members seeking to speak were each to take about 10 to 12 minutes each, it would be possible to call them all in this timed debate.

8.46 pm

Mr. Frank Doran (Aberdeen, South): I shall endeavour to comply, Madam Deputy Speaker.

I congratulate the Minister, not so much on what he said because there was not much of surprise and much was unwelcome—we have become used to the standard opposition to decommissioning schemes—as on the way in which it was said. I have been involved in about a dozen fishing debates since I entered the House in 1987, and they have all been characterised by bad temper. I appreciated the much more humble tone adopted by the Minister today. He showed much less aggression than he adopted in the corresponding debate last year, when in one fell swoop he alienated the north-east fishing establishment.

It is worth emphasising the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) and in the Opposition's amendment, that the Government have no apparent strategy for the fishing industry. That was shown again by the Minister's statement tonight. There was no sign of anything other than crisis management and no sign that the Government had any particular direction in which they wanted to travel.

My particular concern is the fish processing industry, because any decisions made as a result of the negotiations in Europe will affect that industry, of which I heard no mention by the Minister tonight. That reflects the lack of strategy and an apparent lack of concern for the industry, which is certainly felt by the industry.

There are 4,500 jobs in fish processing in the Grampian region in 148 businesses, which makes it a significant and important employer, particularly in the rural areas and the smaller communities. They have faced massive problems as a result of the rundown in stocks and the lower TACs. That has given rise to considerable problems, not the least of which was the announcement of the closure of a fish transport business, Charles Alexander and Company, in my constituency, which will result in the loss of about 300 jobs.

The problems facing the processing industry are different from those facing the catching industry. At least the fish catching industry has been somewhat compensated, in that, with the shortage of fish, the prices have been higher. It is a simple law of the market. However, someone has had to pay the higher prices, and they have been paid by the fish processing industry.

The industry has tried to pass on the price increases to the consumer, but it has not worked. It has been impossible for the industry to recover all the increases that it has had to face. Last week, the Sea Fish Industry Authority produced its first assessment of consumers' response to higher prices. The SFIA carries out a regular survey. It says that the fishing industry is now meeting real consumer resistance to the high price that the consumer is having to pay for the product in supermarkets and fish shops. It is a serious problem, not only because fish, particularly in my part of the country, has been a staple part of the diet for as many years as anybody can remember, but also because it is being forced into the luxury price bracket. Haddock is now more expensive in many areas than prime steak. That is appalling.

The Government ritually suggest that the industry should solve the problem by importing fish. I visited a factory recently, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson), where we saw the effects of that advice. It is a modern, highly automated factory. It has the best machinery, and it follows good hygiene practices. However, it has been forced to import about 75 per cent. of its fish, most of which comes from Canada and Newfoundland. I do not know what the implications are for the balance of trade, but it is a serious problem for all of us.

Not every fish processing company has the appropriate technology. They do not have the freezing capacity, or the capacity to process and then re-freeze fish. The bulk of the businesses in my area are small, so many of them do not have access to it. For them, such a possibility is unrealistic.

The trends are worrying. The capacity to process fish is being reduced. That happened 10 years ago when herring stocks were so badly devastated that the industry had a nil total allowable catch. The processing capacity was therefore completely lost to the industry. At one time, Aberdeen had a huge herring processing industry, but now it has none. Yesterday I checked the position with the local fish merchants and found that some 12,000 boxes were available in the three main Grampian markets. That was a glut on the market, compared with the usual 5,000 or 6,000 boxes during the summer.

Most of the fish were very small, at the lower end of the market. The majority were unsold because nobody had the capacity to process them. That fish was wasted. It ended up in the fish meal factory rather than on the consumer's plate, where it should have been. We are losing our capacity as a result of the problems faced by the industry. If things go on as they are, we shall be unable to cope with any upturn in the industry, and that will affect many other businesses.

There is great uncertainty about the hygiene regulations. When he winds up I should appreciate it if the Minister would say something to dispel some of the uncertainty. We were told initially that the regulations would come into force in 1992. We have seen drafts; we know what we shall be required to do. However, it is not clear whether the regulations will be applied with immediate effect or whether they are to be phased in. I hear that there is the possibility of 1995 being the final date for implementation. The industry is very concerned. It faces considerable investment if it is to get itself up to standard to meet the hygiene regulations.

Last week, it was announced that just over £2 million in European Community grants is to be made available to fish processors in the Grampian region. That represents about 30 per cent. of the investment that will be necessary by the group of processors who have been lucky enough to win these grants. They will have to provide 65 per cent. of the investment. The Government are providing only 5 per cent. That gives some idea of the scale of the investment that is necessary—some £10 million for a very small group of processors.

It is a tremendous achievement that Grampian regional council, Aberdeen district council, Grampian Enterprise and its predecessor, the Scottish Development Agency, as well as local industry have been able to secure these grants. The industry has planned ahead, mainly through the Aberdeen sea food project, and is in the forefront of technology. At the same time, however, it is faced with this difficult squeeze: the question of supplies, the problem of the price of the product, consumer resistance and the very high levels of investment that are necessary. However, it is struggling through.

The industry faces a number of difficulties. One of the major problems is the very strong feeling that it is not allowed to operate on a level playing field. For example, Aberdeen district council is keen to enforce the hygiene regulations. It rigorously enforces the current regulations and wants to do the same with the new regulations. However, the regulations are less rigorously imposed in other parts of the country. I have heard tales of some local authorities that allow fish processing to take place in the open air. That has all sorts of hygiene implications. It means that the processor who does not invest, who takes a backward view of the industry, who does not have the overheads that those who adopt a much more enlightened attitude incur can easily undercut those in my constituency, and others, who have taken on this massive investment burden.

I return to my original point—the lack of a Government strategy for the industry. All that is obvious about the Government's strategy is its absence. Fish is an important and healthy food. It is important to our local and national economies. There is no sign, however, that the Government recognise that fact.

The aims must be very clear to the Government. They are clear to the Opposition. We need to slim down our catching capacity for traditional species. We also need to modernise the processing industry and to market fish once more as an attractive and affordable food. However, the Government seem to have opted out of decision making. They refuse to give a lead over the decommissioning scheme. They seek to push that responsibility on to the fishing industry instead of putting forward a positive scheme of their own.

The fragile sensibilities of the Secretary of State for Scotland and his embarrassment over the previous scheme are much more important to him than the future of the fishing industry. His actions have affected the election results. Before the 1983 election the Conservative party held five out of six seats in Grampian. The most recent by-election has resulted in the Conservative party holding no seats in the Grampian region. The tragedy is that——

Mr. Wilson: —it has no more to lose.

Mr. Doran: Certainly. It has more seats to lose in other parts of the country, but I take my hon. Friend's point.

The tragedy is that the industry is paying the price for this Government's incompetence.

8.58 pm

Mr. Neville Trotter (Tynemouth): It is interesting to reflect, particularly today, that we are considering an industry that is more controlled by Europe than perhaps any other. It is hardly an example of a well-managed industry. I appreciate the problems. It is sometimes difficult to achieve international co-operation—even at times between Scotland and England. Something as complex as the fishing industry is bound to present difficulties. There is some good news, with the best haddock stocks for 12 years. That shows what has been achieved with a restriction of effort in the past.

A 200 day tie-up would be disastrous. I was encouraged to hear my hon. Friend the Minister suggest that that was simply an opening gambit in Brussels. It would be quite unacceptable to go for such a tie-up. I do not regard tie-up as a solution. It is a ridiculous misuse of assets to have capital tied up in a boat that is not being used. The answer must be to bring the capacity of the fleet into line with the stocks available.

Like the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) I welcomed the way in which my hon. Friend the Minister met myself and colleagues from both sides of the House and showed that he does not have a closed mind on decommissioning. I accept that decommissioning is not in itself a solution, but it is an essential part of a package to deal with the serious problem facing the industry. I was encouraged by my hon. Friend's remarks on that occasion and I believe that we shall see such a scheme introduced in due course.

I should like to deal with some technical points. The twin trawl rig is highly detrimental to the stocks of prawns on the north-east coast of England and I hope that we shall see a ban on that. It is self-evident that there is a need for a one-net rule, as the opportunities for cheating and the difficulties of enforcement are obvious. I am told that there is now a device for heat sealing around the knots of larger mesh nets which reduces their aperture. Apparently, that is legal, but I suggest that it needs attention.

Some people in the fishing industry are concerned solely with the short term and, with the financial pressures upon them, they have no regard to the future and will take whatever they can. That could result in black landings, to which Opposition Members have referred. Most fishermen are sensible people. They think of the future and have sons to follow them. They wish to see stocks preserved. It is important that the restrictions put before them are acceptable. That is the key to the success of whatever proposals we make.

The point about sons following their fathers leads me on to the future of the north coast commercial salmon fishery. It is a traditional industry that goes back at least 100 years. The first record of licensing that I can find occurred in 1867. That industry is now threatened with being phased out, with no new licences being granted and fathers no longer being able to hand on their licences to their sons.

I have read the report on the review of salmon fishing. It is a thick document of well over 100 pages. However, having read it from cover to cover, I have found no scientific evidence to support the proposals being made by Ministers. Those proposals are of great consequence to local fishing on the north-east coast of England. It will have consequences far beyond the catch of salmon. The pattern of fishing on the north-east coast is one of intermingling of fishing from season to season. The refusal to allow salmon fishing would have a detrimental effect on the livelihood of many people who are traditionally dependent on that industry.

It is hard to explain why there is no proposal for a similar phasing out of the Scottish commercial fishery. I know that that has been reduced and that the fishery has been bought out to some extent. Why is there commercial buying out of fisheries in Scotland, but no similar proposal in England?

Mr. Bill Walker: Drift netting in Scotland has been banned for years.

Mr. Trotter: I know that, but there are other methods of commercial fishing. On the Tay, which is the local river of my hon. Friend the Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker), over 75 per cent. of salmon are caught by commercial fishermen and only 25 per cent. are caught by anglers. If anything is to be done to deal with commercial fishing, my hon. Friend should start by looking on his doorstep at his local river and not down the coast at us.

Mr. Walker: While my hon. Friend is being so complimentary, he might say who stocks the river with salmon.

Mr. Trotter: I am not sure whether some of the 250,000 salmon that are put into the Tyne eventually find their way into the Tay. I am not sufficiently au fait with the migratory habits of that fish.

The salmon is not a factory product; it depends on nature. The research that I have seen shows that the climate, the problems of temperature and the movement of natural foodstocks in the sea are important factors in deciding the quantity of salmon available.

I have referred to stocking on the Tyne. I am not sure to what extent that method is followed in other rivers. It seems an excellent idea that all rivers where there is angling should be required to produce their own stocks in the way that we do. It is fallacious to suggest that reducing commercial fishing would necessarily increase the number of young salmon breeding on the rivers. If the river is already sufficiently stocked, that will not increase its stock because there is only a certain amount of breeding material available in the natural environment. Therefore, however many more mature fish come into the river, that will not lead to a significant increase in the number of young fish. The subject is complex, but I do not believe that there is evidence in the report from which the conclusion can be drawn that commercial fishing should be phased out.

Other major issues affecting salmon have not been referred to, such as the effect of seals. It is said that each seal eats two tonnes of fish a year. I do not suppose that seals eat only salmon, but in the north-east of England many of their meals are salmon. Why is it not being suggested that something should be done to prevent this misuse of salmon? I suppose that if a fish is caught by an angler or a commercial fisherman, at least it is a good human use, but that cannot be said of the fish that are wasted in the stomachs of seals.

The report does not mention poaching. It is suggested by other sources that poaching on some rivers in Scotland is higher than their total declared catch. What is being done about that?

Mr. Wilson: That is an interesting point, but there is more than one kind of poacher. Does the hon. Gentleman share my view that it is absurd that there is no legal obligation on the owners of rivers to declare their catches, far less to declare them accurately, to the Scottish Office?

Mr. Trotter: I was intrigued to find that more than 3,000 tickets were issued to anglers on one river, but not one catch was recorded. They must have been pretty inefficient fishermen. I take the hon. Gentleman's point, which he made well.

One of the effects of a licensed industry off our coast is an effective system of policing. The National Rivers Authority's boats regularly patrol the coast, but there is no better policeman than the fisherman, who will report any infringement. We have far less poaching in our area than is to be found in other areas.

The industry is closely controlled, well managed and limited. There are restrictions on weekends, on hours and days and on night-time fishing and the number of licences has been significantly reduced. It is interesting that netting does not start until May, unlike angling, which starts in February. Angling goes on while the spawning season is at its height, whereas netting does not start until the spawning season is over. That point should be considered by the inquiry.

The effects of north coast fishing on the Scottish catch is estimated to be only 7 per cent. In other words, if there were no netting off the north-east coast of England, there would be an increase of 7 per cent. in salmon in Scotland, which is not a significant increase. The argument about who has the best right to the salmon is interesting. Why should an angler have a better right to catch it than a commercial fisherman? The salmon is dead whoever catches it. I cannot agree that it is better that the salmon should be caught in one way rather than the other, and the effects on Scottish rivers are in any case insignificant.

Much could be done to improve stocks. River quality could be improved, obstacles could be removed from rivers, more fish could be inserted from local breeding, effective limits could be placed on poaching and commercial fishing at the mouths of Scottish rivers could be reduced, in the same way as is mistakenly proposed for my area. The National Rivers Authority has been asked to phase out the industry over a period of years. The authority should carry out its own research and reach its own conclusions on the basis of its own judgment. I hope that it will take that advice.

I ask my hon. Friend whether he can clarify the position for next year. It is physically and practically impossible to start phasing out by them. I do not want a phasing out and I hope that we shall resist it successfully. Will my hon. Friend assure me that a net limitation order will be introduced for next year so that there can be some understanding as soon as possible about what the position will be? I suggest that there should be a delay of perhaps five years while the NRA produces its own evidence and arrives at its own conclusion.

9.9 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): As the Parliamentary Secretary suggested, the nature of these debates is that we rightly consider the impact of European Community proposals on various fishing communities around our coast. The hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter), although talking about measures that did not arise out of the EC documents, raised an important issue for the north of England. The hon. Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) rightly drew attention to the difficulties that fishermen in his area have had in trying to encourage the Government to give more help to the hand-line fishermen. My hon. Friend the Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) has bent my ear about that issue and he has pointed out that it is a conservation-friendly method which probably deserves greater support from the Government.

Various total allowable catches are subjects for discussion this evening. We welcomed the fact that, in several respects, the Parliamentary Secretary said that he and his colleagues would go to Brussels to try to negotiate improvements. I draw his attention especially to the TACs for cod, haddock, whiting and saithe in the west of Scotland where there appears to be increasing pressure to reduce the TACs. Some emphasis must be given to an increase in those TACs

The nephrops TAC in the North sea, if it is to be introduced at all, would be better applied on a geographically sectoral basis rather than as a TAC for the whole of the North sea. For the channel stocks of cod and whiting, there is a proposed reduction in an essentially precautionary TAC. The industry would very much welcome efforts made at this stage to increase that to the 1991 levels so that it does not face again the problem of recent years when Ministers have had to go back for a half-yearly review.

Many hon. Members have expressed considerable alarm and concern about the proposal that there should be what is effectively a 200 day tie-up. The hon. Member for St. Ives euphemistically referred to it as effort limitation. I welcomed the fact that the Minister said that the Government would not accept the proposal and that they would negotiate it downwards at the Council of Ministers meeting next week.

As the hon. Member for Tynemouth said, it is perfectly clear that the proposal would tie up working capital for a substantial part of the year. It would be almost impossible for anyone to suggest such a proposal for any other industry. It is a staggering proposal, especially as many of the fishermen concerned have laid out or borrowed substantial sums to invest in their boats and in their gear. They need adequate opportunities to fish if they are to be able to meet their financial commitments. There will have to be rigorous negotiations. We look to Ministers to show as much enthusiasm in negotiating against the proposal as the Prime Minister showed in negotiating against the social chapter yesterday at Maastricht.

Ministers can put forward several arguments. The scientific evidence suggests that this year's tie-up of eight days for each of 11 months—88 days in total—was not especially effective in conservation. An increase in the TAC for North sea haddock is proposed for 1992 and that may suggest that there is less need for a tie-up in 1992 than there has been in 1991.

We also have a compulsory 90 mm square mesh—it has been unilaterally imposed by the United Kingdom since July. From the middle of next year, the minimum mesh size will be 100 mm. Those limits are imposed in an effort to reduce landings of small cod and haddock.

One hopes that that will lead to an improvement in stocks. It reinforces the argument that there will be less need for effort limitation in the forthcoming year. There are arguments that Ministers can marshall on the subject —we wish them every success in trying to negotiate against the proposal.

If we are realistic it may dawn on us that some measure of effort limitation in the final package is inevitable, and that we must face the idea of a gear option. I realise that that idea is not universally popular in the industry, but the precedent for a gear option was set in 1991.

If we wish to divert activity away from the traditional north seas fisheries of cod and haddock to new species —for example, monkfish, ling and redfish—a gear option would allow such diversification, while putting less strain on the North sea species whose stocks are pressurised.

In developing alternative fisheries, much will have to be done to develop a market for new species—to encourage consumer demand for them. Ultimately, that would lead to greater consumer choice, but marketing will be necessary to introduce the new species; furthermore, there will be an incentive for fishermen to use larger mesh sizes if they are allowed a derogation from any tie-up rules.

Perhaps the strongest opposition to a gear option has come from the Scottish White Fish Producers Organisation. If that organisation said that it was against the option because it did not want a loophole in the law, I would agree. It would be wrong, and would defeat the purpose of allowing a gear option, if it was intended simply to provide a loophole, but I know that in some cases south of the border this year, as a result of the gear option there have been landings of larger sizes in certain categories and classes of fish. That seems to suggest that in 1991 the gear option has had at least some effect.

If the Commission and the Government propose a concession, it is not unreasonable to attach strings to it to ensure that it is not a loophole but a genuine means of conservation. It could be tied to higher minimum landing sizes, or we could insist that vessels undertaking the option may be allowed to land only certain class sizes of haddock and cod.

I welcome the Minister's reassurance about his intention to negotiate against the 200 day tie-up. Perhaps the Minister of State, Scottish Office could say more about the Government's position on gear options when he replies.

This is an opportunity to examine the technical conservation measures suggested and implemented at the Council of Ministers meeting in October. The 100 mm mesh size has attracted considerable criticism. There is disapointment that in the negotiations it was not possible to incorporate into the EC requirements any reference to square mesh panels. Many people who at the outset were sceptical about their use have found that the trials have proved them to be an effective means of eliminating the smaller fish.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House agree that one sure way of assisting conservation is to reduce the number of discards. The wastefulness of discards strikes all of us. We do not claim that the square mesh panel is the ultimate solution, but those who have used and tested it agree that it can make a worthwhile contribution. It would perhaps have been useful to have had the option of the 100 mm diamond and the 90 mm square mesh panel. I hope that the Government have not lost sight of that and will be prepared to argue for it in future.

Linked to the proposals put forward in October, there has been considerable dismay about the derogation for the whiting fishery. Many people feel that it is unenforceable to have a separate 90 mm mesh size for whiting as long as one does not have a one-net rule. The arrangements are open to abuse, as is widely recognised. I accept, however, that some communities depend heavily on a whiting fishery. If there is to be a derogation on net size, it should perhaps be linked to size of vessel—for example, one might specify vessels of under 400. That would give greater control than the proposal on the table.

It has been said in every fisheries debate in the past three or four years that everything comes back to why the Government have not introduced a decommissioning system. It can be argued with considerable force that the debates that we had last year on the eight day tie-up and the debates this year on the proposed 200 day tie-up would not have taken place—and certainly would not have engendered the same passion and anger in the industry —if, two or three years ago, the Government had grasped the nettle and introduced a well-targeted and well-funded decommissioning scheme.

The hon. Member for Tynemouth blamed the European Community for much of the crisis in the European fishing industry. It is fair to say that, in this case, the EC has made available the funds to finance a decommissioning scheme: it is the British Government who have not been prepared to take advantage of that scheme and implement it for our United Kingdom fishermen. Instead of a permanent reduction in the size and capacity of the fleet, we have had what might be termed a temporary reduction through various ad hoc tie-up schemes. That cannot be good for the long-term stability of the fleet and, in many cases, leads to working capital being tied up in a most unacceptable way.

We have heard the argument again tonight that decommissioning would not enhance conservation, but one argument in favour of decommissioning is that those who are left in the industry have a better opportunity to make a worthwhile living. That fact should not be overlooked. With decommissioning, one is not—as is the case with the eight day tie-up rule—forcing people to go out and fish in circumstances that are often hazardous and constitute a danger to their well-being.

As has already been hinted in the debate, many of us feel that the blind spot really lies with the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, who had his fingers burnt when the last decommissioning scheme was introduced and was rapped on the knuckles by the Public Accounts Committee. It should not be forgotten, however, that, in its report, the PAC did not dismiss decommissioning schemes altogether—it merely dismissed that introduced by the right hon. Gentleman. I hope that he will be able to overcome that inhibition.

One can only speculate, but it would appear that the right hon. Gentleman alone is the block on the road to a decommissioning scheme, which is widely recognised throughout the industry and on both sides of the House as necessary. On more than one occasion, the fishing industry has indicated its willingness to sit down with the Government to discuss how such a scheme might be targeted. I hope that, in the new year, the Government will take up the industry's offer. If the lead Ministry had been the Scottish Office rather than the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, that might have happened.

We are all very conscious that the 1992 review is upon us. It may well be concluded during the British presidency of the Community in the second half of next year. This is the first fisheries debate since the sad death of Alick Buchanan-Smith, who always made a valuable contribution to such debates. In the Scottish Grand Committee on 13 July 1989, he said that he began "to wonder, where the preponderance of the industry is north of the border, whether, in the same way as forestry, the Secretary of State for Scotland ought not to consider taking the lead."—[Official Report, Scottish Grand Committee, 13 July 1989; c. 62-63.]

That was a considered view from someone who had held office in MAFF and was part of the negotiations in respect of the common fisheries policy in 1983. The Government should take that view to heart.

Having said that, I want to compliment the Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, the hon. Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) on the conciliatory way in which he opened the debate. Obviously a lesson has been learnt from previous occasions. I place on record my thanks to him for the vigour with which he pursued the minimum import price for farmed salmon after representations from me and my constituents in September. That may not be the complete answer, but the move was welcome. I am aware of the vigour with which the Minister pursued that policy.

Continuing this congratulatory vein, in respect of the pelagic side and the negotiations with Norway on mackerel, it appears that the year-by-year encroachment of the Norwegians into the share of North sea mackerel has been halted. Perhaps that can form the basis for a longer-term arrangement on mackerel.

As Norway has agreed to flexibility west of 4 deg west, I hope, as in previous years, that the Minister will be able to negotiate that flexibility with the Council, perhaps up to the 62,000 tonnes allowed. The decision taken earlier this year to allow 45,000 tonnes of mackerel to be klondyked in Lerwick has benefited my constituents. I have pressed for that, together with the local industry, for some time and I give credit where credit is due.

While I am prepared to offer congratulations this evening, real congratulations would be in order when a Minister announces at the Dispatch Box that at long last the Government have seen sense and are prepared to embark on a decommissioning scheme for the fishing industry.

9.26 pm

Mr. John Townend (Bridlington): The suggestion of the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) that the Scottish Office should have more influence on fishing policy will not be welcomed by English fishermen. The feeling is that the Scots have had too big a slice of the cake so far.

The fishermen of Bridlington are dependent on one species—North sea cod. The fisherman's lot is not a happy one. The common fisheries policy has been a complete failure. It has been a disaster for the country, for the fishing industry and for conservation. Those Opposition Members who talk about increasing EC competence should consider carefully the record of the fishing industry.

For 15 years the industry has had its fishing restricted by quotas which were supposedly based on scientific evidence. If the policy had worked, we should have been able progressively to increase those quotas and stocks should have increased. The reverse has happened. Stocks have grown smaller and quotas have been reduced progressively year after year.

If quotas worked and were an effective way of conserving stocks, why must we consider tying up boats? For a long time the industry has claimed that quotas are inefficient because of the effect of discards and because many foreign Governments do not ensure that their fishermen abide by the quotas. I have to say that some fishermen in the United Kingdom do not always abide by those quotas.

As a method of management, we do not need quotas; we need effective conservation. The Bridlington fishermen have for many years been calling for smaller mesh sizes. At long last we have a 100 mm mesh size, but that is too little, too late. Even now, it is left to Britain unilaterally to require square mesh panels to be fitted to certain nets. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) that a one-net rule is long overdue.

Industrial fishing should be banned completely. I cannot understand why the Community has never agreed to banning fishing in breeding grounds while the fish are spawning. I was pleased to hear my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth refer to seals in connection with Scotch salmon. It is a fact that seals eat an enormous amount of fish. The Norwegians are worried about the effect of seals on their fish stocks in the Baring sea. We should seriously consider reducing the number of seals in the North sea.

Regrettably, the EEC is still concentrating on restricting fishing rather than on conserving fish. I agree with hon. Members of all parties who have said that the current proposal to force boats to tie up for 200 days a year is ridiculous. How can any business survive if it does not use its capital assets for more than half the year? If a factory owner was required to do that, the receivers would be in before one would have a chance to say Jack Robinson——

Mr. Harris: Or Robert Maxwell.

Mr. Townend: Absolutely.

Although we have had some reassurance from the Minister, this proposal is made worse because there is no specific provision for the gear option. I am pleased that the Government have said that they will oppose those proposals, but I fear that we face the same prospect as last year of having our ships tied up.

The Government must also fight to keep the total allowable catch for cod above the Hague preference in the interests of English fishermen. I agree with the suggestion that the Government should stop our annual gift of 400 tonnes of cod a year to the Danes. I know that we get a swap—I believe that we receive haddock in return—[Interruption.] Well, I am told by my fishermen that we do, but the benefit of the haddock goes to the Scots. If we had not given away those 400 tonnes this year, the fishermen of Bridlington would probably have been able to fish until the end of the year.

My next question to the Minister again reveals the nonsense of the EEC's fisheries policy. I refer to the case of the Spanish trawlers which we lost in the European Court. Their actions have been confirmed as legal, but the court's decision undermined the Merchant Shipping Act 1988, which was passed by this House specifically to protect British fishermen. I presume that what the Spanish are doing, the French, Italians and Portuguese could do also. I should be grateful if the Minister would tell the House what he intends to do about that serious and appalling threat to the British fishing industry.

I should like to add my thanks to those of my colleagues for the efforts of the Minister, my hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry). Throughout his period of office, he has taken more cognisance of the interests of English fishermen than any other Minister for some years. Since the decline of the Humber ports, the English fishing industry has been the poor relation of the fishing industry. The interests of the Scots fishermen tend to be given preference. Therefore, we welcome my hon. Friend's support, and long may it continue.

I am also pleased that the Government are now seriously considering decommissioning grants. I believe them when they say that. That is important. My fishermen also feel that boats of less than 10m should be licensed. I am pleased to learn that the Government are paying serious attention to that matter also.

I began by saying that a fisherman's lot is not a happy one. We must pay serious consideration to the future of our fishing industry. It is not unfair for our fishermen to comment on the amount of help that farming receives. Farming and fisheries are looked after by the same Ministry. The industry is suffering and fishermen deserve more consideration than they are getting relative to farmers.

9.34 pm

Mr. Calum Macdonald (Western Isles): I was disappointed that the Parliamentary Secretary did not refer to the shellfish ban that hit the Scottish industry over the weekend. Although it was lifted after only a day, the ban sent a nasty shiver down the spine of the industry in Scotland. It could have had devastating implications if it had remained in place. I hope that we shall hear something about it in the reply to the debate.

The ban is over, but it generated much bad publicity. We need to know urgently what lay behind it. Where did the confusion arise? Was it in Brussels or at the Scottish Office? We need answers from the Department. It reinforces the call made repeatedly by my hon. Friend the Member for Cunningham, North (Mr. Wilson) for monitoring to be tightened. The ban should be a lesson to us.

My hon. Friend the Member for Aberdeen, South (Mr. Doran) mentioned the impact of the hygiene regulations on processors throughout Scotland. The regulations emanate not just from the Community but from national legislation. The Government's food hygiene regulations have potential consequences, particularly for small processors who will have to spend much money to bring their facilities up to the required standards.

The regulations particularly affect small processors on the west coast. Their smallness of scale does not exempt them from any of the regulations, because, generally, their business is export-oriented. I understand that Highlands and Islands Enterprise is undertaking a survey of the processing industry to find out the full financial impact. I hope that, when that survey is completed, the Scottish Office will come forward with the assistance and funding which will be required by smaller processors who are already under-capitalised. They will need help to get them through the transition period into the new conditions set by the much more stringent hygiene regulations.

On the west coast there has been a failure over the years to add to the value of the primary product—the fish caught off the coast. It is crucial to maintain the processing outlets and the facilities that we already have if the communities there are to derive full benefit from the natural resources that lie on their doorstep.

The development of the fishery industry on the west coast is vital for a region that has few other resources and sources of income. The local authority in my constituency has recently suffered the devastating impact of the collapse of BCCI, which will affect the economy of the whole area. It makes it all the more important that we maximise the value of those few industries, such as fishing, which are already there.

A recent report by the Fraser of Allander Institute, commissioned by the Western Isles council and partly financed by the Scottish Office, stressed the future potential of west coast fisheries, especially those further off the west coast of the Hebrides. It is vital that communities on the west coast should be capable of taking advantage of that potential. A number of measures have to be put in place if that is to happen.

The west coast fleet has to be renovated—it is aging, and the fishing community generally lacks the capital resources which would enable it to renovate the fleet by itself. One of the consequences of the Government's failure to tackle the gross over-tonnage in the United Kingdom fishing industry is that the opportunity to renovate the west coast fleet has been missed.

The European Community identified the west coast as a vital area for the provision of such support and was prepared to give preferential support to the west coast fishing industries. That support has dried up because of the Government's failure to establish control over the size of the United Kingdom fleet. Wherever else the overcapacity in the United Kingdom fishing fleet, it is surely not on the west coast. Therefore, it is unjust that the west coast should have been caught up in the problem in that way.

The west coast has a strong interest in the Government's introducing, as a matter of urgency, a decommissioning scheme, which will help to reduce the over-tonnage and thus begin to release funds for the desperately needed renovation of the industry on the west coast. If the decommissioning scheme is not to compound the way in which the west coast has been caught up in the problem, it must be finely targeted to ensure that larger, and not smaller, ships come out of the United Kingdom fleet.

Another plank in the development of the west coast industry has to be a comprehensive programme to develop infrastructure there, especially pier infrastructure. The examples of Kallin and Berneray in my constituency, which have received funding—especially from the

[Mr. Calum Macdonald]

Community—in the recent past, show what can be done with proper pier development. The piers have provided a shot in the arm for the fishing industry in those areas. The same could happen throughout the Western Isles, provided the Scottish Office was prepared to put its weight behind that sort of infrastructure programme.

The Western Isles council has already made a submission to the Scottish Office, asking for specific help to develop at least four new piers in the Hebrides. That is exactly the type of programme that the Scottish Office should urgently consider, especially in the context of the troubles which are affecting the Hebrides economy because of the collapse of the Bank of Credit and Commerce International.

Funding is also urgently needed to develop the processing sector on the west coast, especially in the Hebrides. If the islands and fishing communities are to derive maximum benefit from the natural resources on their doorstep, they must be able to add more value to the product.

Neither an infrastructure programme, nor the renovation of the fleet will be effective unless there are fish to be caught. Therefore the third, and perhaps the most important, element of a development strategy must be timely conservation measures.

I welcome the new consultation document on shellfish issued by the Scottish Office. Once the consultations have been concluded, I urge the Minister to act quickly on the recommendations. I particularly favour the concept of a ban on twin rig trawling on the west coast, and increasing minimum landing sizes, both of which would find favour among fishermen on the west coast.

However, I am disappointed that the consultation document did not put sufficient emphasis on the possibility of a weekend ban. I urge the Scottish Office yet again to consider that, because a weekend ban would be effective, would be supported by all fishermen on the west coast and would cost no money to introduce or enforce. A further potential advantage would be to help solve some of the problems caused by submarine activity on the west coast, which is causing the Ministry of Defence such a headache, as well as being a hazard to fishermen working off the west coast. A weekend ban may allow some submarine activity to be targeted into weekends, thereby avoiding conflict and collisions.

With the prospect of a 200 day tie-up and a massive shift of shipping effort from the east to the west coast, the need for conservation measures on the west coast becomes all the greater. I urge the Scottish Office to look again at the case for a weekend ban, to listen to the ideas put forward by the industry, and to introduce a ban as quickly as possible.

Mr. David Porter (Waveney): Although things change in fishing, as in any other industry, I feel that we are travelling familiar waters tonight. We are gathered here a little before Christmas to perform our annual fishing industry pre-ministerial Council season's service—that litany of woe from every corner of the kingdom—telling of sad tidings of discomfort and no joy in the industry. In fact, the position is not as bad as in the recent past, but we are still not there yet, because there is no question but that any extra cuts in quotas must mean hardship.

I suspect that we all know our lines—we have heard several of them repeated tonight—and, like a pantomime by a well-loved local drama group, we fishing industry Members of Parliament will perform well in this packed House. I am sorry that that old favourite, the very nauseating tie usually worn by the hon. Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Mitchell), is not with us, although the hon. Gentleman has just arrived. The band of bleating chorus from Scotland is present, with its regular melody, played on the strings of our hearts, about how bad things are north of the border. It gives Conservative Members the occasional chance to shout a seasonal "humbug" or two.

All may be well in the Chamber because we are on familiar ground, but outside in the real world of fish markets and the North sea, all is not fully well. For the past year or so, all hon. Members except my hon. Friends on the Front Bench have sung from the same hymn book about decommissioning. This year, I am delighted that my hon. Friends have at least found the same page of the hymn book.

In Lowestoft and elsewhere, the industry wants a voluntary decommissioning scheme. Those who choose to risk their lives earning a living at sea do not want to be forced to give up, but they are realists and they do not want to go bankrupt either. They want an effective, properly policed scheme for the whole industry which compensates enough to pay off debts and is still worth while.

Equally, nobody to whom I have spoken thinks that decommissioning is a magic wand. We have all mouthed the phrase, "It must be part of a package of conservation measures." Let us remember that everything for which we legislate is for worse cases and blanket rules. There are enormous regional differences in the fishing industry and they must be recognised. So we should extend licensing and do all that is necessary to reduce the fleet enough to start to modernise it before it is too late.

There have been some welcome additions to the Lowestoft fleet. It is a supreme act of faith by Colne Shipping of Lowestoft, but the additional boats are secondhand rather than new-built. The safety implications of an aging English fleet are frightening. A 200 day tie-up, even when fishermen can take the days when they want, totally ignores the issue of how they are supposed to live and make all that investment worth while. Therefore, I wish my hon. Friend well in reducing the 200-day period.

The horse trading, or rather fish trading, that takes place at the Council meetings and other times—the talks with EFTA and the quota swaps—are all very well and sometimes seem to work to our advantage. The EFTA deal, which includes extra tonnage of north-east arctic cod, seems to do so, but there is a fear that, when the common fisheries policy comes up for review and renewal, the wheeling and dealing over fish then will make Maastricht this week look like a teddy bears' picnic. The fear is that we as a country in general, and Lowestoft in particular, will lose on quota swaps, as my hon. Friend the Minister acknowledged.

The package that the Fisheries Ministers will hammer out next week is just one more step on the way to that review. Perhaps next year or the year after we shall consider abandoning minimum sizes, landing everything and taking everything off catch quotas for each boat in order to abolish discards. Each boat would then be licensed by horsepower for a set number of days at sea based on a three-year track record.

Perhaps next year we shall discuss flagship problems and decide that each boat must belong to a producers' or other organisation, which is then allocated a quota from the United Kingdom TAC. That would mean, to quote one of my fishermen who suggested the proposal, "Johnny foreigner cannot get any more of our British quota." Perhaps we shall be saying that Brussels should operate a scrapping scheme, with Her Majesty's Government as local agents.

We cannot know what we shall be discussing next year or the year after at this time. However, we know that tonight's motion, which has produced some disappointingly negative amendments from the Opposition, should be approved to give my hon. Friend the Minister a good send-off to Brussels, with the motion ringing in his ears. Whether we should send him off with a shove in his rear and a pair of boxed ears does not matter. He knows that he has to return with a deal, a scheme, a package that treats the scientific advice seriously but can also be swallowed by the industry. It must be even-handed in the way in which it reduces effort, understandable, believeable and flexible enough to be realistic.

I know that that is a tall order, but my hon. Friend the Minister knows that, whatever he returns with from Brussels, on 1 January the fishing industry—with its quotas, effort curbs, mesh reductions, days at sea, inspections, boardings, paperwork, Health and Safety Executive rules, fuel bills, interest rates and mortgages to meet—will still be the most regulated industry in this country. In addition, it has to cope with a basic shortage of fish. It is even more regulated than the nuclear industry, at a time when all that fishermen want to do, and all that they ask to do, is catch and sell fish. I wish my hon. Friend the Minister good luck next week.

9.53 pm

Mr. John D. Taylor (Strangford): This is always an important debate, coming as it does a week or so before the Fisheries Council meeting in Brussels. I speak on behalf of the fishermen at Portavogie in my constituency. Northern Ireland has a sizeable fishing industry that employs over 2,500 people—more than 1,000 on the boats and 1,000 in the processing plants. There are nearly 250 boats in the three harbours of Portavogie, Ardglass and Kilkeel. The industry is worth about £25 million to our rural economy. I stress that it is a "rural" economy as there are few alternatives for employment in the regions of the fishing ports.

Earlier the Minister mentioned the deaths that have occurred in the fishing industry during the past year. We in the Ulster Unionist party agree with what he said. While on the subject of fatalities in the fishing industry, I mention the problem of submarines, which has attracted the attention of many of our Scottish colleagues in the House. There have been gestures towards solving the problem in the Clyde. We in Northern Ireland want the problem in the Irish sea to be tackled. It is not sufficient to stop at the Clyde as the problem exists in the Irish sea. There has been contact between our fishing boats and—if one may use the word these days—Soviet, American and our own Royal Navy submarines.

Quotas are hurtful. When I participated in this debate a year ago I stressed that quotas in 1991 would be disastrous for the Northern Ireland fishing industry—regrettably, that has proved absolutely true. However, fishermen are responsible. I have had recent meetings with my fishermen in Portavogie and they certainly accept the need for quotas, as long as they are reasonable and based on the real situation in the waters. Sometimes they find that their views are totally at variance with scientific evidence upon which the quotas have been decided.

This year, as a result of the quotas, there has been a decline in the tonnage landed in Northern Ireland and the value of the fish. There was even a fall in the price of nephrops because boats from other areas began to concentrate on catching nephrops and transferred from their previous catch. That created greater competition for our fishing industry whose main catch is nephrops. We accept that the fleet must be reduced, but it must be assisted to reduce.

I was pleased to hear the Minister say that he was concerned at the effect of last year's quotas and the introduction of the Hague preference on the Northern Ireland fishing industry. On behalf of Northern Ireland's fishermen, may I say that we respect what he said in that context? The Hague preference worked badly against Northern Ireland fishermen. I heard it explained in the debate that the Hague preference was introduced by Mr. Garret FitzGerald. That means that we dislike it even more in Northern Ireland and now realise why it worked so much to the advantage of southern Irish fishermen during 1991.

It is important to note how that preference worked. The Republic of Ireland was given a cod quota of 5,450 tonnes and used only 1,500 tonnes. Its quota for whiting was 4,700 tonnes and it used only 1,600 tonnes. The same applied to nephrops, which, as I said, are very important for Northern Ireland. The Republic of Ireland got a much bigger quota than it needed and kindly transferred tonnes to Northern Ireland. When we were running out of our quota in October, some of us wrote to the Minister for the Marine, Mr. John Wilson, in Dublin and I subsequently spoke to him on the telephone. As a result of those representations, the Republic of Ireland swapped 400 tones of its nephrops quota to Northern Ireland fishermen. That was equivalent to a month's work in Northern Ireland and we greatly appreciate that gesture by Dublin. That is what we want to see in the island of Ireland—co-operation, not interference.

We in Northern Ireland are already worried about the 1992 quotas, because the quota for cod is 10,000 tonnes, the quantity that we were allocated for 1991. There is no change at present. For whiting, the news is even worse. We are being offered 9,300 tonnes, a drop of 300 tonnes. The quota for plaice is 3,000 tonnes, a drop of 1,500 tonnes. If the quotas for 1991 were disastrous, those proposed for 1992 are criminal for Portavogie, Ardglass and Kilkeel. I have met fishermen in Portavogie who had to sell their boats this year. I have met others who could not pay their mortgages and had their houses repossessed. I had to help them move from their houses into rented accommodation. That is the sort of situation that is developing in our fishing areas.

I know from what the Minister said that he has taken on board the problem in Northern Ireland. I hope that, when he goes to Brussels, he will be successful in getting the suggested quotas increased for 1992 for area VIIa in the Irish sea which affects Northern Ireland fishermen.

I see that the Minister of State, Scottish Office, is beside the Minister on the Treasury Bench. It is a pity that once again there is no Northern Ireland Minister there. Are we to have yet another year during which the United Kingdom delegation to Brussels will have no Northern Ireland Office Minister representing us? How are we to have our view fully represented in Brussels if Northern Ireland Ministers do not take enough interest to be present in debates on fisheries and will not attend this quite important meeting in Brussels to decide the quotas for the coming year?

I have four small points about nephrops, which are our main catch in Northern Ireland. First, we want a ban on twin rig trawlers. We have had a consultation paper about the future of the nephrops fishery. I agree with much that was said by the hon. Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald), but the ban must be introduced as quickly as possible. Secondly, like him, many of the fishermen in Portavogie would give sympathetic and favourable consideration to a weekend closure for the nephrops fisheries.

Thirdly, we want a decommissioning scheme. That is one way forward and the Ulster Unionist party will be joining Her Majesty's official Opposition in the Lobby on that point. We need such a scheme to be introduced throughout the fishing industry in the United Kingdom. I am glad that, in the past six months, the Minister has made it clear that he no longer has a closed mind on the subject.

Finally, I make an appeal to the absent Minister with responsibility for fisheries in Northern Ireland. There is a new European Community scheme for rural areas, called the leader scheme, the purpose of which is to stimulate a Community-driven rural development programme in agricultural areas that are in decline. I should like to see some of the £4 million that has been allocated for the leader initiative used in Northern Ireland, not just where farming is in decline, but, by extending the scheme, to set up a pilot scheme for the fisheries industry. Naturally, I would recommend that the small town of Portavogie, where the fishing industry is in decline, be used as the centre for a trial of whether we can further inspire community development and create jobs in such an area.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It may help the House if I say that I understand that the first Front-Bench spokesman wishes to rise at 10.20 pm, so five-minute speeches would enable all hon. Members who wish to speak to do so.

10.1 pm

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Over the past year, fishing in the Irish sea has not been good. My port at Fleetwood has suffered quota restrictions, tie-ups and swaps. Most significant of all, it has suffered from over-fishing of some of the juvenile stock, within the 12-mile limit along the coast, from vessels that do not come from the local area. That has not been good for fishing in the north-west.

We must look closely at what we wish to do to ensure the level of fishing off the west coast that we have enjoyed in the past few years. Although that level was a decline over that of previous years, it has since been relatively static, and I for one would not wish it to decline any further. We must find some way over the medium term to increase the size of the stocks—that is, the size of biomass—and reduce the percentage of the stocks caught in a year. That has to be done by ensuring that we catch fewer juvenile fish and, at the same time, as several hon. Members have said, reduce the numbers of discards, which are an awful waste. We must continue to try to find ways to diminish the problem.

If we are to be successful, the first thing that we must do is improve the scientific information available. At the moment, much of the fishing community does not have a great deal of confidence in the scientific information that is provided. Often, quotas are restricted in an area one year, only to be increased the following year when, at sea, fishermen do not see the evidence to make them believe the figures coming from scientists. We have to find new ways to provide more accurate information on which we can do the calculations and, from those calculations, come up with better ways to ensure that we have a clearer run at fishing year by year and to make certain that we do not have such large variations.

On the preservation of stocks, which is the crux of the matter, we need to consider effort control. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to reject the idea of a 200 day tie-up. As other hon. Members have said, that is an incredibly inefficient form of effort control.

Like many hon. Members, I am pleased that the Government have not shut their mind to the idea of decommissioning. However, that must be part of a much wider attempt to reduce the amount of effort in fishing. We must consider net sizes and licensing boats below 10 m. However, I understand that there are significant administrative problems in making that work effectively.

Decommissioning should be part of a much wider conservation effort which we must consider. Decommissioning is a complicated subject. I was not being unduly critical of the hon. Member for Glanford and Scunthorpe (Mr. Morley) when I asked how he considered a decommissioning scheme should work. There is a balance to be struck here. We do not want a lot of modern vessels to be taken out, because, in many ways, that would put our industry at a significant disadvantage compared with the more modern fleets around Europe, but at the same time, we must ensure that a decommissioning scheme reduces the effort. That is a difficult problem which needs to be addressed if it is to operate effectively rather than be characterised by the mistakes that were made last time around.

Part of the problem is the way in which we police the fishing that takes place. I like the idea of introducing satellite transponders. In the coming years, there may even be an increased role for the Royal Air Force which has a number of aircraft with a considerable ability to detect vessels that are fishing where they ought not to be. However, the fishing industry should not have to bear the full cost of such an operation as has been the case in the past. There may well be an opportunity to ensure that in the future. Most important of all—and this has been emphasised by several hon. Members, the enforcement has to be EC-wide. There is little point in our having efficient enforcement methods for our own vessels if many other countries have a less efficient method.

The fishing industry must have a viable future. We need to consider ways of increasing the amount of fish that we land. Fish has a market in Britain and in Europe. Therefore, I hope that when my hon. Friend goes to Brussels he will bear those points in mind so that we can look towards 1992 being a better year for fishing, particularly off the north-west coast, than the past 12 months have been.

10.8 pm

Mr. Alex Salmond (Banff and Buchan): I understand your strictures on time, Mr. Speaker, but I would be a great deal more sympathetic to them if the Front-Bench spokesman had not taken 50 minutes to open the debate.

I shall restrict myself to three points. The International Council for the Exploration of the Seas' advisory committee on fisheries management confirms that the eight-day tie-up has been completely ineffective in reducing fishing effort. That lesson should be well learned by the Government who, only a year ago, were extremely confident that it would provide a solution.

I well remember that in the corresponding debate on 13 December last year, at column 1223, the Secretary of State for Scotland called the eight-day tie-up a "sensible measure". On 5 March this year, at column 238, the Parliamentary Secretary said that he was confident that there would be a significant reduction of effort from the tie-up scheme. The Minister of State, Scottish Office achieve the notoriety of not just lounging and sniggering his way through that debate, but also being the only Scottish Member to vote for the implementation of the tie-up scheme. The scientists now say that the eight-day tie-up was ineffective. Therefore, the analysis of all these right hon. and hon. Members was wrong. They should listen to the views of Members of Parliament with fishing constituencies. The anxiety, fear and danger that the eight-day tie-up produced over the last year was all for nothing. I hope that, given its track record, the fisheries team approach the current proposals with some humility.

I noticed that the Minister with responsibility for fisheries was careful not to put a figure on what he would find acceptable when the 200-day suggestion was made. That underlines part of the underlying difficulty over fisheries management. Of course the 200-day suggestion is absolutely unacceptable. Equally unacceptable is the Minister's unwillingness to recognise that the directed whiting fishery drives a coach and horses through any form of effort limitation or any form of mesh size formulation.

It is all very well for the Minister with responsibility for fisheries to say that he intends unilaterally to introduce a one-net rule and an increase in the minimum landing size of whiting, but he does not go on to say that the whiting derogation on current terms will be available to the rest of the European Community. He is in severe danger of devising a system that may be logical for the United Kingdom but of allowing the rest of the European Community to drive a coach and horses through all conservation measures.

The reduction in the minimum landing size of whiting is a disaster for conservation policies. The lack of a one-net rule makes a joke of conservation when people can fish with a 90 mm net, claim that they are fishing for whiting, and discard other species in order to qualify under the whiting fishery directive. It is the most anti-conservation measure that one can imagine.

The Minister has managed to allow the Danish fleet in particular to introduce into fishing for human consumption practices that that fleet has long followed in industrial fishing. Aficionados of these debates will know that each year I have remarked on the increase in industrial fishing when fishing for human consumption has been reduced year after year. In the period from 1987 to 1989, industrial fishing increased to 1,483,000 tonnes while fishing for human consumption was reduced to a residual level. I should like the Minister of State, Scottish Office to say what will be done to bring industrial fishing under control. Do not the Government understand that the whiting derogation undermines the conservation proposals?

Reference has already been made to the shock to the shellfish sector for the second time in two years, due to the virtual ban over the weekend. What guarantee can the Minister give that a test on one particular species of shellfish from one area of Scotland that goes wrong does not again result in a ban that affects virtually the whole fishery? Can he give an undertaking that there has not been a succession of letters from the European Commission to the Scottish Office during the past few months asking, in particular, for area testing results? Can he provide a guarantee that what has happened will not be repeated? The shellfish processing sector cannot afford yet another health scare over the next few months and years.

The capacity of the fish processing industry has been substantially reduced. In my constituency the result has been that, in Peterhead, on Monday fish were offered for withdrawal because the fish processors did not have the capacity to take up a reasonable landing for that day. As the industry cuts its capacity, the problems faced by the industry are compounded. What support will the processing sector get so that the hygiene regulations can be implemented? What assurances can the Government give that there will be access to European funding, which the Commission says will be available on a large scale, to restructure the industry?

I hope that we shall have an assurance that the president of the Scottish Fishermen's Federation will not again have to write the sort of letter that was published in Scottish Fishing Weekly on 22 November. He wrote to the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food complaining of fishing industry leaders being dismissed like school-children. The letter also noted the childish outbursts of the right hon. Gentleman. The Government should mend their ways towards fishermen and have effective and proper consultation. There should be effective representation for the industry within the counsels of Europe. If the Government put into representing the fishing industry a fraction of the effort that they use to try to prevent the extension of workers' rights across the Community, the industry in Scotland would have a much brighter future.

10.15 pm

Mr. Bill Walker (Tayside, North): My hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) drew attention to the concern in his constituency over the phasing out of licences for drift-netting of salmon. He said that it was sad because the industry had been in business for 100 years. Everyone understands that, and appreciates the problems created. The difficulties would not arise if they were using the equipment of 100 years ago, because the industry would not take as much salmon. I draw hon. Members' attention to the fact that the fresh water laboratory at

[Mr. Bill Walker]

Pitlochry in my constituency can provide useful and interesting statistics. I recommend that anyone with a real interest in salmon should visit that laboratory.

Those who fish on the river—those who take salmon out from the estuarial nets or those who fish it because they have broad fishing beats—all contribute in different ways to the stocking of the river. That is an important part of the total balance. However, my hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth was right to say that the estuarial nets have to be dealt with in the same way as drift nets. Attempts have been made to buy them out, and I hope that that will be successful. It has been successful on some rivers.

It is a recognition of changing times and circumstances and a recognition that the salmon belong in the river, although they spend a great deal of time at sea. The salmon could create employment prospects that would go on for ever if it could be guaranteed that they could get back up the river. It may come as a surprise to some people that we count the salmon going up the river. That is done at Pitlochry, where there is a ladder at which it is possible to measure the number of salmon going beyond the dam.

I want to draw the Minister's attention to matters affecting deep sea and other fishing. What consideration has been given to the decommissioning schemes that have been suggested and to the impact that any such schemes would have on jobs? Has that aspect been looked at and does it mean a form of enforced unemployment? If that is the case, it must be stated. There is little point in using grand slogans if one does not spell out exactly what is meant. That is one of the great problems. I am not unsympathetic to the views that have been expressed, but I like to have the facts so that I can make an objective assessment.

The alleged illegal fishing received considerable prominence in one of the Scottish Sunday papers. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Minister on the selection of fishery protection aircraft. The Cessna aircraft is particularly suitable for the task. With the equipment that will be on board, one hopes that it will provide a deterrent to those fishing illegally and that such people will be caught. The best deterrent is to catch people at it—[Interruption.] It may surprise hon. Members but I have been airborne in aircraft carrying out such tasks. That is one of the advantages of having served in the Royal Air Force for many years. Aerial surveillance has been perfected in Hong Kong, where I spent some time flying with the Royal Hong Kong auxiliary air force. It used Cessna aircraft, which were effective and successful and were ideal for the job. I look forward to aircraft performing the same policing operation as the Royal Hong Kong auxiliary air force, which is very effective.

Mr. Austin Mitchell (Great Grimsby): I shall be very brief. In several years of speaking in fishing debates, I have not known the situation to be as bleak as it is now. The bleakness of the situation means that we should emphasise to the Minister that, if he had introduced a decommissioning scheme last year, the Community would not now be considering daft schemes such as a 200 day lay-up. He said that he opposed that, but did not give his preference. It is essential that he introduces a decommissioning scheme.

I shall make three points about North sea stocks. The first is that it is vital for Grimsby's interests—and, I think, for the national interest now—that the Minister keeps the cod total allowable catch above the level at which the Hague preference will be invoked. I should like him to reconsider the Hague preference, because the net losses will outweigh the net gains for the country. It would certainly damage Grimsby's interests if that preference were invoked, so I hope that he will keep it above that level.

Secondly, I emphasise that the North sea and west Scotland saithe TAC, which is down, should be increased. The scientific advice is shaky, and there is certainly a strong case for increasing it.

Thirdly, Grimsby has diversified into plaice and sole tremendously in the past five years. This year has been our best for sole fishing. That quota should be kept at its present level, and to stop the increase in the beamer fleet, which is increasing by one or two vessels a month and much of it with Dutch money, it is essential that the Minister should introduce a pressure stock licensing scheme for North sea beamers. That growing beamer fleet is taking fish away from Grimsby vessels.

I should like to make many more points, such as those made by the hon. Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) about a ban on industrial fishing, but I conclude by saying that it is essential that the Minister takes urgent action to prevent the disastrous situation that we are drifting into.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): I was persuaded by a comment made earlier in the debate to fetch a quote with which to begin. It reads:

"Unless someone in the Scottish Tory Party can quickly devise a credible, vote-winning policy for Scottish fisheries during the coming months, their total elimination at the poll in all Scottish fishing constituencies is certain."

One might wonder what political partisan said that. Those words were written by the co-editor of The Salmon Net, Rhoddy Macleod, the brother of the late Iain Macleod, a distinguished Member of the House. He wrote that his late brother

"was attacked by the right wing of the Tory Party as being 'too clever by half'."

He added:

"The problem facing the Tory Party in Scotland now is exactly the opposite one—they are not nearly clever enough."

Listening to the hon. Member for Tayside, North (Mr. Walker) this evening, I could only think how very true that was.

Mr. Macleod was writing about the vendetta that had been conducted against the salmon netting industry in Scotland. In that context, I would say to the hon. Member for Berwick-upon-Tweed (Mr. Beith) and to Opposition Members from the north-east who have spoken that we have absolutely no truck with what is being done to the salmon industry or to the salmon netting industry in Scotland—a fine traditional industry for which I have much respect. I give the commitment that the pendulum will swing back in favour of that industry and away from the vested interests that have dominated the debate in recent years.

We noted the absence from the Minister's speech of any reference to a decommissioning scheme, which is the key to so much else. That point has been well covered by my hon. Friends and by others. The 200-day a la carte, table d'hote, or whatever other description is used, is not acceptable.

We remember the arrogance with which the eight day tie-up was presented a year ago. We recall the certainties that were expressed that it would be the solution to conservation issues and over-catching. As the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond) rightly said, we find that the scientific evidence contradicts all of it.

We do not want the Minister to come back in a few weeks' time proclaiming triumph. We know today that there is no shortage of newspapers to proclaim triumph on behalf of any Tory Minister who comes back from Europe. However, if the Minister comes back and says that 150 days has been agreed and that a wonderful compromise has been achieved, he will get an even bigger raspberry this year than he did last year.

There are serious questions to be asked about the recent shellfish scare in Scotland. If the scare did nothing else, it highlighted the fact that the shellfish fishery, including the prawn fishery, is now the second biggest fishery in Scotland. It is an important and major industry in Scotland and in other parts of the country. Important and fundamental questions arise out of the events of the past week.

I pay tribute to the civil servants in the Department of Agriculture and Fisheries for Scotland who, when alerted of the urgency and the seriousness of the problem, went off to Brussels and got a solution. That was excellent and exceeded the short-term expectations of the industry.

It seems that a specific consignment of scallops from Orkney had been tested at Ostend and had been found to contain toxins which made them unfit for human consumption. That was the root of the problem. I want the Minister to answer three questions on the matter, either tonight or subsequently.

First, how did the delay arise between identification of the defective samples at Ostend and the matter being drawn to the attention, I believe as late as last Wednesday night, of officials of the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and of the Department? How did communications break down in that period?

Secondly, will the monitoring of shellfish at Torry and elsewhere in Britain be brought into line with continental practice? That means testing the organs as well as the meat of the shellfish. If we are selling in continental markets, there is no point in our having different standards of testing from those on the continent. There must be standardisation if such incidents are not to happen again.

Thirdly, going back to the matter that my hon. Friend the Member for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) rightly said I raised in Committee earlier this year, will the Department now introduce far more localised monitoring of shellfish to avoid a general ban such as the one imposed last week? Those are three questions that are relevant for the Scottish shellfish industry and for the shellfish industry throughout Britain. Such problems could arise elsewhere so we wait anxiously for the answers.

It is regrettable that we could not have had at least a whole day's debate on fishing. It is also regrettable that we always debate the subject entirely from the point of view of the catching industry. We should debate it from the points of view of the consumer and of the food industry. We never recognise sufficiently that fish is not just a source of income to fishermen. It is a source of protein which may be superior to all others and it is a source of good health to our people, if they have access to fish and to fish products.

The problem at present is that fish is being priced out of the reach of many people in British society who are precisely those who most need that source of protein. Fishermen's incomes can be protected to some extent by ever-increasing landing prices for smaller volumes, but that does no favour to the consumer who is being priced out of the market.

I understand that the Ministry has recommended that the sea fish advertising budget, which promotes fish as a product, should be discontinued at the end of its present period. I should like that proposal withdrawn. I believe that the pressure for it is coming from the big companies such as Findus and Bird's Eye, which object to paying the levy for seafish. We need fish to be advertised and promoted, and the proposal points up the danger of leaving the promotion of an industry to those who have a financial interest in it. There is also a social interest in the promotion of fish as a food and a source of protein.

The clock is against me, so I shall not go into further detail, although I should like to refer to a matter affecting my own area—the Clyde herring quota, which, as we have heard, has been decimated. Even now the herring caught and landed in the Clyde does not have a market because the processing industry has been clawed away from under it. Herring is one of the healthiest and best species of fish for consumption, yet its market has been removed. Perhaps the herring industry board should be brought back to promote herring and its virtues to the wider community.

I ask all hon. Members on both sides of the House who have been critical of the Government's record and performance and who have expressed their doubts and fears about the current negotiations to consider carefully the reasoned amendment tabled by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition. I do not think that they will find anything to disagree with in the amendment, and I suggest that they consider carefully the reaction in their own constituencies all around the British coast before voting against it.

The Minister of State, Scottish Office (Mr. Michael Forsyth): We have had an excellent debate and I am glad that all those who wished to speak had an opportunity to do so. We have heard excellent contributions—with the possible exception of that from the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan (Mr. Salmond).

I shall try to cover the points that have been made, and my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Secretary has kindly undertaken to write to hon. Members about those that I do not cover. In reply to the right hon. Member for Strangford (Mr. Taylor), I should explain that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland regrets the fact that he could not be here; he wished to attend the debate, but I understand that his duties in Northern Ireland prevented him from doing so.

The hon. Members for Banff and Buchan and for Cunninghame, North (Mr. Wilson) suggested that the International Council for the Exploration of the Sea had advised that the eight-day tie-up had been ineffective. That is another example of the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan trying to put a particular gloss on something to suit his own conclusions. The ICES said not that the eight-day tie-up had not been effective, but that it had not been effective enough in securing the recommended objective of achieving a 30 per cent. reduction in fishing effort by comparison with that for 1989. That is a rather different statement from the one that the hon. Member for Banff and Buchan gave the House.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and my hon. Friends the Members for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) and for Tynemouth (Mr. Trotter) suggested that we needed to have a one-net rule to prevent cheating. I entirely agree that a one-net rule is required, and we have convinced the Commission of the need for one. The problem has been that we have not secured the required qualified majority in the Council of Ministers, but I assure my hon. Friends and the hon. Gentleman that we shall continue to press for it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Tynemouth spoke about the east coast review. As my hon. Friend knows, it is the drift net fishery that is to be phased out. The use of T nets closer inshore will continue and the intention is to encourage drift net licensees to move to T nets which are closer inshore and which should catch fish from local rivers.

My hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives (Mr. Harris) asked about the position of mackerel handliners in the south-west. The fact that my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary is very much aware of the problem of the south-west handliners is in no small part due to the efforts of my hon. Friend the Member for St. Ives and he is always ready to explore the issues with them. We were pleased that it was possible to give them a reallocation of an extra 100 tonnes from a Scottish producer organisation this year and the handliners will also benefit from the increase in the mackerel TAC next year.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland expressed his preference for TACs for nephrops by stock rather than for the North sea as a whole. I assume that the Commission had made that proposal on the basis that a global TAC for the North sea would be more readily enforceable. We will consider that, but the key must be the right level of TAC and a satisfactory allocation for the United Kingdom.

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Forsyth: No, I do not have much time left.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington (Mr. Townend) asked about the Factortame position and the European Court of Justice ruling in July. That was unwelcome, but the Government will have to comply. We can however insist that vessels are genuinely managed and controlled from this country, and we shall use the licensing system to ensure a genuine economic link. There is no sign of a rush to re-register. The total number eligible as a result of the judgment is only 65, many of which have sunk, been scrapped or reflagged or are now pursuing non-fishing activities. I assure my hon. Friend the Member for Bridlington that we will do what we can to ensure that the Commission proceeds against other member states if they impose restrictions of the sort that we have been forced to drop.

The hon. Members for Cunninghame, North and for Western Isles (Mr. Macdonald) referred to paralytic shellfish poisoning and the apparent ban on Scottish exports imposed by the Commission last Thursday.

As I think is now well known, that decision was taken by the Commission's standing veterinary committee with very little notice to the United Kingdom Government before the meeting and with no preliminary bilateral contact such as we might reasonably have expected. The action was taken following a complaint by the Belgian authorities, which claimed to have detected a high incidence of PSP in two batches of scallops imported from Scotland and originating, so far as we are aware, from Orkney. It is the case that PSP, although mainly a summer phenomenon, was continuing to be detected in certain Orkney crabs, and the fishing and sale of green and velvet crabs in certain Orkney waters is still banned, under the United Kingdom's own long-standing arrangements.

I emphasise that the Government have well-established arrangements, which we think are fully adequate, for sampling shellfish species and keeping these off the market where there is a PSP problem. Those arrangements, which operate during the appropriate time of the year, involve regular sampling from 46 sites in Scottish waters, with intensified sampling then being triggered as soon as low levels of PSP are detected. Those arrangements, as hon. Members from Scottish coastal constituencies will be aware, have led to numerous closures of fisheries in the last two summers.

The Commission has sought to explain the decision taken last Thursday on the grounds that individual member states would otherwise have taken unilateral measures which might have disadvantaged our industry more. It also felt under an obligation to act quickly, in the light of the alleged threat to public health, but it is clearly unsatisfactory that such an important industry and confidence in it should be put at risk by such sudden action, without proper consultation with the United Kingdom first and indeed without any consultation at all in this case. Apart from the lack of consultation, a ban or an apparent ban arising from an alleged problem concerning only scallops and only waters around Orkney, but extending to all shellfish species and all Scottish waters, was clearly absurdly disproportionate.

My noble Friend Lord Strathclyde has made clear our dissatisfaction at this turn of events and on his instructions officials met Commission representatives in Brussels on Monday, when I am very glad to say that the matter was satisfactorily resolved. The Commission, having heard the details of our monitoring procedures, was satisfied as to their adequacy, and the export of Scottish shellfish can now proceed as before, on the basis of the existing United Kingdom arrangements.

We are naturally instituting further sampling to make sure that there is no problem, but there is no sign of it, and I should say that samples from Orkney tested in Aberdeen last weekend, in the light of the Belgian complaint and with the tests being carried out according to what we understood to be Belgian testing methods, produced nothing like the results alleged by the Belgian Government. We have, however, offered to have bilateral contracts with the Belgians to ensure that we understand their worries fully and take them properly into account in future sampling and testing.

A central problem for the fishing industry is that it harvests a renewable—but also exhaustible—natural resource. The industry has to be regulated, and, not least because of its fragmented nature, it cannot do that itself. It is then hardly surprising that, particularly given the present state of stocks, the industry and Government find it hard to agree on the right balance to be struck between the industry's short-term needs and its long-term interests.

The Government want the industry to survive and to have a healthy and secure future. We do not want a one-generation industry. We have to remember that many fishing communities are relatively isolated and highly dependent on fish-related employment. They could not readily adapt to an economy without the fishing industry. My hon. Friend the Member for Skipton and Ripon (Mr. Curry) and my noble Friend Lord Strathclyde will be fighting strongly for the United Kingdom's interests next week, and will be aiming to secure the best available deal for our industry. But they will also be looking for the right deal that will provide the industry with its livelihood for next year, while also contributing to the stabilising and rebuilding of fish stocks.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 9134/91 and the Supplementary Explanatory Memorandum submitted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 27th November 1991, relating to guide prices for fishery products for 1992, the proposals described in the unnumbered Explanatory Memoranda submitted by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food on 10th December 1991, relating to total allowable catches and quotas for 1992, the reciprocal Fisheries Agreement between the Community and Norway for 1992 and duties on certain fish imports for 1992 and of the Government's intention to negotiate the best possible fishing opportunities for the United Kingdom fishing industry for 1992 consistent with the requirement for conservation of fishing stocks.

PETITION

Human Rights (Kashmir)

10.53 pm

Mr. Terry Rooney (Bradford, North): I wish to present a petition signed by about 2,055 residents of Bradford, North who originate from Kashmir and who still have relatives there concerning current injustices and human rights abuses. Wherefore your petitioners pray that your honourable House will condemn the systematic mass murders, torture, arson and rape by the Indian forces of occupation in Kashmir; promote international efforts to help refugees fleeing Kashmir and to relieve the hardship and suffering of the people who remain in the territory; demand that India permit Amnesty International and other international human rights agencies to enter Kashmir, with a view to investigating and reporting on human rights violations; and calls for the withdrawal of India's armed forces and their replacement by an interim United Nations Administration with the task of restoring law and order, and as soon as practicable, conducting the said plebiscite.

To lie upon the Table.

Daresbury (Nuclear Structure Facilities)

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Chapman.]

10.54 pm

Mr. Chris Butler (Warrington, South): The former Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), visited the Daresbury laboratory in July 1990. Afterwards, she wrote:

"It was clear that the Laboratory is at the frontiers of research in several fundamental areas, and I do hope that this will receive the international recognition it deserves."

Little did she know that, within a few months, the Government—not hers—would rip the heart out of that laboratory by closing the nuclear structure facility, which President Bush's scientific adviser called an absolute leader in nuclear physics. Even Sir Mark Richmond, the axeman himself, called the NSF "a world class facility".

In 1991 prices, the NSF cost £40 million to build. The manpower costs were £70 million and, since 1982, the operating costs are £65 million. The linear accelerator—LINAC—cost a further £3·7 million, making the total taxpayers' investment in the facility £179 million.

Months after the closure decision, the Science and Engineering Research Council issued a report showing how that investment would pay off, but, strangely, the report assumed that the NSF would continue to operate. I suspect that somebody in SERC has a very red face. It was issued in June 1991 and said:

"The main element in the plan is to maintain the . . . NSF at the forefront of low-energy nuclear physics worldwide . . . The NSF has a clear place in the plans of the Nuclear Structure Committee over the next seven to eight years and Daresbury will play a pivotal role in co-ordinating and organising the efforts of the UK community . . . The mix of people needed may change but they will continue to play an essential part in the UK's programme of nuclear physics research."

In November 1990, Sir Mark Richmond opened and commissioned the LINAC with flattering words. Only months later, in February 1991, he announced the possible closure of the NSF. The LINAC was unused and will remain unused. Can it be the same man who is committed to honesty and integrity in public life?

On 8 February, my hon. Friend the Member for Stratford-on-Avon (Mr. Howarth) answered a written question from me, saying:

"As part of a review of all its future activities, the council decided on 6 February to make plans for the possible closure of the nuclear structure facility. To assist its further consideration of this issue"— that is, possible closure—

"the council is establishing a study to assess the importance of the nuclear structure science in the context of the council's work as a whole."—[Official Report, 8 February 1991; Vol. 185, c. 257.]

Those reporting on the issue—me, the staff at Daresbury and the Institute of Physics—all assumed that that would mean that the NSF would gain a peer review. That would have been the normal scientific practice and the just way to proceed, for a condemned facility—like a condemned man—deserves to be heard. But that promise was broken. Not only was there no peer review, but there was no review of the possibility of keeping the NSF open. Perhaps the authorities feared the result of such a review, but that is not an ethical way to conduct public life.

A review was set up—the Fender committee—whose remit was to consider support for nuclear physics in the light of the closure of the NFS. Herman Feshbach of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, who was on the committee, said:

"To make such a decision and follow it up with a review seems a peculiar way of doing business."

That is true.

On 24 March 1991, the House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology said:

"It is incomprehensible to us that a whole area of United Kingdom Science should have to be precipitately abandoned as part of a series of crisis measures and we roundly condemn the practices and policies which have put so much at risk—whatever the excuse."

On 2 June 1991, giving evidence to the Fender committee, Sir Michael Atiyah, president of the Royal Society, said:

"There appears to have been little attempt to assess the case for closing NSF against closing some other SERC facility or reducing staff numbers in the (SERC) establishments. No comparison has been made of value-for-money produced by the NSF as opposed to other expensive facilities. As it is, the decision to close the NSF comes across as somewhat arbitrary and high-handed."

On 7 July 1991, Fender reported—he broke his remit to criticise the closure decision:

"Panel members are struck by the widespread international criticism of this decision and the share planning notice given to the community. The panel sympathises with these comments."

Feshbach went a little further, and said:

"There is, in my opinion, no financial constraint that requires the closure of the Nuclear Structure Facility . . . This is an example of egregious mismanagement . . . To shut down this successful and relatively inexpensive facility, with its admirable past record and exciting future promise, cannot be justified".

Fender recommended that £3·7 million per annum should be added to the nuclear physics programme in order to make it credible. That amount would be enough to continue funding the NSF. Perhaps that is why SERC decided not to accept the verdict of its own committee. It might have been embarrassed at the thought that it had closed a first-class British facility years ahead of its productive life, and may have made no savings and transferred abroad a compartment of excellent British science.

What savings are there likely to be? If the LINAC is not to be thrown away, it will cost £1 million to move, 155 people will be made redundant costing £5 million in redundancy payments, and, as a result, there will be on-going costs of £1 million per year in pension enhancements. If the redundancies had been phased, it would have been possible to save quite a lot of money through the transfer of personnel to other facilities and natural wastage.

The NSF bears a significant share of the overheads of Daresbury laboratory, and £1 million extra per year will have to be shared by the rest of the laboratory facilities. Postgraduates and scientists who use the facility at present will have to be sent abroad, at an extra cost of £600,000 a year. The premature dismantling of the NSF will cost £2 million. That cost would have come eventually, but bringing it forward is a cost in itself. Therefore, we face £8 million of one-off costs of decommissioning, plus extra annual costs of £2·6 million. That underlines the scandal of the misuse of the taxpayer's investment of £179 million. We are being charged for wasting that investment—£8 million up front and £2·6 million per annum thereafter.

The cost of closure could be even higher if the Europeans start to charge for access to their facilities. A 1991 booklet called "An introduction to Daresbury laboratory" mentions a quid pro quo by which foreign scientists would use our facility in exchange for the use of overseas accelerators by United Kingdom scientists. That quid pro quo will have gone. We will be unable to exchange access facilities, because we will not have a facility to extend. This country will continue to expect free access abroad, but I understand that we intend to start charging foreign scientists for access to facilities in other areas of science. The German Ministry of Research and Technology has protested that that breaks the unwritten rules of the scientific community.

If we are forced to pay, there may be no savings at all from this closure. The Minister may say that he will not interfere in the decision of his quango. He may say that he is there to uphold the arm's-length principle. The House of Lords Select Committee on Science and Technology would disagree. It said:

"Research councils are now being asked to make choices which are too big to be left to councils alone without political guidance."

Ministers should not use the arm's-length principle as an escape clause from their stewardship of public money. In the face of a decision to close years ahead of schedule for paltry real savings a facility in which the taxpayer has invested £179 million and virtually to abolish a whole compartment of world class science in the United Kingdom and saying, "It is not my fault, guv," lacks a certain credibility. I wonder what the Public Accounts Committee will think of that.

11.6 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Alan Howarth): I have listened very carefully to my hon. Friend the Member for Warrington, South (Mr. Butler). He has raised for debate a subject in which, I know, he has been closely involved for many months and on which he has been strenuous in representing the interests of his constituents who work at the Daresbury laboratory.

I was grateful to my hon. Friend for joining me during my visit to the Daresbury laboratory earlier in the year. As well as seeing the nuclear structure facility, the subject of this debate, and talking to some of the staff involved, we visited the synchrotron radiation source and heard about the work of the central computer facility, which are also based at the laboratory. My hon. Friend is right to be proud of the science at Daresbury.

It is right that an hon. Member should make the best possible case for the interests of his constituents. However, the decision by the Science and Engineering Research Council to close the nuclear structure facility at Daresbury in order to concentrate on other areas of scientific research is not one in which it would be right for me or my colleagues in Government to intervene. My hon. Friend has persistently sought, as in this debate, to persuade us to do so, and I have repeatedly explained to him why it would be improper for us to do so.

I shall come to the specific points that my hon. Friend raises in a moment, but first it is important to set this decision in the context of the way in which we organise public expenditure on basic science. I will do so very briefly, as the general principles are well known to the House.

Governments of both political complexions have long adhered to the arm's-length principle for public expenditure on science. There is, I think, no serious quarrel that that is the best way to reconcile two considerations: that if basic scientific research is to be done, the taxpayer must make a significant contribution to the cost of it; and the principle that the people best placed to judge how to spend public money for science are the scientists themselves, not the Government. That is why we have research councils, and why my right hon. and learned Friend appoints people of the highest calibre to those councils to make the expert judgments that they do.

I very much regret that my hon. Friend has chosen to cast aspersions on the competence and integrity of Sir Mark Richmond and his colleagues on the council. Such aspersions are wholly unjustified and I hope that my hon. Friend will withdraw them. Moreover, no one could be a more determined advocate for science than Sir Mark, and my hon. Friend would do well to recognise that.

As my hon. Friend knows, I made a point of meeting and hearing the views of, nuclear structure scientists and others who wanted to put their concerns to me. He will recall a meeting in which he introduced me to Professor Twin of Liverpool university. It is right that, as Minister, I should listen to and understand the concerns of scientists and I was pleased to respond to his suggestion.

The decisions that research councils are called on to take are by no means easy ones. In the end, they come down to questions of priorities and this in turn depends on questions of scientific judgments. Science is not, of course, unique in this. In many areas of public provision, we have to ask not only, "Would expenditure on this project in itself be good?" but, "Is this particular project of higher priority than the various other projects in competition with it?" Those who take these decisions, and take them courageously, deserve our respect and support.

In the case of science, there is the added complication that the priorities change over time as new areas of research open up. The more successful we are in science, the less feasible it becomes to support all the work that is possible. That is as true in Japan and the United States and the other leading scientific nations as it is in the United Kingdom. It would be true whatever the level of funding provided.

It is for this reason that the research councils need to take a radical look at their forward programmes from time to time and make a careful reassessment of them against a background of changing scientific opportunities. This is what the Science and Engineering Research Council, under its chairman, Sir Mark Richmond, has been engaged in over the past 12 months or so. I fully support it in this. It has meant some tough decision making and has, inevitably, caused some controversy. I understand that and, equally, I understand the disappointment felt by those whose work is affected. They are entitled to argue strongly for the importance of their areas of research. I would not expect anything else.

Let me move on to the particular case of the nuclear structure facility and some of the points that my hon. Friend made. There are two closely related issues here. First, there is the maintenance by the SERC of a significant piece of scientific equipment—the nuclear structure facility at Daresbury laboratory—used by United Kingdom and also by foreign nuclear structure physics researchers. Secondly, there is the funding by the SERC of programmes of research into nuclear structure physics which, in the absence of the facility at Daresbury, would depend on the use of equipment elsewhere.

The SERC concluded, as part of the wide-ranging review that I have mentioned, that the facility should be closed in 1993, which is earlier than had previously been envisaged. That gave a period of 18 months or so for the rundown to be achieved in an orderly manner. It also, as my hon. Friend will know, allows the SERC to fulfil its agreement with France to develop and run the Eurogam detector in its first stage. That is a gamma ray detection instrument which will operate at Daresbury before moving to the new facility that the French are building at Strasbourg.

My hon. Friend referred to the review of nuclear structure physics commissioned by the SERC from a panel under the chairmanship of Professor Brian Fender, vice-chancellor of Keele university. The purpose of that review was to help the council to reach decisions on the scale of support for nuclear structure physics after the closure of the nuclear structure facility.

My hon. Friend has argued before, and continues to hold the view, that, in setting up this review in the way that it did, the SERC went back on an earlier undertaking to review this area of physics before making a final decision on whether to close the facility. I have checked with the SERC on this and that is not the case. I can only agree that there was indeed some misunderstanding about this at the time; but the SERC clarified the position in a press release of 13 March announcing Professor Fender's review; and indeed Sir Mark Richmond made the position quite clear in a letter in the New Scientist of 27 April responding to one from my hon. Friend. As my hon. Friend has raised the issue again tonight, I must ask him to accept that, while there was some confusion about that at the time, there was no bad faith on the part of the SERC as he has implied.

As I said, the purpose of the Fender review was to inform the discussion within the SERC about the appropriate level of support for that area of science after the closure of the nuclear structure facility. The review made a number of recommendations to the council about what sort of programme would be possible and desirable in the new situation, and the cost.

What such a review did not and could not realistically do, given that it was essentially looking at one area of science, was to make the strategic judgments involved in balancing the importance of nuclear structure physics against other research priorities. That decision had to be for the council itself to make.

The SERC has now considered the Fender recommendations. With the agreement of the chairman of the SERC, I can tell the House that the council has decided to fund a nuclear structure physics programme at a level of some £4 million a year from the financial year 1993-94 through to the end of the current planning period. The SERC will be providing further details of the programme in due course.

My hon. Friend has been critical this evening of the SERC's decisions on the nuclear structure facility. I hope that what I have said will show that here we have a research council doing what it is inescapably necessary to do from time to time and conciuding that an area of science now has a lower relative priority than it had in the past and that it does not believe that the costs of maintaining a particular facility are justifiable when set against the alternative scientific programmes forgone.

The SERC is currently spending some £8 to £9 million a year on nuclear physics and will continue to do so until the closure of the facility in 1993. There will of course be transitional costs associated with the closure itself, as my hon. Friend rightly says. Those include the decommissioning of the facility and possibly some redundancy payments, although the SERC is committed to making every effort to keep compulsory redundancy to the minimum. Beyond that, the SERC will in future be spending some £4 million a year on this subject, with £5 million a year released to other areas of science.

The decisions have undoubtedly been difficult, but they have been based upon scientific judgments and taken by those best placed to take them.

Question put and agreed to.

Oral Answers to Questions

NORTHERN IRELAND

Administration of Justice

1. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on his plans to heighten confidence in the administration of justice.

The Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Peter Brooke): The Government's strategy is to provide a criminal justice system which maintains the rule of law and creates in Northern Ireland the conditions for a fair and just administration.

Mr. McAvoy: That answer smacks of nothing less than smug complacency. If everything is for the best in Castlereagh, why are there so many out-of-court settlements in actions for damages brought by former detainees?

Mr. Brooke: Many factors enter into account when the police authority needs to respond to complaints of that sort. The decisions taken are taken on legal advice.

Mr. Peter Robinson: Did the Secretary of State read in the memoirs of Dr. Garrett FitzGerald that during the negotiations on the Anglo-Irish Agreement the Government had been prepared to allow judges from the courts in the Irish Republic to sit on the Bench in Northern Ireland as part of what are described as mixed courts, but that that was stopped because of the resistance of then then Lord Chief Justice, Lord Lowry? Is the view expressed then to Dr. FitzGerald—that this was a matter which could be considered as soon as Lord Lowry passed on—being considered by the Government now?

Mr. Brooke: The nature of my duties both in the Province and in this House means that I have not yet had the pleasure and privilege of reading Dr. FitzGerald's book, but I shall take on hearsay what the hon. Gentleman says about this entry. The issue has not been discussed with me during my time as Secretary of State at any conference under the Anglo-Irish Agreement, and I am perfectly clear about what response I would give if it were raised.

Mr. Trimble: The primary function of the administration of justice is to apprehend and punish the guilty. Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that, contrary to statements made from time to time by Northern Ireland Ministers, the administration of justice in Northern Ireland is signally failing to do that? In 1985 there were 24 convictions for murder, but there were only eight in 1990. Moreover, the people being convicted are very much from the second and third XI. Does the Secretary of State not realise that that conspicuous failure, which is clear to the people of Northern Ireland, is undermining the confidence of the great majority, and that that is pregnant with considerable consequences?

Mr. Brooke: I understand what the hon. Gentleman says about the nature of the charge laid against certain people and the roles that they may have played in particular crimes. That is, I fear, testimony to the experience of terrorists in making certain that the people who commit the crimes are protected by their colleagues. But I am delighted to tell the hon. Gentleman and the House that 112 people have been charged with murder or attempted murder in the course of this year. That is an advance on the previous year and a testimony to the Royal Ulster Constabulary.

Mr. Stanbrook: Would it not be helpful if we used existing machinery more effectively? For example, the reciprocal legislation providing for extraterritorial jurisdiction does not seem much used. In the 16 years in which we have had our part of the legislation, we have applied for only 31 people to be tried in the Republic, of whom only 16 were convicted and the Irish Republic has not applied for any such cases at all. Surely there is a lot of ground here to make up if we are to make the machinery of justice as between the two countries more effective.

Mr. Brooke: The particular question that my hon. Friend raises is for my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, but I am grateful to him for reminding me of the precise statistics with which it is always sensible to be armed in any conference on the agreement.

Mr. McNamara: Will the Secretary of State explain why the Government are still being so stubborn about the video recording of interrogation procedures at Castlereagh and elsewhere? Is he aware of the concern expressed by Amnesty International and the United Nations committee on torture, and that it was recommended by Lord Colville, the Government's own adviser, and by the independent police complaints body and the Standing Advisory Commission on Human Rights? It is important that the Royal Ulster Constabulary should be seen to be in the forefront of the fight against terrorism with the support and confidence of the whole community. This is one important way in which that could be achieved. Will the Government now reconsider their decision not to introduce video recording of interrogation procedures?

Mr. Brooke: No matter what arrangements were to be made, the Government believe that the introduction of video recording of interviews with terrorists suspects could seriously jeopardise the process of investigating crime. However, that was a matter which SACHR raised with me only this week and made it clear that it was a subject to which it would return. It is therefore a subject on which I expect to be in continuing dialogue.

Mr. Kilfedder: Does the right hon. Gentleman agree that an essential element of the administration of justice is police primacy? If so, will he ensure that a police officer accompanies every military patrol whenever humanly possible? Will he also consider, as a provisional measure, initiating steps which would enable a magistrate or judge to supervise the interrogation of a defendant charged with a terrorist offence?

Mr. Brooke: The Government, police and military authorities are committed to ensure that, where feasible and sensible—the hon. Gentleman will know what those words mean in the context of the Province—Army patrols likely to come into contact with the public are accompanied by an RUC officer. That reflects the policy that the RUC is in the lead in the fight against terrorism. However, it must be recognised that at the current level of terrorist threat, full accompaniment of all patrols could be achieved only at the expense of aborting necessary anti-terrorist operations with a consequent increase in terrorist activity.

On the the hon. Gentleman's second question, he will know that work is proceeding on a statutory code under the Northern Ireland (Emergency Provisions) Act 1991.

Shipbuilding

2. Mr. Loyden: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what information he has on the number of orders, and for what types of vessels, held by shipbuilders in Northern Ireland.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland (Mr. Richard Needham): Harland and Wolff Shipbuilding and Heavy Industries Limited currently has orders for 12 vessels—an auxiliary oiler replenishment vessel for the Ministry of Defence, five Suezmax type tankers and six Capesize bulk carriers, for which three contracts have already been signed, with a further three to be completed shortly.

Mr. Loyden: The Minister will be aware that, with the exception of the MOD vessel, only three of the 11 ships now on order at Harland and Wolff are United Kingdom registered and owned. We welcome the security that the present orders offer to 1994-95, but would not Harland and Wolff's future, as well as that of other British shipyards, be better secured if we were to adopt the policy of new build for Britain's merchant fleet and thus ensure that shipyards throughout the United Kingdom employ our people and that our seamen have jobs to go to?

Mr. Needham: I am delighted that the recently privatised Harland and Wolff now has the longest order book in its history, with £565 million worth of orders, that it is competing successfully with the Koreans and the Japanese, that the future of 2,500 of its people is assured and that it is the premier shipyard in the United Kingdom.

Rev. Ian Paisley: In view of the long list of orders that Harland and Wolff has procured—I welcome that, and wholly endorse what the Minister has said—the recent large pay-offs in the island are alarming. Could not something be done to obtain some repair jobs to hold those workers so that they will not have to be laid off for a considerable time?

Mr. Needham: I fully understand the hon. Gentleman's concern. It was always apparent that as the AOR was completed many jobs and skills would not be required in the new orders that have come through. However, the hon. Gentleman rightly refers to the other businesses which Harland and Wolff is now expanding and building up, and I am sure that its success, which I believe is assured under privatisation, offers the best hope for those men in the future.

Dr. Godman: May I say how thrilled I am that that United Kingdom shipyard has such a healthy order book? However, I regret that there is no expansion in the recruitment of workers to that shipyard. How much money has been received by way of those orders from the seventh directive of the European Community's shipbuilding intervention fund, and how much of that money will be used to purchase from United Kingdom manufacturers the goods and services required for the vessels?

Mr. Needham: Clearly, it is for United Kingdom manufacturers to compete as subcontractors for the work that will be placed out by Harland and Wolff. I am sure that a large proportion will be placed with subcontractors. The percentage of aid given under the EC assistance programme was 13 per cent. last year, and it is being renegotiated this year. However, Harland and Wolff is continuing to compete and to be profitable, even though that intervention assistance is being reduced.

Schools (Integration)

3. Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the integration of schools in Northern Ireland.

The Minister of State, Northern Ireland Office (Dr. Brian Mawhinney): The Department of Education has, so far, approved 15 proposals for integrated status made under the integrated schools provisions of the Education Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 1989.

Mr. Townsend: I welcome the work that the Government have done in that important respect. Is my hon. Friend the Minister aware of a recent report suggesting that pupils from such schools are most likely to take a particularly dim view of all paramilitary organisations? Is he further aware that a problem exists in finding suitable financial resources for nursery education? Will he see what can be done about that?

Dr. Mawhinney: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his comments. It is certainly encouraging that parents, not government, are choosing to expand the number of integrated schools in the Province. I am sure that my hon. Friend is right, in that it makes sense to believe that if young people from both sides of the community are taught together in the same classrooms, they will value equally both traditions and will be more likely than some others to find common ground in later life. I will bring my hon. Friend's point about nursery education to the attention of my right hon. and noble Friend the Paymaster General.

Mr. John D. Taylor: Will the Minister commend Lagan college in my constituency for the progress that it has made in the past 10 years? Can he confirm that there will be no discrimination against state schools, for which the majority of parents still exercise a preference, or in favour of the segregated education system that the Roman Catholic Church and most Catholic parents want to maintain? Will the Minister assure the House that there will be no barrier to those who oppose integrated schools serving on the boards of governors of integrated schools?

Dr. Mawhinney: I am happy to join the right hon. Gentleman in commending Lagan college's achievements. He and I were present at the recent opening of its new school building, for which I had the pleasure of being the Minister responsible for making available the necessary resources. I certainly assure the right hon. Gentleman that there is no sense in which the Government want positively to discriminate in favour of one type of schooling over others, because parents have a right to choose. The Education Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 1989 put integrated schools alongside two other alternatives from which parents could choose. As to the right hon. Gentleman's last point, there will be no bar to any governor being appointed to the board of an integrated school, provided that the appointment complies with the provisions laid down in the Education Reform (Northern Ireland) Order 1989.

Pupil-Teacher Ratio

4. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what is the current pupil-teacher ratio; what the comparable figures were in May 1979; and if he will make a statement.

Dr. Mawhinney: The pupil-teacher ratio at January 1991, the latest date for which figures are available, was 18·2. The figure for January 1979 was 19·1.

Mr. Greenway: Will my hon. Friend pass on my congratulations to all who were involved in that improvement? Pupils will benefit, and that must be the object of the exercise. Has not the time come, however, to evaluate the optimum pupil-teacher ratio for pupils at any given age, with a view to establishing it? As I have said before, there are those who cannot teach one pupil, and others who can teach a hundred with great facility.

Dr. Mawhinney: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind comments, and for the continuing interest that he takes in this subject. I am sure that he is right in saying that the reduced pupil-teacher ratio provides children with an advantage, and also in pointing out that the quality of teaching and the ability of teachers is at least as important.

The idea of trying to work out an optimum ratio is interesting, and we should like to think about it further.

Mr. McGrady: I hope that the Minister is more successful with his new portfolio than his predecessors were and I wish him all the best in the difficult task that lies ahead of him.

Now that the education and library boards independently assess the formula according to which they delegate budgets to schools, does not the Minister fear that a great disparity in provision will result—not only in regard to pupil-teacher ratios, but in regard to every other aspect of provision across the different area boards?

Dr. Mawhinney: I am grateful to the hon. Member for his kind personal remarks, although I enter a caveat in regard to what he said about my predecessors.

Part of the purpose of education reform was to delegate downwards from the Department of Education, closer to the chalk face, tasks such as determining the necessary budgets, teacher numbers, and so forth. I suspect that the hon. Gentleman may have in mind some initial teething troubles that were experienced this year in connection with local management of primary schools. The Department is examining that issue closely, in conjunction with the boards.

Mr. Beggs: Was the significant increase in the number of temporary and part-time teachers included in the calculation of pupil-teacher ratios? Many parents feel that the speed of education reform and curriculum change has caused their children to suffer because their usual classroom or subject teachers are often taken out of the classroom to undergo courses related specifically to those changes.

Dr. Mawhinney: As the Minister responsible at the time, let me tell the hon. Gentleman that we went to great lengths to minimise the disruption caused in classrooms by the provision of necessary training related to the introduction of education reforms. The hon. Gentleman will recall that, on some exceptional days, schools were closed so that teachers could be trained.

Year in, year out, there is always an element of disruption, which is unconnected with education reform, as teachers undergo various courses to upgrade their skills. That is an essential part of the education process, and I do not believe that it was greatly exacerbated by the introduction of reforms.

Security

5. Mr. Molyneaux: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the security situation in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: Since I answered a similar question on 14 November, seven people have been killed as a result of the security situation, of whom six were civilians and one was a member of the Ulster Defence Regiment.

The Government remain entirely committed to bringing terrorism to an end through the vigorous and impartial actions of the police and the Army. They have succeeded in bringing suspected terrorists to justice. Up to the end of November this year, 367 people had been charged with terrorist offences, including 37 with murder and 75 with attempted murder.

Mr. Molyneaux: The Secretary of State will be aware from his own sources of the vast array of weapons being assembled and stored as far south as Limerick for transport to Northern Ireland. Is there not now a good case for strengthening the frontier wire, as a matter of urgency?

Mr. Brooke: The right hon. Gentleman knows, as does the House, the scale of the shipments from Libya before the Eksund was apprehended by the French customs. It is known that a substantial part of that weaponry is in the Republic of Ireland. Of course, I am delighted that from time to time the Garda find some of it.

Rev. William McCrea: I am sure that the Secretary of State will join me in expressing in the House sympathy for my constituent's family on the murder of Mr. Newell, a member of the Ulster Defence Regiment. Does the right hon. Gentleman appreciate the tremendous fear felt throughout the Province as we face the Christmas period, bearing in mind both the warning given by the security forces of an impending IRA outrage near Christmas and the signal given by the nationalist community in the result of a by-election at Magherafelt today, where there was a 43 per cent. increase in the Sinn Fein vote and a 34 per cent. decrease in the SDLP vote?

Mr. Brooke: Of course I share the hon. Gentleman's sympathy in the case of Mr. Newell. All terrorist crimes are horrible, but I find those which follow the pattern of Mr. Newell's death especially horrible. The hon. Gentleman is right, too, to tell the House of the warning that the Chief Constable of the RUC gave at the end of last week about the potential level of terrorist violence in the run-up to Christmas.

As for the pattern of voting in the by-election in the hon. Gentleman's constituency, there may be others besides myself to whom he might address that question.

Sir Patrick Duffy: May I draw the attention of the Secretary of State to the report in The Irish Times yesterday week about the recent meeting of the British-Irish parliamentary group in Dublin, and the contribution of his hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) about the security situation in proximity to the border? Were the reported remarks of his parliamentary private secretary in accordance with an official departmental brief?

Mr. Brooke: Necessarily, as my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) is my parliamentary private secretary, he will have taken advantage of the opportunity of briefing. With regard to security at the border, I have consistently said in the aftermath of conferences under the Anglo-Irish Agreement that, although we are delighted that good co-operation exists, it can always be better, and I am confident that we can make it so.

Commercial Investment

6. Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the amount of new investment in commercial buildings and shopping facilities in Belfast.

Mr. Needham: I am pleased to report that in recent years commercial and retail development in Belfast have reached unprecedented levels. In total, some £290 million of private investment is being spent or is programmed. In order to undermine the enormous resurgence of confidence, the IRA has planted 400 incendiary devices, of which approximately 100 have exploded, and five car bombs, of which three have exploded. The damage has been and is being made good. All the stores and the vast majority of commercial buildings are back at work. Business performance in the city centre is very little different from last year.

Mrs. Gorman: I thank my hon. Friend for that reply, and I commend him and his colleagues on their splendid work in restoring the centre of Belfast, especially the excellent shopping facilities. I am sure that my hon. Friend wishes to condemn the outrage last week when not only stores but the opera house were bombed, making the children's pantomime and all the other treats that normal families in the rest of Britain have at Christmas, such as shopping, Father Christmas and the Christmas lights, inaccessible to many families. The IRA is again undermining normal decent family life in the Province.

Mr. Needham: I am sure that all the people of Belfast would like to thank my hon. Friend for her comments. As the IRA's Libyan bombs explode, Sinn Fein and the Member for Belfast, West (Mr. Adams) remain strongly and strangely silent. The fact is that 1991 has been an unprecedented year of success for Belfast. Anyone who went to the tall ships race in Belfast and saw 500,000 people thronging through the city centre day after day could see the determination of the people of Belfast to lead their lives normally. It will take more than Mr. Gaddafi's guns and the IRA to undermine the spirit of the people of Belfast.

Mr. Clifford Forsythe: I congratulate the Minister on the urban renewal and commercial development in the centre of Belfast. We utterly condemn all the IRA's cynical attempts to bomb the heart out of Belfast. However, is the Minister aware that the main concern of business people in Belfast is that they should have adequate security so that they can run their businesses properly? Great efforts should be made to bring tenants into the new office and shop premises that are still empty. Does the Minister agree that instead of freezing the outlay of public money, the Government should hurry on public development to enable those shops to be let?

Mr. Needham: Over 90 per cent. of the two biggest shopping developments in Belfast are let, which is an extraordinary figure in comparison with other new developments in the rest of the country. Of 720,000 sq ft of office space that has been completed this year, 350,000 sq ft has been let. Some 95 per cent. of prime retail space in Belfast is let.

The hon. Gentleman is right to refer to security, although he will not expect me to spell out what is happening in the city at present. Belfast is a city of 500,000 people and for its business and commerce to thrive, it must be an open city and people must be able to get into and out of it. Finding that balance is absolutely crucial. There can be no question but that the people of Belfast are showing, by returning day after day to work, to shop and to enjoy themselves in Belfast, that they are the people who are succeeding.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Does the Minister agree that the confidence of the people has been even more shaken by the tragedy in the prison at which a bomb went off, killing two remand prisoners? Is not that comment on security even more staggering than the bombs that go off in the city, although all such bombings are to be condemned and deplored?

Will the Minister comment on the question that was sidestepped by the Secretary of State? Does he agree that the nationalists in Mid-Ulster have given a warning to the House by the way in which they voted, with a colossal rise in the Sinn Fein vote and a colossal drop in the SDLP vote?

Mr. Needham: As the hon. Gentleman is well aware, his first question is a matter for my hon. Friend the Minister of State and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State who have, no doubt, listened to him carefully.

On the second question, I am a great believer in the common sense and balance of all the people of Ulster. I will not comment on a particular by-election. I will comment, as I repeatedly do, on the determination of everyone in Ulster to end violence and to ensure that they can get back to living normal lives. That is exactly what most of them are showing in Belfast at present.

Mr. Speaker: Mr. Marshall.

Mr. John Marshall: Question No. 7, Sir.

Mr. Speaker: Sorry, the hon. Gentleman is the wrong Mr. Marshall.

Mr. Jim Marshall: Perhaps I should ask the question of the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) instead of my own.

With regard to the commercial activity in Belfast, I join the Minister in condemning the terrorist attacks in commercial Belfast. Those attacks are clearly designed to undermine business confidence and the economic well-being of both communities. I join the Minister in saying that we are all resolved to ensure that that does not succeed. While I pay tribute to the Government's success in attracting commercial business to Belfast, I remind the Minister that Belfast is only one part of the Province. What plans do the Government have to introduce a more balanced development throughout the Province?

Mr. Needham: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's opening comments, but not very grateful for his latter comments. He has been on the Opposition Front Bench for long enough to have seen and understood the redevelopment work that is currently being undertaken in Londonderry and which is being carried out in the county towns throughout the length and breadth of Northern Ireland. There is a feeling of partnership and a commitment to partnership that I have not seen before. I have undertaken missions with the hon. Members for Foyle (Mr. Hume), for Fermanagh and South Tyrone (Mr. Maginnis) and for South Down (Mr. McGrady) in an attempt to get more business and development in their areas. If the hon. Member for Leicester, South (Mr. Marshall) would like to accompany me in the new year, I should be only too happy to take him on a tour and show him just how much is happening outside Belfast as well as in it.

Sunday Trading

7. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what recent representations he has received about Sunday trading.

Mr. Brooke: The only representation that my ministerial colleagues and I have recently received was a resolution of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland.

Mr. Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend agree that recent developments have underlined the fact that the Shops Act 1950 is illogical, out of date, rarely enforced and out of touch with the reality of the 1990s? However, does he agree that as part of the process of reform, those who have a conscientious objection to working on Sunday should be given the statutory right not to do so?

Mr. Brooke: The most recent relevant development has been the decision by the House of Lords and a lower court to refer the relevant questions of Community law to the European Court. We must now await the European Court's decision.

Mr. Trimble: Will the Secretary of State confirm that the recent statement by the Attorney-General about his reluctance to exercise his discretion applies only to the civil action of injunction; that the Shops Act 1950 is not suspended; that the reference to the European Court on the issue does not prevent or place any obstacle in the way of criminal proceedings for breach of that Act; and that it is perfectly open to the responsible bodies to bring such proceedings?

Mr. Brooke: My right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General has made it clear that the law is not suspended and therefore it would remain a matter for local authorities if they wished to bring actions.

Mr. Bill Walker: While awaiting the views of the European Court, will my right hon. Friend bear in mind the fact that Presbyterians in Scotland enjoy shopping on Sundays and that has not been detrimental to those who wish to attend church?

Mr. Brooke: I have continuously taken the view during the time that I have held my present office that it is a great privilege to be Secretary of State for Northern Ireland. However, to ask me to take responsibility for Scotland as well would be too much.

Hazardous Waste

8. Mr. William Ross: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what plans he has to deal with hazardous and toxic waste in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: Hazardous and toxic waste not suitable for landfill in existing sites will continue to be transported for disposal at facilities in Great Britain. The hon. Gentleman will be aware, however, that Du Pont Ltd. is to conduct a study into a proposed incinerator facility.

Mr. Ross: My constituents are well informed of moves in that direction. However, does the Minister accept that it is absolutely vital that disposal of such waste should be carried out in the safest possible way? Do the Government accept that disposal of such waste must be overseen constantly by the Government and that all those who oversee should be properly qualified, preferably to degree standard? Does the Minister agree that such waste should be treated or disposed of not by the producers of that waste, but by some other body which may be more independent with regard to financial considerations?

Mr. Needham: The answer to three of the hon. Gentleman's questions is yes. In answer to his last question, I do not believe that it necessarily makes sense for those who may not be fully qualified or experienced to get rid of such waste when those who are involved in a similar business are much better qualified to do so. However, we will certainly look very carefully indeed at the qualifications and at the control of any potential incinerator and where it is to go, should one come forward in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Skinner: Will the Minister bear it in mind that if he wants to get rid of toxic waste in Northern Ireland, he had better not employ the services of the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food? When they tried to get rid of toxic waste in Bolsover, the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food had it sent to Severn Trent in the west midlands. It was not incinerated properly, and the result was that the west midlands was polluted with dioxine——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is a bit wide of the question. [Interruption.] It is.

Mr. Skinner: I am in order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is wide of the question.

Mr. Skinner: I am talking about Northern Ireland.

Mr. Speaker: Sit down, please.

Mr. Skinner: In Northern Ireland——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is an abuse.

Mr. Skinner: In Northern Ireland——

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is an abuse.

Mr. Needham: The hon. Gentleman's question has nothing to do with Northern Ireland.

Castlereagh Interrogation Centre

9. Mr. A. Cecil Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement concerning proposals to appoint a commissioner to oversee interrogations at Castlereagh police office.

Dr. Mawhinney: I can confirm that the appointment of a commissioner to monitor procedures at Castlereagh, and the two other police holding centres where terrorist suspects are interviewed, is under consideration. My right hon. Friend hopes that he will be in a position to make a firm announcement early next year.

Mr. Walker: Is the Minister aware that there is a perception in Northern Ireland that that appointment emanated from the Anglo-Irish Conference? In those circumstances, will the Minister please confirm that that appointment will have southern Irish connotations?

Dr. Mawhinney: The announcement was first made by my right hon. Friend in the House of Lords during consideration of the emergency provisions Bill—as it then was—I am speaking from memory, but I believe that it was last May. The decision will be taken by this Government whenever it has to be taken. The Government of the Irish Republic and anyone else who wishes to make their views known to us before we make a judgment are, of course, entirely free to do so.

Mr. Mullin: May I say that it seems incredible that, in the light of all that is known about the unreliability of uncorroborated confessions in police custody, there should be those in Northern Ireland who are attempting to defend that practice in relation to the notorious Castlereagh? May I also say that the Department's concern would be taken more seriously if it did not take over three months to get replies from the Secretary of State to hon. Members who draw his attention to accusations that have been made in relation to what goes on in Castlereagh?

Dr. Mawhinney: Castlereagh is not notorious, and most people in Northern Ireland will join me in objecting to the hon. Gentleman's use of that word. Whenever allegations are made about Castlereagh, they are, of course, carefully considered.

Local Government

10. Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will set up an inquiry into the structure of local government in Northern Ireland.

Mr. Brooke: No, Sir. Issues relating to Northern Ireland local government would, however, be an entirely appropriate issue for discussion in any fresh political talks.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, as the all-party talks on the future administration of the Province are stalled, probably until after the general election, and as the previous review of local government in Northern Ireland took place more than 20 years ago, this is an ideal moment for an independent body to be asked to consider the structure and limited powers of present local authorities in terms of whether they meet the contemporary aspirations of people in Northern Ireland?

Mr. Brooke: All the constitutional political parties in Northern Ireland have, in recent weeks, given encouraging signs that they would wish to return to talks or to start fresh talks prior to the general election. If we were to do that, I would not rule out any particular proposed change to the role and structure of the district councils, but proposals for change would need to be likely to command widespread support and to provide an appropriate and fair role for both sides of the community.

Inward Investment

11. Mr. Stevens: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland if he will make a statement on the current levels of inward investment into Northern Ireland.

Mr. Needham: During the past financial year, the Industrial Development Board for Northern Ireland secured 13 inward investment projects, representing an investment of £9·9 million. Those projects are expected to create 1,294 jobs.

Mr. Stevens: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for that reply. I know that he appreciates the importance of infrastructure improvements to stimulate and encourage inward investment. Now that European Community funds are available to assist in that process, what success did our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State have in his dealings with Commissioner Millan over his request for support for the gas and electricity interconnectors from the mainland to Northern Ireland, which would reduce energy costs in the Province?

Mr. Needham: As my hon. Friend would expect, my right hon. Friend had considerable success in his negotiations with Commissioner Millan, who agreed in principle to help to fund those two crucially important infrastructure developments. I am delighted that, as a result of the Government's privatisation proposals, the outlook for Northern Ireland's electricity consumers is better than ever.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Butler: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 12 December.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major): This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall be having further meetings later today.

Mr. Butler: Will my right hon. Friend reassure the House that, by rejecting the social chapter, he is rejecting the strikers' friend and the creep of socialism?

The Prime Minister: Yes, I can give my hon. Friend that assurance. At the end of the 1970s, 29 million days were lost in strikes whereas only 2 million days were lost in strikes last year. I have no enthusiasm for returning to the sort of legislation that applied at that time.

Mr. Kinnock: Will the Prime Minister tell us why Chancellor Kohl and his fellow Conservative Heads of Government do not agree with him that, by adopting the social chapter, they will jeopardise jobs?

The Prime Minister: Because they do not have the trade union structure that we have in this country or the record of trade union militancy that so damaged this country in the 1970s and to which we have no intention whatsoever of returning. If the right hon. Gentleman begins to listen to what many employers elsewhere in Europe are saying, he will learn that they recognise that we made the right decisions.

Mr. Kinnock: What those Heads of Government do not have is a record of losing 768,000 jobs in their countries in the past 12 months. Four out of every five of the jobs that have been lost in the European Community in the past year have been lost in Britain because of the right hon. Gentleman's policies. He is the last person to be entitled to think of himself as a protector of jobs; he is the destroyer of jobs.

Mr. Major: Throughout the 1980s as a whole, more jobs were created in this country than in any other European country. Indeed, nearly as many jobs were created in this country as in the whole of the European Community. I need no lectures from the right hon. Gentleman about the social dimension. The social dimension to Europe was part of the Single European Act, against which the right hon. Gentleman voted.

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: May I congratulate my right hon. Friend on that record? Is he aware that Britain receives almost half the total investment coming into Europe from the United States of America and Japan and that many of the companies involved have the good sense to choose Wolverhampton and the rest of the west midlands? Does he agree that those companies choose to come to Britain because our taxes are low, our industrial relations are good and, most of all, our Government understand business? Does he agree that none of that would be the case if the Labour party was in charge?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is right in that diagnosis. She may have read the remarks made yesterday by the Association of British Chambers of Commerce, which made its position perfectly clear on the agreement at Maastricht. It said:

"There will be many continental businesses today envying their competitors in the United Kingdom."

That is because they understand that the decisions that we have taken are in the interests of British industry, British commerce and jobs for British workers.

Q2. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 12 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Patchett: Given the decision to opt out of the social charter in Europe—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."]— can the Prime Minister confirm that he is planning—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."]—to fight the next general election on the slogan "Vote Tory for the lowest wages, least consultation and worst employment protection in Europe"?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman—[HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."]—is in no position to talk about opt-outs, considering that his party has opted out of every necessary decision to assist this country in the past 10 years and has backed every inflationary wage claim, every piece of trade union militancy and every policy that would do damage to Britain and its future.

Mr. Wilkinson: Could my right hon. Friend find time today to think again about the significance of an historic referendum which took place in the Ukraine on 1 December, in which the people of Ukraine freely and democratically voted for their sovereignty and independence? Will Her Majesty's Government recognise the Government of Ukraine and show that they are on the side of democracy and freedom?

The Prime Minister: As my hon. Friend said, the referendum in Ukraine showed overwhelming support for the independence of Ukraine. [HON. MEMBERS: "Reading."] The Foreign Affairs Committee statement on 2 December gave the initial response from the European Community. We shall continue to consult——

Hon. Members: "Reading."

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House well knows the conventions here. It has always been in order for Ministers on the Front Bench to read their answers and it has never been in order for hon. Members to read their questions.

The Prime Minister: Most people would have regarded what is happening in the Soviet Union as a matter of some importance, not a matter for the fourth-form behaviour that we see on the Opposition Benches.

Q3. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 12 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. O'Brien: Will the Prime Minister confirm that because of his decision to opt out of the social charter— [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I cannot hear everything down here. Perhaps it is just as well.

Mr. O'Brien: Will the Prime Minister confirm that because of his decision to opt out of the social charter——

Hon. Members: He has said that. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. Gentleman want to ask a question or not? Please get on with it.

Mr. O'Brien rose—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is intolerable. Will the hon. Gentleman please ask his question.

Mr. O'Brien: Will the Prime Minister confirm that because of his action in opting out of the social charter, Great Britain will be the only country in Europe that will deny its people the legal right to paid holidays? Does not he feel ashamed of that?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman can know what we have agreed not to join. What we have agreed not to accept are the sort of damaging laws that nearly brought this country to its knees when we last had a Labour Government. That is what we are not prepared to accept. Matters such as the hon. Gentleman raised can be dealt with at present under the social dimension to which the British Government subscribe and against which the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) voted.

Q4. Mr. Hannam: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 12 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Hannam: I congratulate my right hon. Friend on helping to create a more outward-looking Europe. In that connection, and in view of the impending serious food shortages in the Soviet Union, may I ask whether he was able to take any initiatives at Maastricht to help move foodstuffs from the Community to the Russian people?

The Prime Minister: Yes, we were able to take such initiatives. The European Council reaffirmed its determination to act quickly to help the people of the Soviet Union and in particular those who live in the heavily populated areas of Moscow and St. Petersburg. A substantial package of help for the Soviet Union, totalling over $11 billion worth of emergency aid in 1991, has now been put in place by the Group of Seven, under my chairmanship, and the European Community. That includes new commitments of food and medical aid of over $4 billion. Logistical experts will be meeting shortly to ensure that that aid gets swiftly to those in need. I am pleased also to tell the House that the United Kingdom is sending £20 million worth of animal feed aid to St. Petersburg so that livestock need not be slaughtered this winter.

Mr. Ashdown: Is the Prime Minister aware that the Government's decision to pay the mortgage element of income support direct to lenders is a welcome but wholly insufficient response to the crisis facing thousands of families in Britain because of home repossessions? Does he not realise that unless he is prepared to be more imaginative—for instance, with schemes for converting mortgages to rents—we shall not avoid in the new year thousands of families facing misery, a further plunge in house prices and serious damage to the economy?

The Prime Minister: The Government are providing substantial help to those who risk losing their homes when they lose their jobs. As the right hon. Gentleman pointed out, we made new arrangements on 5 November to ensure that income support payments can be paid directly to the lender. The right hon. Gentleman may be interested to know that the Government are looking urgently with mortgage lenders at what further measures might be taken to protect those faced with repossession.

Sir Teddy Taylor: As one who joined the Leader of the Opposition in voting against the Single European Act, before the right hon. Gentleman became a Euro-fanatic, may I appeal to my right hon. Friend to warn the voters about the huge dangers to the much-improved labour relations of Britain if they were to vote into power any Government who were prepared to pass over the power to wreck our trade union reforms by majority vote in Brussels? Will he warn the British people of the damage that could be done to them and the danger to their way of life and democracy?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that if my hon. Friend maintains his position with his normal consistency, the day will come when the right hon. Member for Islwyn (Mr. Kinnock) will join him yet again in that view. On the substantive point, my hon. Friend will know that I agree with him, for I refused earlier this week to agree in Europe to the sort of laws that would have had the effect my hon. Friend sets out.

Q5. Mr. Livingstone to ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 12 December.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Livingstone: Will the Prime Minister take time today to meet the Home Secretary to discuss how the Government should respond to the letter they have received from the mayor of Conservative-controlled Bexley drawing attention to the 140 per cent. increase in racist attacks in the area since the British National party moved its headquarters into the area? One of those attacks involved the stabbing to death of Rolan Adams by a racist mob. How does the Prime Minister think that the Government can respond to the Mayor's request that Bexley council be given the power to close that fascist headquarters before more lives are lost?

The Prime Minister: I was not aware of that incident, but I deplore such racist attacks without any reservation whatsoever. I will certainly discuss that incident with my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Rowe: The channel tunnel is about to become a major part of the United Kingdom infrastructure. Will my right hon. Friend look with his Cabinet colleagues at the fact that Kent is receiving considerable capital-infrastructure funds but virtually all of that money is going on projects linked to the channel tunnel, to the great detriment of Kent's other needs?

The Prime Minister: My hon. Friend is a powerful advocate for his constituency and for Kent generally. I will certainly examine the point that he raises.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): Will the Leader of the House please tell us the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John MacGregor): The business for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 16 DECEMBER and TUESDAY 17 DECEMBER—Remaining stages of the Local Government Finance Bill.

WEDNESDAY 18 DECEMBER and THURSDAY 19 DECEMBER—Debate on the outcome of the European Council at Maastricht on a Government motion.

FRIDAY 20 DECEMBER—Debates on the Adjournment.

The House will also wish to know that European Standing Commitee B will meet at 10.30 am on Wednesday 18 December to consider the unnumbered explanatory memorandum relating to the dignity of women and men at work.

[Relevant report of European Legislation Committee HC 24-iii (1991-92)]

Mr. Grocott: Is the Leader of the House aware that we are not at all happy about the way in which time is being allocated for debates which the Opposition choose? We had an Opposition day last Thursday, on 5 December. There is none this week, there will be none next week, and we then have the three-week Christmas recess, so the earliest possible date for a debate will be the second week in January. We fully understand that the Government will not want us to pick subjects for debate in the run-up to the general election. Perhaps the Government are beginning to clear the decks for the general election, which of course we would warmly welcome. However, we should not be deprived of our time meanwhile.

Can the right hon. Gentleman give us an absolute assurance that there will be an Opposition day in the first week of our return, when we can have a debate on a subject of our choosing?

In view of yesterday's figures on homelessness, showing that no fewer than 60,000 people are in temporary accommodation and will be, presumably, throughout the Christmas period—an increase of 33 per cent. on last year—can the right hon. Gentleman undertake to arrange for a Cabinet Minister to make a statement on the crisis of homelessness one day next week? We know that there is to be a debate later tonight, but that is not enough.

May we have a specific day on which we can debate conditions of employment throughout Europe, not as part of the European debate on Wednesday and Thursday next week? Now that we know that the Government's platform is to argue that British working conditions should be the worst in Europe, we want an opportunity to discuss—[Interruption.] Tory Members do not like this, but they will hear a lot of it before the general election. We want an opportunity to demonstrate our agreement with virtually all other informed public opinion in Europe that good working conditions lead to efficiency and higher productivity. Until the Government understand this, we shall keep pressing it.

Mr. MacGregor: On the first point, we are very happy to have Opposition days, when we can exploit all the divisions and difficulties in Opposition policies. However, this week, with the agreement, I think, of the whole House, we are anxious to get the Aggravated Vehicle-Taking Bill through. Then there are all the various debates which we are obliged to have before Christmas and which have to be taken this week. That is why I was unable to suggest a Suppy day this week.

I believe that the House regards it important to have two days next week on Maastricht. It is also very important to get the Local Government Finance Bill through the House before Christmas. That is why we have to deal with it next week. It is a question for the usual channels, but I shall certainly bear in mind the hon. Gentleman's request for a Supply day fairly soon after we get back.

On homelessness, the hon. Gentleman will know well that the Government have taken many initiatives. Over three years, about £100 million is being spent on providing accommodation for the homeless in London where there is a heavy concentration of the problem because many people come to London. The hon. Gentleman will know that that initiative is having substantial and beneficial effects. I cannot promise him a debate next week, for the reasons which I have already given.

Conditions of employment throughout Europe can certainly be debated next Wednesday and Thursday. All my right hon. and hon. Friends will be happy to have that topic debated next week, when we can draw attention to the British conditions and traditions and the dangers of militant union leadership which we saw so clearly throughout the 1970s. The employment aspects of the social chapter could be very damaging to conditions of employment here. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will agree that lost jobs are the thing most of all that people in this country would not wish to see. That could well follow from some aspects of the social chapter. I would be happy for the matter to be debated next week.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I remind the House that this is a private Members' day, with an Adjournment motion and a number of important subjects to be debated under the Consolidated Fund Bill. I ask hon. Members to confine their questions to business next week and not to refer to general matters which may be raised later.

Mr. Norman Tebbit (Chingford): Will my right hon. Friend resist the claim for a separate debate in the House about conditions of employment on the continent of Europe? Surely that is not within the sovereign control of the House. Would it not be odd to accede to the request of the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott) since he wishes to give control over these matters to another assembly and to take it away from the House? Is not my right hon. Friend right to say that those matters can be referred to peripherally in the very welcome debate which we shall have next Wednesday and Thursday?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend except on one point: I do not think that the matter would necessarily be peripheral to the debate next week because it is an important aspect of the successful conclusion to the negotiations which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister achieved. I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend on his other points, which is why I have resisted the request from the Opposition for a separate debate.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): The Leader of the House will be aware that last night there was an extensive debate on the fishing industry. In the busy schedule for next week, will he be able to ensure that there will be a report back from the Fisheries Council, because the matter is of such great importance to many of our constituents?

Mr. MacGregor: I fully understand the point that the hon. Lady makes. She is right about the importance of the matter. I hope that we will be able to have a statement on the outcome of the Fisheries Council. I warn her, however, that it may be late in the week.

Mr. John Butcher (Coventry, South-West): May I agree with the request of the deputy shadow Leader of the House for a debate on social chapter style costs of employment? As we saw yesterday, there is a fundamental misunderstanding of what is going on in Europe. It is only in recent years that French and German employment creators have started to complain bitterly about the loss of competitiveness which they are suffering as a result of social chapter style reforms in their countries. As the matter is so key to the European debate, surely we should have a separate debate next week, preceding the full debate on Europe.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think that is possible. I am sure my hon. Friend agrees with me that we want to get the Local Government Finance Bill through on Monday and Tuesday. The point that he is making is very important. I hope to allow extended time for the debate on Wednesday to enable the social chapter and other points relating to the Maastricht outcome to be discussed by as many hon. Members as possible.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): As there will almost certainly be a challenge to the European Court of Justice over Britain's opting out of the social charter, will one of the Law Officers be present during next week's two-day debate? This is an important matter and a Law Officer should be given an opportunity to assess the challenge that will almost certainly be made to the European Court.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not agree with the premise, so it will not be necessary for a Law Officer to be present. However, if the point is raised, one of my right hon. Friends will be perfectly happy to respond to it.

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): I thank my right hon. Friend for agreeing to extend the debate on Wednesday night. Will he take this opportunity to confirm that it is not compulsory for Privy Councillors to speak in the debate, particularly not those who spoke last time?

Mr. MacGregor: That is a matter for my right hon. Friends and for you, Mr. Speaker. I am very sympathetic to the matter, however, and understand the great importance of the two-day debate next week. That is why I propose that the debate on the first day should continue until 2 am.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a debate next week on the important celebration that will take place on 1 January, when badges such as the one I am wearing manufactured from discarded Soviet and American missiles will be sold to raise money for world disaster relief? Should not that cause be highlighted and debated in the House?

Mr. MacGregor: I cannot give Government time for that matter next week, beyond what I have offered.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): My I direct the attention of the Leader of the House to early-day motion 365?

[That this House notes the role of Robert Maxwell in providing employment, funds or both to officials and associates of the Labour Party, including Sir Tom McCaffrey, Joe Haines, Nick Grant and Helen Liddell; observes that, had Labour won a General Election, they would doubtless have transferred their skills from running one man's rickety empire to running the country; notes further that contributions in cash and kind have been made from this source towards running the Labour Party; and calls for full explanations, appropriate disgorgement and compensation to the unfortunate pensioners of the Maxwell organisation.]

Will it be possible to fit in a debate next week on links between the Labour party and the late Robert Maxwell? That would prove to the country that there is no difference between them, in the sense that they both like to spend other people's money.

Mr. MacGregor: I have noted the early-day motion. I shall not comment on the first part of my hon. Friend's question, but there will be plenty of opportunities in tomorrow's debate for the second part to be raised. I suspect that it will also be in order to raise various aspects of the Mirrior Group affair. I draw attention to the point that my hon. Friend rightly raises about the willingness of the Labour party to spend other people's money on every problem, which is why it is now saddled with such a high expenditure commitment. I agree with my hon. Friend that that could be raised tomorrow.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): Will the Leader of the House find time next week to allow the Secretary of State for Transport to make a statement on the deplorable service in the north-east of England on the InterCity east coast line? Millions of pounds have been spent on electrification and the service is appalling. People are waiting 11 hours for trains to reach their destinations and trains are being cancelled. Will the Secretary of State for Transport make a statement on what he intends to do about the problem?

Mr. MacGregor: I understand the recent difficulties. As the hon. Gentleman says, there has been a substantial capital investment programme. I shall draw the matter to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport, but I cannot promise a statement because the House will be anxious to spend as much time as possible next week on the Local Government Finance Bill, which has a timetable, and on the important two-day debate on European matters on Wednesday and Thursday.

Mr. Hugh Dykes (Harrow, East): Is the Leader of the House aware that hon. Members were grateful for the speed with which the original Maastricht text and the amendments thereto were made available yesterday? When will the consolidated text be made available?

Mr. MacGregor: I understand the point that my hon. Friend makes and I am grateful for his acknowledgment of the speed with which the latest texts were placed in the Vote Office and the Library. I hope and am informed that the consolidated texts on both the political and monetary union aspects—they will not be consolidated together but a text will be consolidated for each—will be available on Monday. We shall ensure that they are in the Vote Office and Library as soon as possible.

Mr. Eddie McGrady (South Down): Is the Leader of the House aware that no statement has been made in the past week by the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland about the fact that all capital expenditure in Northern Ireland has been frozen for the rest of the financial year? No statement has been made to the House, no information has been given to hon. Members from Northern Ireland, and no debate has yet taken place on the appropriations. The measure affects housing, hospital, health and education programmes. If the capital expenditure is to be suspended until 1 April, will the Leader of the House, as a matter of grave urgency, give at least an hour next week for a statement or a debate on this important matter, which is affecting every aspect of life in Northern Ireland?

Mr. MacGregor: I cannot promise Government time on that matter next week. As I was not present earlier, I do not know whether the issue was raised during questions. However, I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): Will my right hon. Friend find time next week for a debate on the responsibilities of non-executive directors? Does he recall the debate in another place on 31 January last, in which Lord Williams of Elvel and Lord Donoughue lectured the Government on that subject——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman is out of order.

Mr. Wardle: I simply wish to say that both those Lords have been directors of Maxwell companies which filched their——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): What about Lord Rippon and Lord Havers?

Mr. Speaker: Order. Leave it to me, please. If hon. Members wish to criticise Members of the other place, it must be done by a motion.

Mr. Wardle: I wonder whether my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House will find time next week for a debate so that those subjects may be aired in this House in the interests of the pensioners of the Maxwell companies whose funds have been filched?

Mr. MacGregor: As you, Mr. Speaker, have already said, there will be opportunities this afternoon and during the Consolidated Fund debates this evening for those matters to be raised.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Will you ask the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle) to withdraw the comment that he made at the end of his question? Will the hon. Gentleman repeat what he said?

Mr. Speaker: I am not asking the hon. Member for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle) to do that. I understood him to say that funds had been "filched"—not a word that I would use. The hon. Gentleman did not imply that the noble Lords had done it.

Mr. Wardle: If I did, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that. I simply wished to say that they were directors of the companies from which those funds disappeared.

Mr. Speaker: That is nearly as bad. I think that I had better call Mr. Nellist.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Will the Leader of the House find time for a full debate on early-day motion 352?

[That this House recognises that this year's Christmas bonus, first paid to pensioners in 1972, would need to be £82·20 to match the increase in earnings since then; and calls for its immediate increase to restore its original value.]

Is he aware of figures given to me recently by the Department of Social Security that show that, if the conditions of 1989 are repeated this year, the number of pensioners who die this month, compared to the average number who die in July, will be 31,000? Why is it that, after 12 years of the Conservative Government and their economic policies, so many pensioners have to choose between food and fuel? If last night's temperatures are repeated, 1,000 of them a night will lose that battle.

Mr. MacGregor: Unless I am misinformed, I think that early-day motion 352 relates to the Christmas bonus. The hon. Gentleman will know that the Government have paid the Christmas bonus throughout their years of office, unlike the Labour party when it was in government.

On the hon. Gentleman's wider point, there have been substantial improvements in the vast majority of pensioners' living standards in the past decade or more. On the issue of meeting fuel costs, he will know that the schemes that we have introduced have been extended, which will be of great benefit to many people if we have cold weather.

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): Having chided my right hon. Friend for the inadequacy of time available for the European debate before the Maastricht settlement, may I warn him that, despite the additional hours that he has allowed, there is likely to be even more dissatisfaction on this occasion, as the overwhelming majority of my right hon. and hon. Friends will wish to participate in the debate to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on the tremendous success that he has achieved?

Mr. MacGregor: It was because I was conscious of the requests from many of my hon. Friends and some Opposition Members for plenty of time for the debate that I have extended the time available. I am happy to accept my hon. Friend's chiding on this occasion, because the reason that he gave for it is one of which I entirely approve and fully support.

Mr. John P. Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): Will the Leader of the House find time next week for a debate so that we might consider whether legislation should be introduced to compel record companies to place warning labels on recorded material that is unsuitable for children, especially in the light of the irresponsible decision by EMI not to do so? If we fail to do that, there is a danger that there will be a repeat of what happened to my constituent, Mrs. K. Morris of Barry, who unknowingly purchased for her 10-year-old son, and in the presence of her seven-year-old daughter, a cassette which contained the most foul and obscene language. [Interruption.] I am sure that everyone believes that Parliament has a duty to protect mothers and fathers who want to exercise parental guidance and judgment, even if some Conservative Members do not. Will the Leader of the House carefully consider this important issue?

Mr. MacGregor: I think that my hon. Friends were referring to a different matter from that to which the hon. Gentleman believed they were referring. Of course I understand his concern. We all wish to ensure that children are protected by their parents from such incidents as he mentioned, although I cannot comment on the particular case because I do not know about the incident. However, I cannot find Government time for such a debate next week. If he wishes to raise the matter in detail, he must find an opportunity himself.

Mr. David Sumberg (Bury, South): May we have a debate next week on safety in the home, which would give me an opportunity to point out to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry how vital it is to adopt the practice that is prevalent on the continent of having moulded-on plugs for electrical appliances? At the same time, it would give me the opportunity to salute the excellent campaign run by The Mail on Sunday, which is urging the Secretary of State to allow that to happen.

Mr. MacGregor: I think that my hon. Friend has already made his point.

Mr. Archy Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): Will the Leader of the House allow Government time in the very near future for a debate on the future of the textile industry? Does he acknowledge that, even in areas such as south-east Scotland and at the high value end of the textile industry, there are substantial factory closures and redundancies? The importance of the general agreement on tariffs and trade negotiations and of the Uruguay round to the future of the industry is recognised by all hon. Members, and it would be a good thing if the Government could find time for a debate in the near future.

Mr. MacGregor: I know the importance of the GATT round to the textile industry. As the hon. Gentleman knows, the basis for agreement of the Uruguay round needs to be established by the end of the year. It is now known that the GATT director general, Mr. Dunkel, has announced his intention to table a comprehensive paper embodying the results of the negotiations of all the issues, including textiles, on 20 December. We must all hope that that will enable the round to be concluded formally early in the new year.

As the hon. Gentleman also knows, there has been an agreement to extend the multi-fibre arrangement on textiles for another year in the event of that timetable not being met, but I should have thought that the time to consider a discussion of that matter in the House would be when we know how the GATT negotiations are going.

Mr. Andrew Mitchell (Gedling): Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to study an as yet largely unnoticed declaration to the treaty on the protection of animals and which was included at the special behest of the British Government? Would it not be widely welcomed by our constituents who care deeply about animal welfare, and should not the important success of the British Government be given some prominence in the debate next week on the Maastricht treaty?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree with my hon. Friend, and I am sure that he will wish to go further and to draw attention to the recent success of right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food in the successful outcome to the negotiations on the directives, which involved, among other matters, the export of live horses.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): Will the Leader of the House accept my apologies for being unduly patient with the profligacy of the Government—especially of the Secretary of State for Scotland—in relation to the Sheriff Kearney inquiry into social work in Fife? May we have a statement before the recess on why an inquiry costing £600,000 to the Scottish Office and £1,350,000 to Fife—nearly £2 million in total—has not printed one word and on why we have no sign of when Sheriff Kearney will report? May we have an urgent statement from the Secretary of State for Scotland on that matter?

Mr. MacGregor: Most hon. Members would want us to restrict oral statements next week to those that are most urgent, given that we have a timetable on the first two days and an extremely important debate on the next two. I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's point to the attention of my right hon. Friend, but I would not want to hold out hope of an oral statement.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): In business questions last week, my right hon. Friend heard calls for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make a statement about what and when the Government knew of the serious allegations made against Maxwell Communication Corporation, dating back to December 1990. As the Secretary of State has not made such a statement, can my right hon. Friend confirm that he has not been deterred or fixed by the Opposition, who are clearly worried by the fact that not only is the legal adviser to Mirror Group Newspapers a former Labour Member of Parliament but a director of MGN is the deputy leader of the Labour party in another place——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Business question time is not an opportunity to make that sort of allegation. We are asking about the business for next week.

Mr. Allason: Will my right hon. Friend arrange for the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to come to the House, undeterred by calls from the Opposition, to make a full statement on Mirrorgate?

Mr. MacGregor: If and when it is appropriate for my right hon. Friend to do so, I am sure he will. As my hon. Friend knows, these matters are the subject of an inquiry by the Serious Fraud Office and by IMRO, the Investment Management Regulatory Organisation, and they will draw to the attention of my right hon. Friend any matters that they feel should be drawn to his attention.

Mr. Max Madden (Bradford, West): Will the Leader of the House arrange for a statement next week giving more information, following the Prime Minister's welcome announcement today that additional help will be given to those on benefit who are experiencing difficulties in repaying mortgages? I ask on behalf of constituents living in Hanover square in Bradford, many of whom are pensioners on low incomes or are unemployed. Having sold their homes for £1 to the British Heritage housing trust, they are extremely angry because they cannot afford to buy them back at prices of up to £51,000. May we have a full statement on the help being given to those having difficulty in repaying mortgages? I hope that that will help my constituents to buy back the homes that they are occupying.

Mr. MacGregor: That is a rather different matter from the one to which my right hon. Friend was responding. If and when a statement is to be made, I am sure it will be made as quickly as possible.

Mr. Michael Irvine (Ipswich): In 1987, the late Robert Maxwell took control of Ransomes and Rapier, a long-established Ipswich company. Five months later he closed it down. It now appears that, not content with robbing several hundred of my constituents of their jobs——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but he is making a statement. Will he relate it to the business for next week, or raise it later tonight?

Mr. Irvine: I certainly will. It now appears that this socialist millionaire, having robbed several hundred of my constituents of their jobs, went on to plunder their pension funds. I ask my right hon. Friend for an assurance that before long we will have a full day to debate pension funds and how best to protect them against the depredations of unscrupulous directors and negligent trustees.

Mr. MacGregor: I have noted my hon. Friend's request for a debate on these matters in due course. As you, Mr. Speaker, have said, some of those issues can be debated later today.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Will the Leader of the House arrange for the Attorney-General to come to the House next week to make a statement on Sunday trading? I know that he has already made one, but there is a national outcry at the way in which the Government, including the Attorney-General and the Prime Minister, are standing by while there is an outbreak of lawlessness among the multinationals on Sunday trading. Does the Leader of the House realise that without such a statement many people outside the House will conclude that the Government's inertia and double standards in allowing such lawlessness are not unconnected with the large contributions which B and Q has made to the Tory party?

Mr. MacGregor: That is a disgraceful allegation which has nothing to do with the issue. "Lawlessness" is an inappropriate word to use because the state of the law is now being considered by the highest court in the land. The hon. Gentleman knows that my right hon. and learned Friend made a full statement to the House the other day, and I see no need for one next week.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Will my right hon. Friend arrange for an early debate on the public funding of Opposition parties in this place? There now seems to be a need for public funding for Militant Tendency in this place. If that were true, it would encourage not just the hon. Members for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) and for Liverpool, Broadgreen (Mr. Fields) but other Labour Members who are closet Militants to come out of the closet. The Opposition parties would be grateful because they are likely to remain in opposition for a long time.

Mr. MacGregor: I notice that my hon. Friend is due to initiate a Consolidated Fund debate on that very issue tonight, and I hope that we reach it.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): Further to the comments made by the hon. Member for South Down (Mr. McGrady), with which I agree, on the extraordinary moratorium on public sector contracts in Northern Ireland which will hit hard several important health projects in my constituency as well as being a poor Christmas present to the construction industry, is the Leader of the House aware that the excuse given by the Northern Ireland Office for that remarkable action is that criminal damage claims have run between £10 million and £15 million higher than budgeted for, a figure which ought to be within the scope of the contingency fund or covered by the many billions of pounds of additional public spending announced recently by the Government, is literally incredible? Is it not more likely that the Northern Ireland Office's finances are in a mess, underlining the need for a Select Committee on Northern Ireland?

Mr. MacGregor: I have already made clear many times the position on the Select Committee. I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's first point to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Has my right hon. Friend noted the decision of the parents of St. George's school, Gravesend, by a majority of nine to one, to become grant-maintained, and the same decision of two other schools by similar majorities? Therefore, may we have a debate on the management of schools which will enable us to highlight the Opposition's policy to overrule the decision of the parents in those schools, to claw back education funds to the centralised bureaucracy and, while we are about it, highlight the Opposition's policy to destroy the two excellent grammar schools in Gravesend?

Mr. MacGregor: As an enthusiast for and advocate of grant-maintained schools, I entirely agree with my hon. Friend. I am sure that he will take every opportunity to express his points locally because, in so doing, he is clearly very much on the side of the parents and the extra choice that we are now giving in education as well as the raising of standards.

Dr. Norman A. Godman (Greenock and Port Glasgow): The Leader of the House mentioned that European Standing Committee B, of which I am a hard-pressed member, is to meet next week. Will he confirm that the Procedure Committee will be publishing its report on the modus operandi of that Committee and European Standing Committee A? May we have as soon as possible a statement on the right hon. Gentleman's reaction to that report in order, among other things, to give some sustenance to the members of those two Committees? I am not talking about financial sustenance. We need assistance to deal effectively with a work load which, I suspect, will increase during the next few months.

Mr. MacGregor: I thank the hon. Gentleman and all right hon. and hon. Members who serve on those two Committees, which are doing a valuable job in a more effective way than was done previously. That is the general conclusion that I am reaching from all the reactions that I am receiving.

I look forward to receiving the report of the Select Committee on Procedure, and agree with the hon. Gentleman that, depending of course on what it says, we ought to see whether any further measures could be taken to assist the Standing Committees in their work. As the hon. Gentleman knows, it is an interim review. We have had only comparatively short experience, and no doubt we will look more widely in due course. I look forward to receiving the report.

Mr. Andrew MacKay (Berkshire, East): Is my right hon. Friend aware that a significant number of my right hon. and hon. Friends are bitterly disappointed that during today's Consolidated Fund Bill debate only one and a half hours have been allocated to discussing pension funds? We would wish to pursue further the criminal frauds committed by Robert Maxwell and others associated with the Daily Mirror. In particular, I ask my right hon. Friend to find time next week to allow us to pursue the role played by Mr. Joe Haines, sometime press officer of a Labour Prime Minister, an executive director of Mirror Group Newspapers——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think that he is also a peer—[Interruption.] No, he is not a peer.

Mr. MacKay: I hope, Mr. Speaker, that he never will be. In addition to being an executive director of Mirror Group Newspapers, Mr. Haines cringingly wrote the authorised biography of the late Robert Maxwell, in which he threw out of the window what little journalistic integrity he ever had.

Mr. MacGregor: It is clear that there is considerable interest and concern in the House about that matter. I know that the Consolidated Fund Bill allows for only a short debate, but there will be other opportunities for raising the matter, including tomorrow.

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): Is the Leader of the House aware that decisions will be taken in Brussels on 18 December about the permitted level of support for the shipbuilding industry in Europe? Has any consideration been given to allowing right hon. and hon. Members to express an opinion on that matter, either on the Floor of the House or in European Standing Committee B? If not, can the Leader of the House at least persuade the silent Department of Trade and Industry to say something on the subject?

Mr. MacGregor: I will look into the point and will write to the hon. Lady.

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): My right hon. Friend intimated that the House cannot expect a statement on Sunday trading next week. Will he give an assurance that there will soon be a full day's debate so that the House can clarify its view, if that is possible, on Sunday trading?

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think that I can give that assurance in the near future, because my right hon. Friend the Minister of State, Home Office is continuing with her discussions. The House has been expressing its view quite a bit recently, such as on the two statements that we had. I would not necessarily say that it clarified its view. Certainly I felt that it made it clear that there were still strongly divided views in the House.

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): The business of the House for next week means that we will yet again have a 10 o'clock vote on a Thursday. When the Leader of the House came to the Select Committee on Procedure when it was considering the sittings of the House, he tried to reassure us that right hon. and hon. Members with constituencies some distance from London would, through the usual channels, be able to return to their constituencies to conduct their business at weekends. As the right hon. Gentleman has already heard, we from the north are already having exceptional difficulty in travelling to and from London on public transport. There have been six votes at 10 o'clock on a Thursday evening since the right hon. Gentleman told us that that would not happen.

Mr. Speaker: Order. With great respect to the hon. Lady, what does that have to do with next week's business? Will she ask a question about that?

Ms. Armstrong: It has to do with the way in which the Leader of the House organises the business of the House. He is making it exceptionally difficult, given the commitment that he made to the Procedure Select Committee, for some right hon. and hon. Members to fulfil their responsibilities as Members of Parliament to their constituencies and to the House.

Mr. MacGregor: I did not give any commitment to the Select Committee; that was not the purpose of the evidence. I made known a number of personal views, proposals, and recommendations for the Committee to consider. It is now for the Committee to do that, and to report to the House. I indicated also that, wherever possible, we endeavour—including through the usual channels—to assist right hon. and hon. Members representing constituencies well away from London to return to them on Thursday evening. However, it is not always possible to arrange that. I hope that the hon. Lady understands that next week's debate is of great significance, and I cannot believe that Members of Parliament feel that it would not be right to have that debate and the 10 o'clock vote on Thursday.

Mr. Tim Devlin (Stockton, South): I shall be happy to vote in the hon. Lady's stead.

The Tees and Hartlepool port authority is currently being privatised. The board will decide on the preferred bidder on Monday, and the Government will make a statement on Thursday, but we shall have no opportunity to debate the matter in the House. May we have a statement on Monday or Tuesday?

The Institute of Terrestrial Ecology in Banchory was destroyed by fire on 4 December. So far no statement has been made about its future. May we have such a statement?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall have to discuss the hon. Gentleman's second question with my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science. As for his first question, the Tees and Hartlepool port authority is the vendor in the current privatisation, and it is for the authority to assess bids for the port in the light of its objectives of sale and then to decide which bid to recommend. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport will, I know, consider that recommendation carefully, but the decision will be his; I cannot anticipate it, or the exact time when he will make it.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunningham, North): We are now entering the coldest spell of the year. Once again, statistics show that the mortality rate among elderly people in cold conditions, whose homes lack heating facilities, is higher here than in any other European country.

Opposition Members wish that European standards in this regard could be imported. May we have a debate—not towards the end of the year, when conditions will have changed, but now, while the problem is urgent and immediate—about the effectiveness of support systems for elderly people in cold weather, and the possibility of delivering the pittance that is, potentially, available now, in time for it to have an effect? Can the House possibly be faced with a more urgent subject than that of the thousands of pensioners who will die in the weeks ahead because of a natural element against which this prosperous society has proved incapable of protecting them?

Mr. MacGregor: There is no need for a statement on cold weather payments. The Government introduced those payments, and they have also introduced significant improvements for this winter. All those eligible will be paid automatically and quickly. We also have the facility to base payments on forecasts made by the Meteorological Office, as well as on recorded information. The capital rule has been abolished, and 400,000 more people will be eligible as a result. The links with weather stations have also been improved. No statement is necessary; the Government have done the right thing, and they have already acted.

Mr. John Browne (Winchester): May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to early-day motion 373?

[That this House, aware that as a result of the recent agreement at Maastricht the United Kingdom will now move inevitably, despite an 'opt-in' clause, towards a single European currency which will replace the present European composite currency or ecu; recognises that such a new single currency will be heavily influenced by Germany and that its naming is of great importance; suggests the name of Karl, derived from Karl der Grosse or Charlemagne, who in early times achieved the unification of much of Europe; notes that the monetary sign of ₭, like £, is unique and therefore well fitted to take its place beside the $ and ¥; and urges Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer to put this initiative to his colleagues at the European Council of Ministers.]

Does he accept that the naming of a new single European currency is a matter of considerable importance? Please may we have a specific debate to consider that important matter so that we can present a well-considered British suggestion to our European colleagues?

Mr. MacGregor: I have no doubt that my hon. Friend will wish to make his own suggestions, and he will be able to do so next week. I do not think, however, that I can give a time for a specific debate on that one item.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): May we have a debate on the future of the bus and commercial vehicle manufacturing industry, particularly in the light of Volvo's decision to close Britain's principal bus manufacturing plant, which is in Workington? Does the Leader of the House agree that it is not for private companies to decide to close strategic parts of British industry, and that it is for a British Government to be fully consulted and to be part of such decisions?

Mr. MacGregor: If the hon. Gentleman is recommending direct intervention in particular commercial decisions, I do not agree with him. Obviously, I have great sympathy for all who have been affected by the closure, but it is for the hon. Gentleman to look for opportunities to speak. I know that he has already tried, but other opportunities are available. I cannot promise a debate next week.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House make a statement next week about the plight of the homeless? We shall not be occupying this place for three weeks during the Christmas recess. Why does not the right hon. Gentleman make a decent gesture, instead of just talking? Why does he not throw open the doors of Parliament to the homeless of London? There is plenty of heat and plenty of light here; there are plenty of places to sleep—plenty of empty Benches. There are catering facilities, and there is plenty of security.

I think that it is high time that the Government did something about homelessness, instead of just talking about it. Open the doors—or will the Government opt out of that as well?

Mr. MacGregor: We have already acted, rather than talking about it, and have provided substantial additional facilities for the homeless in London.

Adjournment (Christmas)

Mr. Speaker: I remind hon. Members that on the motion for the Adjournment of the House on Friday 20 December up to nine Members may raise with Ministers subjects of their own choice. Applications should reach my office by 10 pm on Monday next. A ballot will be held on Tuesday morning, and the result made known as soon as possible thereafter.

BILL PRESENTED

Protection of Pension Funds and Investments

Mr. Kenneth Hind presented a Bill to require that trustees of pension funds and investments shall be independent of the employer company concerned; to require trustees to furnish annual reports and accounts to contributors and beneficiaries; to give contributors and beneficiaries additional rights in respect of the control and ownership of pension fund assets; to limit pension fund investment in the employer company; to afford other protection to pension fund contributors and beneficiaries; and for connected purposes: And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time on 31 January 1992 and to be printed. [Bill 42.]

Adjournment (Christmas)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That this House at its rising on Friday 20th December do adjourn until Monday 13th January 1992.—[Mr. MacGregor.]

4.15 pm

Sir John Stokes (Halesowen and Stourbridge): The theme of my speech is the grievous shortage of officers in all walks of life in this country—except, of course, in the armed forces of the Crown—and, more generally, to consider the state of the nation after the settlement reached at Maastricht, to enumerate the good and bad points of our institutions and our society, and to try to find out where remedies can put things right.

Constant visits to Europe over many years have made me realise more and more how different England is from nations on the continent. We are an island, unconquered for 900 years, and we still look to the great sea routes of the world, and to our cousins in America, as well as to our close neighbours on the continent.

Our whole history and background are different from those of most continental countries. We have had, on the whole, a long and peaceful history here. We have not had the appalling revolutions or wars which have so disfigured continental nations. We much value our Houses of Parliament, in contrast with the low esteem in which continental assemblies are often held. Not only our constitution but our laws are different from those of other nations. We have not had a Code Napoleon.

Until recently, we had a hierarchical and conservative society, with the great lords living on their estates—not at court in Versailles, as they were in France—and the small squires running the villages where they knew the people and their way of life intimately.

We have had few riots in this country, and no fighting for hundreds of years. In short, we are a quiet, kind, politically mature people who have learned over the centuries to live together. We are proud of our history and our traditions; our monarchy is greatly beloved.

In my view, our best institutions are the armed forces of the Crown. The Navy and the Army, of course, are very old, and the Royal Air Force, although founded only in 1918, has fully carried on their ideals. The hallmarks of the armed services of the Crown are chivalry, truthfulness, honesty, integrity and loyalty. Those are not always found in other occupations. The armed forces perform magnificently whenever called upon to do so, and when their members retire they are highly respected in civilian society.

As we all know, the forces consist of officers, non-commissioned officers and other ranks. Those clearly separate roles are not usually found in other organisations —sometimes I wish that they were. We instantly know what the rank stands for. We know where we are, and we are never let down. Unfortunately, we do not always find such high standards in the other great institutions of the state or in the main professions.

We in this House should hold to the highest standards ourselves, and try to keep others up to the mark.

Most of the nation spends several hours a day looking at television screens and reading newspapers. How degrading the tabloid press has become. On television, the swearing and sexual licence is unacceptable. In the tabloid press, the emphasis on sex and sexual misbehaviour is nauseating. Unfortunately, the Church of England, that great institution established by law, fails to reprove those tendencies and even appears unable to control homosexuality among its own clergy. The bishops no longer, alas, have the respect that they used to have and the Church seems to fail to recruit the best men in the land for its clergy.

We find a further tragedy with education. Over the past generation, so-called progressive methods of teaching have meant that many children now leave school being unble to read, to write or to do simple arithmetic. Those responsible were sinning against the light and it will take another generation to get things right.

In the old days, Oxford and Cambridge and our great universities were admired throughout the world. It is a mistake to try now to increase the number of university students and to pretend that the polytechnics, which have a different, but most vital, role to play, are the same as universities.

The public schools have maintained their standards and are still a nursery of leaders. It would be far better if we were to increase the number of our public schools, even with the assistance of some taxpayers' money, rather than to continue to produce what some people fear are half-baked intellectuals in enlarged universities. We should also extend the assisted places scheme which has been so successful.

The amount of crime, especially violent crime, is a blot on our society. Responsibility for that must lie to a great extent with how young people are brought up. Parents, teachers and clergy bear a heavy responsibility.

There was less dishonesty in high places when I was a young man and virtually none in the City of London. Unfortunately, the Maxwell case is only one of a long line in recent years of crime on a massive scale in financial circles.

We constantly find examples of poor management in some of our largest institutions. The banks, which seem to lend millions of pounds to doubtful Governments in South America, to property companies and, I am afraid to say, to corrupt financiers, often seem rude and unhelpful to ordinary customers who badly need the money to help them to carry on their businesses.

British Rail, the Post Office and the management of the health service—not the doctors and nurses—are of varying quality. If anything goes wrong in British Rail or in the Post Office, it is unusual to see anyone about above the rank of lance-corporal.

My solution to all those problems is to try to educate, to train and to recruit more officers and leaders, as in the armed services, who can take charge in almost every walk of life. We should also cherish the House of Lords, especially the younger Lords who are coming on. The Lords are independent and highly respected, and always possess the most perfect manners.

We need better men in British industry if we are to compete on level terms with Germany, with the United States and with Japan. A career in industry should be as much respected as a career in the City.

We all know that the police face appalling challenges today. I am glad that they are highly paid, and they deserve all our sympathy and support. However, what is lacking, as I have said so often, is an officer class. The Home Office should insist on the refounding of the Hendon police college as it was under Lord Trenchard where officers were recruited and trained for leadership and the highest positions.

We know from recent opinion polls that English people are still highly patriotic and that many more here in these islands are prepared to die for their country than is the case on the continent of Europe.

That deep, abiding patriotism is still found among the mass of the working people. The middle class, of which most of the country is now composed, still keeps high standards in that respect. However, it now unfortunately includes a number of over-educated intellectuals who believe in nothing and wish to destroy all that we hold most dear.

One can have too much democracy. We are not all equal in our abilities. We must pay more attention to finding and choosing those who will become our leaders. The old grammar schools did the job so well—as well as the public schools—until, alas, they were abolished. Let us hope that some grammar schools can now be re-established.

When educating and training our leaders in society, we must ask what is our national purpose. What are we aiming at in our daily lives? We are a mature people, as I said earlier. Sometimes we are inclined to be lazy, but we are capable of great exertions in times of crisis. We now live in a highly competitive world. We must be as good at business as our competitors on the continent and elsewhere.

Of course we must defend the nation properly and keep law and order. We must maintain moral standards and ensure that our children are properly educated. It is important that in every walk of life we should articulate where we are going and where we are trying to go.

I learnt some of those principles as a young officer serving under General Montgomery both on the staff and in the field. We all knew what the object was and what we had to do. Above all, everyone was put in the picture.

In an organisation it is the people who matter most. Their performance can be improved enormously by proper training, example and leadership. As a people, in spite of the faults that I have enumerated, I believe that we have great talents. We must not hesitate to build on them. Therefore, after Maastricht I believe that our country, with all its experience and history and achievements, still has a great deal to give Europe and the world.

4.26 pm

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): I appreciate, as no doubt you, Mr. Speaker, appreciate as a former Deputy Chief Whip, the strictures that that places on hon. Members who hold that position. However, I am so concerned about a safety problem in my constituency that I want to intervene briefly in this debate. I have put myself on the Standing Committee of the Transport and Works Bill and I will speak on the matter in more detail there.

I want to draw to the attention of the House a very dangerous situation in relation to a railway crossing in my constituency. The railway crossing is an unmanned crossing at Newton Garths on the main Newcastle to Sunderland line which runs through my constituency and that of my hon. Friend the Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark).

The crossing is located between two large housing estates—the Biddick Hall housing estate and Boldon Colliery estate. There are fields beside the crossing in which horses graze. As we know, children are often tempted to play near horses and feed them. On 14 May 1990, a seven-year-old girl called Lisa Mohamed was killed on the crossing. She had spent the day with her great-aunt and her younger brother. She had played in the field and walked along the road to the crossing.

Anyone who knows anything about crossings will be aware that the tracks on a vehicular crossing are recessed into timber to allow vehicles to cross the track. The young girl walked along the road believing that she was crossing the field on her way to feed the horses. Unfortunately, she was killed on the track by a train which came around the curve.

The crossing is particularly dangerous because the secondary school on the Biddick Hall estate has been closed and many of the children on that estate must cross to the Boldon Colliery secondary school. That unmanned crossing has become an unauthorised short cut for some children.

The crossing is about one mile from the signalman's cabin, and it is not visible because of the curve in the rail line. Therefore, no one can supervise the gate and crossing procedures. More than 120 high-speed trains pass over that crossing daily, at approximately 65 mph. I have visited the crossing several times, along with Lisa's father, Philip Mohamed, and one of our ward councillors, Councillor Mrs. Wagott. She is a new councillor, but she is capable and competent, and she has taken an interest in that dangerous crossing.

The crossing has been and is plagued by vandals. Warning signs and telephones have been ripped out. Despite repeated warnings, children still use the crossing as a short cut. The crossing is used to service what used to be Harrison farm, and it is used by vehicles and by people riding horses. At times, the gate is tied back and not closed. It takes only one person to leave the gate open, and safety at the crossing goes out of the window.

Several letters have passed between myself and various Ministers at the Department of Transport and between me and the local authority. Ministers, the local authority and everybody on the estate have agreed that the crossing should be closed and are trying to find an alternative route into the farm. However, until it is closed, someone from British Rail should man that crossing.

What appalled me and led me to intervene in this Adjournment debate was a statement by a chap named Brian Ward, who is supposed to be a British Rail regional spokesman. Since Lisa died, her father Philip Mohamed has fought a campaign to have the crossing closed. I have been supporting his campaign. Philip Mohamed, like most people in our area, which has high unemployment, must work away. When Lisa was killed, he was working on an oil rig in the middle of the North sea. His wife has had health problems ever since—her nerves have suffered, as any parent can imagine.

On Friday 29 November, when I went to my constituency, I obtained a copy of the local paper, the Gazette. According to that paper, British Rail has decided that it should blame Lisa's parents for her death. That character, Brian Ward—I do not know who he is; he is some pinstriped moron who works in a British Rail heated office—said:

[Mr. Don Dixon]

"We find that Mr. Mohamed has rarely, if ever, publicly expressed any concern for the train crew involved in his daughter's death . . . We have no real wish to attack Mr. Mohamed or his family."

He felt that Mr. and Mrs. Mohamed were to blame because of lack of supervision. That is an insensitive and scurrilous attack on loving parents who lost a seven-year-old daughter.

An editorial in the Gazette stated:

"British Rail's outburst against grieving South Shields father Philip Mohamed is astonishing in its insensitivity. Following the tragic death of his seven-year-old daughter eighteen months ago, Mr. Mohamed has waged a ceaseless campaign to get the railway crossing where she was killed closed down."

Any parent would join him in his campaign. He will not fetch Lisa back, but he did not want other parents to suffer the sadness that he and his wife have suffered since Lisa's death.

The article continues:

"Yet BR are adding to the heartbreak of the Mohamed family by blaming 'those who failed to supervise his daughter' for the tragedy.

Such a vitriolic attack does BR no credit whatsoever . . . Now they criticise him for 'failing to show concern for the train crew involved in her death'. This statement is almost breathtaking in its tactlessness.

Only those unfortunate parents who have lost a child can know the suffering involved."

After that scurrilous article by Brian Ward appeared in the newspaper, Mr. Mohamed, the young father who lost his seven-year-old daughter while working in the middle of the North sea, stated:

"British Rail have attacked me and my family. I was at work in the middle of the North Sea on the day she died. Lisa was on a visit to my aunt for the day.

At the time of the incident my aunt was in her front garden along with several other adults, and in front of her house is a large field surrounded by houses and a school.

There is virtually no traffic, only the occasional car going past to a nearby farm. My aunt has brought up a large family in that home for over 12 years and her children along with neighbouring kids have played on the field for many years without incident.

No one thought for a moment Lisa could without instruction or hindrance walk straight on the main Newcastle to Sunderland line after seeing horses on the other field."

That is precisely what happened.

Following that outburst from British Rail's so-called "public relations officer", I found on my return to the constituency last weekend that the Gazette had reported that a lorry had been hit by a train at the very spot on the crossing where Lisa was killed 18 months ago. The newspaper reported that the lorry driver, Andrew Atkinson, 25, narrowly cheated death when the 12.30 pm Sunderland to Newcastle train demolished the back of his lorry. I repeat that that happened on the very same crossing on which a young girl was killed, yet British Rail had the effrontery to blame her parents for not supervising their child. It is a dangerous crossing.

I ask British Rail to make a public apology to Mr. and Mrs. Mohamed for its outburst. I also call for the sacking of Mr. Brian Ward. Perhaps he should be sent to work on the North sea oil rigs where he could perhaps do the job that Philip Mohamed had to give up so that he could look after his ill wife following their daughter's death. I hope also that the Minister for Public Transport will disassociate himself from British Rail's remarks. I apologise to the House for having to speak in this Adjournment debate, but I was so appalled by British Rail's attack on parents who had lost their seven-year-old daughter that I felt that it was my duty to do so.

4.37 pm

Mr. James Kilfedder (North Down): Last Saturday, I had the pleasure of calling on a new constituent, Mrs. Noreen Hill, at her new home in Holywood in my constituency. However, that visit was tinged with sadness because, as some hon. Members will recall, Mrs. Hill's husband, Ronnie, a former school headmaster, has been in a coma for over four years since being seriously injured in the notorious IRA terrorist explosion at the remembrance day service in Enniskillen in 1987.

I was deeply moved by Mrs. Hill's quiet courage, dignity and total commitment to the loving care of her husband. She prays as we all do, that Ronnie will one day come out of his coma. To that end, she constantly talks to him in the belief that he understands what she says and that it will eventually help his recovery. I am sure that, like me, all hon. Members admire that wonderful couple and I pray that Noreen Hill's hopes will be realised.

However, I compare the tremendous service that Ronnie Hill gave to the community of Enniskillen, especially as a headmaster, and the love, care and dedication of Noreen Hill, with the ruthless, merciless and cowardly behaviour of the IRA which caused that explosion and so many of the atrocities in Northern Ireland during the past 20 years and more.

The police have warned the people of Ulster that they face increased atrocities from the terrorists during the Christmas season. Is it not ironic that, when goodly people, prepare to celebrate the birth of Christ and provide a memorable and happy time for their children, evil men lurk in the dark recesses of Northern Ireland and, indeed, mainland Great Britain, planning death, mutilation and destruction?

The massive 1,000 lb IRA van bomb which caused such grievous injuries and havoc last week in Belfast could easily have caused widespread carnage. Indeed, it was a miracle that no one died in that explosion, but the IRA demonstrated what, of course, we have known for years. It demonstrated by that bomb outrage that it was at war even with little children, because it badly damaged the opera house where a Christmas pantomime "Babes in the Wood" was being rehearsed, to which many families and their children were looking forward with infinite delight.

The IRA wishes to destroy the economy of Northern Ireland. I pay tribute to the spirit of the business men of the Province who, never daunted, though often depressed, reopen as soon as possible after their premises are damaged by IRA bombs or incendiary devices. Previously, grants were provided by the Government so that the firms could pay for security guards at the premises. It is time for the Government to reintroduce financial assistance. The money would be well spent. It could certainly save businesses hundreds of thousands of pounds.

I am deeply worried about the number of unemployed in my constituency of North Down and the lack of sufficient vacancies, especially for school leavers and graduates. I have complained in the past to the Minister responsible in Northern Ireland that the North Down area benefits least from Government help, because most effort is concentrated in the west and south of the Province.

Therefore, I appeal to the Government to attract more inward investment to my constituency. I urge the Government to get the unemployment in the North Down area off the dole queues. I urge them to give hope and help to our young people. I have met many young people in my constituency who are out of a job. It is difficult to explain the position to them. They are disheartened, and I do not blame them. They are disenchanted, and I fully understand that. That is why I believe that we must help our most prized possessions in Northern Ireland—our young people. I make that appeal strongly and fervently to the Government tonight.

I appeal for adequate recreational facilities for children and young people in my constituency. For instance, they see the vast concrete marina in Bangor, which has cost millions of pounds and has row upon row of expensive yachts beyond the reach of the vast majority of people in the area. Indeed, many of the yachts belong to people from outside the area. The young people feel—in my opinion, rightly—that they are victims of economic discrimination. As no recreational facilities, or only inadequate facilities, are provided in their separate areas, either in Bangor, Holywood, Conlig or Dundonald, they feel that others are benefiting and they are losing.

I refer in particular to places in Bangor such as Kilcooley, Whitehill and Bloomfield. I also think of Holywood, which is in need of better recreational facilities. Young children in Conlig have asked through me for playgrounds for many years. Other areas also suffer a lack of such facilities.

In this season of good will, when we concentrate our intentions on young people, the Government should bear in mind their needs and the fact that, if facilities are not provided, it is all too easy for young people to go astray. It would be money well invested to provide recreational facilities. I hope that the Government will listen to and heed my appeal.

Mr. Alfred Morris (Manchester, Wythenshawe): There are two very important issues I want briefly to raise before the House is asked to approve the motion. Both are of urgent public concern and affect the interests of people whose claims to the attention of this House are of undoubted priority. They are issues about which there ought at least to be ministerial statements before we rise for the recess.

I turn first to the issue of homelessness this Christmas, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) referred in his business question. Everyone expects there to be more people sleeping rough this year than at any other Christmas in the post-war years. As the Leader of the House may be aware, I have for many years been a trustee of Crisis, still perhaps more widely known as Crisis at Christmas. The deep social concern of all who work for the charity, in whose splendid achievements Lady Macleod can take especial pride, is well appreciated on both sides of the House. My own approach to the challenge of homelessness is very much informed by their work. Crisis recognises that homeless people are to be found not only in London and gives vitally important help to voluntary organisations which work to reduce the suffering that homelessness causes in many parts of Britain.

By contrast, the Government are widely accused of ignoring the claims of homeless people outside the capital. I quote a recent letter sent to me by Shelter. Simon Keyes, its director of housing services, said:

> "The Housing Minister has announced some provision for people sleeping rough in London this winter but has, once again, limited the scope of this provision to London only. This is despite evidence from Shelter's report . . . on the 'big freeze' last February and the recent official census data showing that the majority of people sleeping rough are outside London. Sixty per cent. of those counted in the census were outside the capital."

That is very strong criticism, well justified by the facts, and Shelter is right to call on the Government to extend to the rest of Britain the full range of initiatives being undertaken in London. After all, homelessness is no less calamitous for people living elsewhere in Britain than it is in London, especially at this time of the year. Nor can Ministers be unaware of its cost in human terms.

Ministers must know that last year, in Manchester alone, there were five recorded cases of people dying from sleeping out during the winter. Their deaths in my native city naturally cause me very deep concern. Yet Manchester is not alone in the north-west it its difficulties in trying to cope with the worst-ever homelessness crisis. There, as elsewhere, the rising tide of repossessions by building societies is an ever more worrying factor.

Council-owned hostels in Bury are authoritatively reported to be almost full and bed-and-breakfast accommodation may have to be found by next Wednesday for families there who face repossession of their homes. At present only 91 council properties are vacant. Most of them are unsuitable for living in, owing to vandalism, fire damage, dilapidation or the fact that they are too small for families.

The situation is set to worsen soon, and Joseph Robinson, the council's assistant housing director, said last week:

> "This is the worst situation our staff can recall."

At the same time, the housing chairman said:

> "We are in desperate circumstances. We have only one vacancy in our temporary hostels and nine families are due to have their homes repossessed by 18 December."

He went on:

> "It's not helped by the fact that we are having to sell 300 council homes every year, but are unable to spend the money on building new ones."

I hope that the Leader of the House will accept that we must have a ministerial statement on this issue before the House rises for the Christmas recess. He may have seen Tim Rayment's reports in The Sunday Times about homelessness this Christmas, with their emphasis not only on London but on giving the national picture. His reports bear moving testimony to the priority of the claims of a huge number of our fellow citizens who, without very urgent help, will have to spend Christmas on the streets in localities all over Britain.

The second issue I wish to raise concerns severely disabled people whose well-being and often whose personal freedom and safety depend heavily on the availability of services to which they are entitled under the Chronically Sick and Disabled Persons Act 1970. At Question Time on 3 December I raised from the Opposition Front Bench a number of crucial questions about the difficulties that more and more disabled people now experience in trying to secure and/or retain the services to which the Act entitles them. I asked the Minister for Health:

[Mr. Alfred Morris]

"How many disabled people, after being assessed for services under the . . . Act . . ., are now on waiting lists for the help that they need . . . how many local authorities at the latest date for which figures are available, had reduced or removed services in cases where there was no diminution in the disabled person's needs".

I also asked the Minister to comment on a case, of which I had informed the Secretary of State for Health "where home help provision was withdrawn from an elderly couple both of whom are severely and progressively disabled?"—[Official Report 3 December 1991; Vol. 200, c. 138.]

Not one of my questions was answered by the Minister. I shall be grateful, therefore, if the Leader of the House will obtain the answers for me before the motion is approved.

Before he does so, I must tell the House that the legal advice given to me, when I was Minister for the Disabled, was that it was unlawful to keep disabled people who have been assessed for services on waiting lists for them. I was also unequivocally advised—as I know all my successors as Minister for the Disabled have been—that it was unlawful to reduce or withdraw a service provided under the Act unless the disabled person's need for it had diminished. Yet in the case about which I questioned the Minister for Health, on 3 December, home help provision was withdrawn from an elderly and severely and progressively disabled couple whose nearest relative lived over 180 miles away in Manchester.

They are not alone in having their legal rights trampled on. Arthritis Care and the Royal Association for Disability and Rehabilitation said in a recent statement that such cases could be found all over Britain and that "widespread distress has been and continues to be caused among disabled people."

In a letter that I received from the Minister for Health before I questioned her in the House, she said, without any suggestion of criticism, that some local authorities had now withdrawn cleaning-only home help services altogether. If so, then ipso facto such services are no longer available to any disabled person in their areas, irrespective of need and the requirements of the law.

That is a very serious matter indeed, about which there should not only be a statement to the House before the recess, but urgent ministerial action to end all misconceptions about the legal duties imposed by the Act. On behalf of many national organisations of and for disabled people, I implore the right hon. Gentleman to make a positive response to my plea to him to play his part in ending what their members see as law-breaking on an increasingly wide scale.

In pressing the right hon. Gentleman to help, I emphasise that about 50 per cent. of the homeless in Britain this Christmas are expected to be disabled people, most of whom sleep rough due to the yawning gap between promise and performance in the Government's approach to community care. Thus, the two issues that I have raised are linked. Shelter says that there was a 92 per cent. increase in the number of homeless disabled people between 1980 and 1988, and the number has undoubtedly risen since then. That is sombre further proof of the need for a humane response from the Government before this debate concludes.

Sir Michael McNair-Wilson (Newbury): In eight days' time, the House will rise for the three-week Christmas recess. I have no doubt that we are all looking forward to that event, a time for rest, a time to be at home with our families, a very special time when we talk of good will towards all men and hope that the happiness to which we look forward will be shared by others.

However, I suspect that for 28 people at least—those who remain of the 50 or so people who received blood transfusions contaminated with the HIV virus from the national health service between 1982 and October 1985—Christmas will be overshadowed by the deadly nature of the virus and its awful consequences—its life-shortening consequences if it becomes AIDS. Now, of course, blood donations are screened to prevent such contamination happening again, but for those poor 28 people, unlike the 1,200 haemophiliacs who got the HIV virus from contaminated samples of the factor 8 blood product, no Macfarlane Trust exists for them, nor for those 22 who have already died from AIDS as a result of the virus, nor for their dependents.

It is right to ask why that should be the case. According to a letter that I received from the Under-Secretary of State for Health in the other place, Baroness Hooper, on 19 October 1991, the Government

"decided to make special provision for HIV infected haemophiliacs because we accepted that they were a very special case. The haemophiliacs were doubly disadvantaged by their hereditary condition, which was compounded by the onset of HIV. The position of those others infected with HIV through blood transfusions is more difficult, since the Government does not consider that their case is different in principle from that of others seriously harmed through medical accident."

So the Minister seems to acknowledge that those people have been seriously harmed through a medical accident derived from their treatment at the hands of the NHS, but the Minister goes on to say that it was nobody's fault—and anyway, that the haemophiliacs got compensation because they were haemophiliacs, not simply because they had been given contaminated factor 8.

It is almost the identical defence originally submitted by the Department of Health when it first refused to pay compensation to haemophiliacs. Effectively, it said, "If you can prove we were negligent, we will pay. If not, you get nothing." Legally, I recognise that that is strong ground, because proving negligence is an expensive and long drawn-out process, perhaps taking six to seven years, and how many of those 28 people who are still alive and who had contaminated blood transfusions will be alive that far ahead?

There is another dimension to those cases in terms of what any of us expects from treatment under the NHS. Surely we expect to be made well or better than we were when we went for treatment. Also, I know of no patient who tells his doctor what treatment he should or should not receive. I know of no patient who has ever told his doctor that he needs a blood transfusion. The decision about the treatment is one for the medical staff. The patient does as he or she is told.

I do not complain about that—the doctor has the experience—but, if we place our lives in the hands of medical men, we presume that the course of treatment they prescribe will make us better, not give us a viral infection from which we will die. That is implicit in the contract, unwritten though it may be, between patient and doctor.

It adds up to a moral obligation which the service takes on when it describes itself as the national health service. Of course, the chance of our being made well depends on what we are suffering from when we enter hospital, but few, if any, of us expect to die from the treatment that we are given. Yet that is what is happening to the haemophiliacs and to those who have had tainted blood transfusions.

Those people are now living in the twilight existence outlined to me by a haemophiliac constituent who had received contaminated factor 8. He asked me to go and see him at night so that his neighbour would not ask why the Member of Parliament was visiting him. He told me how fearful he was that his children's friends might find out about his condition and refuse to come to the house or to continue to be his children's friends.

He told me of his financial worries for his wife and his family if he could no longer work and if he subsequently died from AIDS; about the problem of keeping up mortgage payments that pressed on his mind; about the impossibility of obtaining any insurance and about that permanent worry as to whether his HIV positive condition would in the course of time turn to full-blown AIDS. Lastly, he explained that because of what had happened to him he had ceased to have any sexual relationship with his wife owing to the risk of infecting her. Effectively, that side of his marriage is over—as, probably, is his life.

Thank goodness, the Government softened their attitude and their heart towards the haemophiliacs and gave them a sum, through the Macfarlane Trust, which relieved the financial worries of people like my constituent; they gave a sum of £42 million. If they can give it to that group, why not to this much smaller group of transfusion-damaged people? All the problems that apply to the haemophiliacs apply equally to them, and to give all 50 the same compensation would cost only £1,750,000.

I find the Department's argument that haemophiliacs are a very special case a very difficult one to follow. All these people are human beings. They have been given this dreadful virus, not because they asked for it, but because of something that happened within the Department. The same faith in the NHS that persuaded the haemophiliac to accept factor 8 from the NHS persuaded the 50 to accept blood transfusions from the NHS. But for the grace of God, I might have been one of them. I was receiving blood transfusions at that time from the NHS because of kidney failure. That is why I stand in the House tonight conscious that it is the grace of God that has preserved me and aware that I at least have a voice through which to make this House think again about the plight of the now only 28 people whose lives have been so blighted.

I put this appeal to the Leader of the House: a measure of compensation should be provided for these unhappy people. I know that I am not the only Member who feels strongly about this matter. I know that hon. Members on both sides of the House have made a number of appeals and put many questions to Ministers. In my opinion the good name of the Government, the Department of Health and the National Health Service is somehow besmirched by the failure to recognise the dreadful blight that has come to these people at the hands of the NHS.

When a Minister admits in a letter to me that a medical accident has killed 22 people and looks likely to kill a good many more, leaving families without financial support and ruining marriages, natural justice—and I submit that there is such a thing—demands compassion demonstrated by financial assistance.

I have already referred to the Macfarlane Trust, which disburses Government funds to the haemophiliacs. I wrote to its chairman, the Rev. Prebendary Alan Tanner, asking if the trust had any discretion as to who it helped with funds. In his reply Mr. Tanner said:

"The Macfarlane Trust Deed was written very specifically for the haemophiliac community . . . I am sorry to say that I do not think that your enquiry reveals a viable option. We hope that you and like-minded colleagues of all parties will be able to provide a separate and additional solution for other afflicted groups."

So do I. After all, only as recently as last Tuesday the French Government decided to change its mind and bring forward a compensation package which included both haemophiliacs who had contracted HIV from contaminated blood products and those who had received blood transfusions also containing the virus. So why not us?

Baroness Hooper, in her letter, argues:

"The more that is spent on making payments to those who, through nobody's fault, have been harmed as a result of a medical accident, the less there is available for treating patients who have become ill."

That is quite right, but is her statement borne out by what we know of spending on AIDS, to take an example linked to the case that I am arguing? I fear not.

Only this week, on 10 December, The Daily Telegraph reported, under the heading "MPs attack NHS over AIDS money", as follows:

"Government health officials were strongly criticised by MPs yesterday for their handling of health authorities who 'pinched' money earmarked to treat Aids for other purposes. Mr. Duncan Nichol, chief executive of the health service, was closely questioned by the Commons public accounts committee about the lack of disciplinary action against those responsible for significant lapses in Aids spending uncovered by the National Audit Office.

In a report in the summer, the Office found more than £15 million granted by the Government to combat Aids remained unspent or had been diverted to other work."

I suggest to my right hon. Friend that the Government need not stumble over the £1,750,000 which would give the same compensation to the 50 who received contaminated blood transfusions as was given to the haemophiliacs. The money is really there in terms of this £15 million, which I gather is now being sought from the local authorities that have misspent it and some of which, apparently, is unspent.

If I am right, providing that compensation would effectively cost the NHS nothing, but it would end one of the unhappiest and most tragic incidents to afflict the health service in my lifetime. While I know that my right hon. Friend, in winding up this debate, may not feel that he can comment in detail on what I have said, I ask him to convey my comments to the Secretary of State for Health and that, as a distinguished former Treasury Minister, he will consider what I have said about payment of compensation and, perhaps, before we resume in the new year, will have been able to make a statement that will give comfort to the 28 people who are still alive and to the dependants of the 22 who have already died from AIDS.

5.8 pm

Mr. David Alton (Liverpool, Mossley Hill): Eloquently and at times movingly, hon. Members have used the Adjournment debate to raise distressing situations and to take the opportunity to remind us, as we approach the Christmas festivities, that many find themselves in very distressing circumstances. I take the opportunity to press the Government on the position in Croatia, where there continues to be a massive loss of life. In particular, I want to ask the Leader of the House to comment on the dual issues of recognition of Croatia and the need for an international peacekeeping and peacemaking force in that troubled part of the world.

If anyone is in doubt about the importance and the urgency of the matter, he need look only at today's tapes. Just two hours ago, I took the following extract from the tapes:

"Undeterred by freezing temperatures, the Yugoslav army and Croatian forces fought new battles today in Yugoslavia's breakaway republic of Croatia, further denting dwindling hopes of peace. The fighting raged throughout Croatia yesterday and up to 26 people were reported killed. This reduced the likelihood of a ceasefire taking hold that would allow the United Nations to send peacekeeping troops to Yugoslavia. Croatian radio said the town of Valpovo in eastern Croatia was under artillery fire all night and nearby villages were also fired on. The two of Zemenuk Donji, about six miles from the Adriatic coast, was also under attack".

According to the tapes, the European monitors, who have been reporting about the position in Croatia say that about 1,000 have been identified as having been killed during the fighting in Vukovar. The report continues:

"The once quiet town of 50,000 people on the river Danube was reduced to rubble by constant shelling and house-to-house fighting. About 14,000 civilians stayed through the siege, cowering in cellars."

Inevitably, much of the information is a patchwork of reports, but we know that about 11 per cent. of the population have been displaced by the fighting that has continued since the summer. Although estimates of casualties are notoriously unreliable, about 15,000 people have been registered as injured during the fighting, and 30,000—90 per cent. of them civilians—are missing. We are told that 223 churches and monasteries have been destroyed, that damage to hospitals and other medical facilities is estimated at about £100 million and that damage to civilian property is estimated at between £1 billion and £2 billion. Dubrovnik, now in its 72nd day without electricity or water, is in a parlous state.

I heard from one Croatian earlier today about what had happened to her friends. She said that they had recently killed a pig for food but could not eat it after discovering human hands in its stomach; it had been scavenging food from unburied bodies. That graphic illustration demonstrates the desperate seriousness of the position in Croatia and perhaps our failure in the West to concentrate our minds and our attention sufficiently on the tragedy.

There has been no debate in the House on the war in Croatia, but hon. Members have tabled early-day motions with which I have been associated. An all-party Friends of Croatia group has been established. The hon. Member for Hornsey and Wood Green (Sir H. Rossi) tabled early-day motion 138. My hon. Friend the Member for Inverness, Nairn and Lochaber (Sir R. Johnston) tabled early-day motion 219. About 70 signatures have been added to those motions. The hon. Members for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves), Ynys Môn (Mr. Jones), Sheffield, Attercliffe (Sir P. Duffy) and Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) are among the sponsors of those motions. That demonstrates the breadth of concern in the House.

In looking at the origins of the conflict and at why hon. Members believe that there is a need for recognition of Croatia, it is worth reflecting that, in any civil war, families and communities become pitted against one another as old grievances, half-remembered slights, distortion and disinformation compete tenaciously for attention. As we have heard today from the hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder), we need look no further than Northern Ireland to see the truth of what I am saying.

Now, in what was Yugoslavia, there is massive communal violence between Croat and Serb, Catholic and Orthodox. One in ten of Croatia's inhabitants are of Serbian extraction and they, as a vulnerable minority, fear that in an independent Croatia they will be reduced to servile status. That issue has to be addressed by Croatians. For decades, Serbian privileges have permeated every public institution, the police, the army and all the apparatus which enabled the communist regime to flourish.

Collective memory prevents many of the principal players from seeking solutions based on trust, reconciliation or consensus. Serbians prefer instead to remind us of the all too real atrocities committed by the Ustashe, backed by the Nazis, who reputedly supported a programme of racial purification: one third of Croatia's Serbian population was to be exterminated, one third repatriated to Serbia and the remainder forcibly converted to Catholicism. Many Serbian families living in London can graphically describe the barbarism which they experienced during that lamentable period. Notwithstanding that, many Croatians also supported Tito and the patriots.

The issue now is not what happened in the 1940s. To confuse those events with the present tragedy is as logical as saying that every member of today's German Government could be associated with the events of the 1930s and with Hitler's Germany. Surely, in looking to the future, we must look to today's Croatian leadership. We must examine what they stand for, whether they are entitled to our respect and whether their goals differ from those of the Ustashe.

Most of today's leaders are modern democrats who see their future as an independent state within the European Community of nations. With a population of 4·5 million, that would put them on a par with some of the Community's smaller states. The Croatian Democratic Union successfully fought the 1990 election on a programme of establishing a modern democratic state. It is pledged to reprivatising social ownership, the establishment of a market economy, the guarantee of all human and civil rights and the rule of law. In contrast, Serbia continues to be ruled by communist hardliners who seem totally uninterested in resolving the Yugoslav crisis democratically.

Some commentators have caricatured Croatia's leaders as the heirs of fascism. I think that caricature is unworthy of those commentators. We need to look more deeply at the issue. We must recognise that people in Croatia are entitled to the same aspirations as the rest of us. In the recent referendum, 94·6 per cent. voted for self-determination and the right of autonomy.

I should like to commend three principles to the Leader of the House for action. The first is self-determination and the protection of democracy. We should not be locked into borders created in the aftermath of world war two. We have already had to recognise the reality of events in the Soviet Union and the emergence again of the Baltic states as independent republics. There will be massive changes throughout eastern and central Europe, so there is no point in clinging to old borders and old boundaries. Surely it is the principle of self-determination which must count.

I agree strongly with the Foreign Secretary's description of the Serbian-dominated federal army as a band of brigands. He should also recognise the legitimacy of the Croatians to break free from that band of brigands and to be able to have control over their own affairs.

The second principle is international recognition. The Prime Minister said that the Government would consider recognition "when there is peace". That is a formula for ensuring that there never will be peace. It builds in a reason why the Serbs should continue the conflict. Germany is about to recognise Croatia, probably before Christmas. European Community leaders will discuss the issue on Monday. I hope that we will not try to impede the process. We should not see it as a stalking horse for a common European foreign policy or defence policy.

If the Prime Minister is to be consistent with the statements made post-Maastricht that every issue will be considered on its merits, he and the Foreign Secretary should look at the position in Croatia on its merits and consider again the issue of recognition. If Croatia were recognised, it would enable it to go to the United Nations to argue its case. That is the main reason why that important decision needs to be taken.

The third principle is international peacemaking. In the House, we have maintained the need to have a United Nations peacekeeping and peacemaking force in parts of the world where people's rights are suppressed. When Kuwait was invaded by Iraq, in the House we sanctioned the use of force to re-establish the legitimacy of the Kuwaiti Government to govern their own affairs. I believe that we should argue for nothing less, despite the fact that no oil or financial interests are involved. Sadly, those are all too often the major motivating force.

The same logic should apply to Croatia. One half of Europe should not become obsessed with monetary union and internal policy while the other half cracks up. We must take action with our European neighbours and through the United Nations to try to end the conflict in Croatia. We should not wait until the conflict is resolved before discussing whether to send a peacekeeping force.

The Government should consider the possibility of erecting a sky shield over Croatian air space. It would not require the deployment of troops on the ground, but would stop some of the worst aerial bombardment and could be enforced effectively by NATO or the United Nations. We also need the establishment of more humanitarian sea lanes, which the Foreign Secretary has already supported. Such a sensible idea could give immediate relief.

We should also consider the issue of humanitarian aid. So far, just £77,000 has been given, yet one in eight Croatians are displaced persons or refugees. Given the chronic poverty, hunger and destitution, we should try to increase the amount of aid that we give.

The European Community observers' report starkly and bleakly reminds the House of our need to be concerned about what is happening in that important corner of Europe. In their report published today, they say that the army is "ready to press the button for a ground offensive which could cut through Croatia and Slovenia".

That could happen within the next seven days—before Christmas. But the report says that the army will try to take back Slovenia and reclaim the old Yugoslavia. It says that nine regions of Bosnia with Serbian majorities are said to be preparing to declare autonomy but that the army is arming Bosnian Serbs and disarming Muslims and Croats.

The EC observers say:

"An aerial photograph would show Bosnia as a huge assembly area of army forces ready to break into Croatia."

EC observers have warned President Kucan of Slovenia that he is likely to be personally attacked. The European Community mission has been told that it should leave "if the expected surge in fighting takes place next week."

European Community observers do not favour recognition. They, too, have been saying that we should wait. But that is a form of appeasement. After 14 broken ceasefires, such a position will not deter the Serbian army, which the west has armed as a buffer state. The moral case for international intervention and recognition is overwhelming. When the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) went to Prague last year, she said—I totally agree with her—that never again would we in the United Kingdom ignore the plight of a small country because it was a faraway place and we knew little about it or its people. Is not that precisely what has been happening as Dubrovnik and Vukovar have been pounded into the ground, while people have been terrorised and churches and hospitals destroyed?

We must recognise that it is not a conflict between equals—the Queensberry rules have not been applied in Croatia. Serbia invaded Croatia, not the other way around. Serbia has access to stockpiles of arms and the full might of the federal army, whereas Croatia does not. In trying to shape western public opinion, Serbia is using all the crude black propagandist tricks that have been the hallmark of communist Governments throughout the years.

There is no logical reason why the British Government and the European Community should be indifferent to the plight of a small European nation, or why we should pretend to hold a neutral position in that battle of unequals. We should ensure that there is an effective international response to the conflict and, once a democracy is constructed in Croatia, minorities are adequately protected and all possible efforts are made to achieve reconciliation in that part of the world.

5.25 pm

Mr. John Ward (Poole): This evening we shall hear various speeches on matters of national and international importance. I draw the attention of the House to two subjects, the first of which is concerned with human welfare and the second with animal welfare.

In 1988, stringent regulations were introduced in this country to prevent the sale of furniture and furnishings that did not meet tough flammability standards. Those regulations affected particularly the use of foam in furniture but covered only domestic upholstered furniture. Many of us hoped that similar regulations would be introduced to cover furniture in buildings open to the public, in cars and in public transport, including aircraft.

At present, the only European Community countries with fire regulations for domestic furniture are the United Kingdom and Ireland. Furniture in public buildings throughout the EC is covered by guidelines, voluntary agreements and codes of practice. Many of us hoped that avoidable deaths by fire could be prevented through the introduction of EC-wide regulations and, two years ago, work began on such a directive covering both domestic and contract furniture. A second draft directive was circulated last year and there was talk of a separate draft directive covering furniture in means of transport.

Now, however, EC Commissioner Bangemann has announced that the new directive, which would introduce lower standards of fire resistance than those currently required in the United Kingdom, could be postponed for up to eight years. That decision has been taken because the original proposed directive would introduce controls on the ignition resistance of furniture, and later measures would be introduced to control the spread of fire in ignited furniture. Commissioner Bangemann now wants to wait until the tests on the latter requirement have been devised before introducing either control.

That is bureaucracy gone mad. Although the United Kingdom would still be protected from the deadly effects of old-style foam fillings, the rest of the EC would continue to be at risk. I presume that we must now monitor the problem carefully to ensure that furniture that does not meet our high standards is not imported into the United Kingdom. Above all, we do not want lower standards of fire protection in this country, simply in the interests of EC harmonisation.

I congratulate the Consumers Association, which has campaigned for many years to have dangerous foam banned in the United Kingdom. I commend to the House its current campaign to ensure that our safety regulations are introduced throughout the EC in the shortest possible time. The association tells me that it is supported by fire brigades throughout the United Kingdom and it intends to bombard Commissioner Bangemann with seasonal greetings that will also ask him to reconsider his decision to postpone the introduction of an EC directive on safety in furniture. If any hon. Members wish to join in that campaign, full details are contained in the current edition of Which? I am sure that the House will wish to support the Consumers Association in its campaign.

I hope that Commissioner Bangemann will accept that we should introduce the safety regulations that can be implemented now, and introduce those that require more sophisticated testing at a later date. It is madness not to introduce each safety measure as soon as possible. We should not have to wait to present a neat and tidy package of regulations.

It is particularly distressing that we should have to debate this sad but vital subject at Christmas and we must convince the European Commissioner that he has a duty to take immediate action to prevent needless deaths that could be avoided by strict controls over the use of foam, which rapidly produces toxic fumes when subjected to fire.

The second subject to which I wish to refer is animal welfare. Records show that standards of animal welfare in this country are generally higher than those of our European partners, but many of us are still concerned that regulations to be introduced in this country in 1998, such as a ban on tethering sows, will not apply to the rest of the European Community until 2006. The EC directive does not deal with the close confinement of sows, which has already been dealt with in this country.

At present, the only way of showing our disapproval of veal crates is not to buy veal in this country, provided we are able to identify it. Animal welfare in an appropriate issue for the European Commission to act on and improve standards throughout the Community.

At a time when European food stores are bulging it seems senseless to go on producing surpluses of meat in such cruel conditions. We have all seen the distressing scenes on television when live animals are transported across the continent of Europe for ultimate slaughter. I am sure that most of us would prefer all the animals to be slaughtered here before being exported. I accept that that may not always be possible.

I want the European Commission inspectorate which is to be appointed—largely as a result of the effort of our own Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food and his colleagues, on which I congratulate them—to have effective powers and penalties at its disposal. I welcome the fact that there are proposals for a directive covering the welfare of animals at slaughter. I am told that it will roughly conform to the laws already in force in the United Kingdom. I am worried that some of our European partners will not wish to enforce directives on animal welfare; so the European Commission inspectorate must have the power to enforce the regulations.

I particularly wish to congratulate my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister on achieving what some may consider a minor protocol at Maastricht on animal welfare. It ensures the consideration of cruelty issues in all future moves by the Commission and European Community Ministers, which should help to prevent some of the factory farming scandals of which we know and some of the well-publicised Spanish practices involving cruelty to animals. I trust that progress can be made in obtaining protection for animals and—this is important—fire protection for humans.

5.33 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): I hope to raise a number of issues that affect my constituency and constituents.

Since the Government introduced poll tax capping, I and other hon. Friends and representatives from local authorities have tried, without success, to persuade the Secretary of State for the Environment of the unfairness of the standard spending assessments and how the system works to the disadvantage of my local authority of Barnsley and its residents.

The Association of Metropolitan Authorities has clearly recognised the problem, and responded by saying that the system is unfair and it would not object to movement in the total SSA of all local authorities to try to overcome that unfairness.

Next year's increase in standard spending assessment will give Barnsley authority an increase of just 4·6 per cent. —only 89 per cent. of the average increase for all the Metropolitan districts, 68 per cent. of the national average increase, 65 per cent. of the average of the shire counties increase and 55 per cent. of the increase given to the city of Westminster. The rate support grant settlement announced recently, the unfairness of the SSA and this year's reduction in the area support grant mean that the poll tax payers of Barnsley will have to pay significantly higher poll tax while the local authority is faced with a £5 million cut in its already depleted services.

While I accept that someone has to be at the bottom of the league, the way that the figures are calculated means not only that we are at the bottom, but that the system is unfair. Why is it that for every £1 per adult that Barnsley receives, Manchester receives £1·78, Westminster receives £2, Liverpool receives £1·54 and Birmingham receives £1·53? How can the House accept that an average 1,000 pupil school, costs Manchester £654 per pupil more than it costs Barnsley? Surely there cannot be such a difference in the educational system of the two authorities. Why is my authority deprived of the money that other people are able to receive?

While I think that the Secretary of State understands the problem, he cannot find a formula to alter Barnsley's position without altering that of every other local authority. His answer that someone has to be at the bottom does not alleviate Barnsley's problem. The gap between those at the top and bottom of the league is huge, and needs to be decreased through a restructuring of the grant system for all local authorities. I accept that that will mean that other local authorities will have to lose some of their grants, but the extent of the present unfairness is unbelievable.

There are many effects of that injustice: roadworks are not carried out; the parks and recreation department has been cut to a minimum; repairs to schools have not been carried out for the past three to four years; the whole of the adult education system is now being wiped out; and social services provisions such as home helps has been curtailed. About 50 per cent. of social workers are currently on strike purely because the necessary regrading structure cannot be implemented because the money is not available.

The fire service, which runs on the same standard spending assessment formula, is also affected. The fire service SSA was due to be increased by 9·2 per cent.—the highest increase for some time—but the capping level is below that. Therefore, the service cannot receive the 9·2 per cent. increase that it was supposed to have. Once the figure reaches 4·8 per cent., its levels are capped.

The issue is significant in relation to the speech of the hon. Member for Poole (Mr. Ward) on foam furniture. The fire service, which is already 28 firemen short, will lose another 52 men because they cannot be paid. Training has been cut: for the past two years no senior officers have been sent to Moreton in the Marsh for specialised training because the money is not available. The trickle-down effect of that is that services and training are not available. There is a delay in the replacement of equipment, and repairs to equipment have been cut. That means that appliances are kept on the road for far longer than they should be without being serviced. Minimum basic training is disappearing.

I know of a specific problem involving Mr. and Mrs. Hodgson of Rockley Abbey farm, Worsbrough, who farm various districts around my constituency, one of which is at Worsbrough, down White Cross lane. The only way out from that district involves crossing a railway bridge. The central farm is at Rockley Abbey; farm machinery and the stores of produce are kept in outlying regions. That means that 500 tonnes of corn, 300 tonnes of rape, 100 tonnes of barley and a quantity of beans have to be transported down that lane. British Rail has asked the local authority to reduce the restrictive load across the bridge from 30 to 3 tonnes, so the produce and farm machinery cannot now be moved across the bridge.

Since April, nobody said a word to the farmer about that happening. Had he been told, a store would have been made on the other side of the bridge, but his produce is now waiting in a barn or a store. Farm equipment is on the wrong side of the bridge and it cannot be got across; nor can the containers go across to bring out the produce.

Nothing has altered on the bridge since it was built. The structure and the surface are the same. Only the regulations about how to calculate the safety of a bridge have altered. It is merely a bit of paper which says that such a bridge can now carry only 3 tonnes. Since April, there have been arguments with the local authority about whose responsibility it is. The local authority, as the highway authority, has accepted that it is responsible. At a cost of £6,000—that sum has to be put to a committee because of poll tax capping—the authority could enable the bridge to carry 17 tonnes and thus allow the farm equipment to cross, but that would still not bring out the farm produce.

It is inconceivable that in 1945 we could in a few hours build across the Rhine bridges that could bear armies, but that now we cannot build a bridge to carry corn in a 20-tonne load. British Rail insists that the work must go out to tender and that there must be a design stage before then. It is estimated that the work to increase the capacity to 17 tonnes will take three months.

However, there is another problem. European Community regulations impose a certain way of bringing the corn across. They ask whether the load can be decanted and brought across in 10-tonne loads and pushed into 28-tonnes vans. That problem is currently being considered, but, even if the regulations are waived, there is still the problem that in three months the farmer will be near bankruptcy because the contracts that he had already signed to sell his produce cannot be kept. It is inconceivable that such an attitude should prevail.

It is necessary only for British Rail to lift the restriction for a few hours and for its inspectors to be present to allow the load to cross. The local authority, having accepted a 17-tonne limit, could do the work in three months and the farmer could get his machinery across and store it on the other side.

In the long term—this relates to standard spending assessments—it will cost the local authority £1 million to build a new bridge. It is a political issue because, in view of capping, the authority must decide whether, faced with crumbling schools and cuts in services, it can spend £1 million to build a bridge to satisfy the needs of a farmer who has a legal right to get his stock across.

That is a Catch-22 situation and the Government must consider two aspects. First, they should persuade British Rail to lift the restrictions so that the farmer does not go bankrupt and, secondly, they must ensure that there is sufficient flexibility to allow a local authority to spend the money to remedy the problem with the bridge. If they do not, it will be clear how ridiculous and inflexible central and local government are in not allowing the authority to carry out its duties merely because of insufficient finances.

Before the House rises, I should like to think that the produce will get across and that there will be some sensibility in the SSA to help my hard-pressed authority. I should also like to think that the Secretary of State who refused to meet representatives of the authority will at least have the magnanimity to recognise the problem and to use his good offices to remedy it. I should like to see some sensibility in the Government's attitude towards allowing local authorities to get on with their duties.

5.43 pm

Mr. Michael Latham (Rutland and Melton): I shall follow the hon. Member for Barnsley, West and Penistone (Mr. McKay) by talking about another public service, in this case one which is very near the heart of my right hon. Friend the Lord President of the Council, because he was once Secretary of State for Education and Science. I want to talk especially about adult education, and to ask for a clear statement of Government policy before the House rises for the Christmas recess. I appreciate that the House has exceptionally important business next week, but there are a number of matters about which there is considerable public concern and which need immediate clarification.

During Question Time this week, I asked the Minister of State, Department of Education and Science about the representations that he had received on the future financing of adult education. he said:

"I am aware of the concern felt by community colleges in Leicestershire, Devon and Cambridgeshire."

He continued:

"we can categorically reassure those colleges that they have nothing to fear."—[Official Report, 10 December 1991; Vol 200, c. 724.]

The community college provision in Leicestershire and in many other counties is extremely important. Such colleges are, so to speak, schools during the day, and cater for varying ages, although in my constituency Rutland is different from what I would call "old Leicestershire". However, in the late afternoon and evening, they become an important part of adult and further education. I believe that the same is true in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Corby (Mr. Powell). My wife, my family and I take advantage of these provisions at Uppingham community college in my constituency.

Such institutions are important and are well respected by members of the public, so there is concern that they might be badly affected by the new Bill. Having had assurances from my hon. Friend, I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend could repeat them and say that community colleges—I am not talking about colleges of further education—play an important part in Government thinking, and that the Government do not believe that they will be disadvantaged by the new arrangements.

That would reassure the community colleges that have expressed their concern to me, and it would also reassure the Workers Educational Association, which is a respected organisation. The secretary of its east midlands district wrote to me—and, I am sure, to many other hon. Members representing east midlands constituencies:

"There is no recognition of Role Education in the White Paper"— which is now a Bill. He continued:

"This includes retirement education, school governor training, education for those actively involved in voluntary organisations, many courses enabling women to play a fuller part at work and in society and courses building the confidence of the unemployed."

He asked:

"Can you bring pressure to bear to identify and acknowledge the importance of this very large sector of adult education?"

One specific aspect, I know, is of great concern to my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough (Sir J. Farr), whom I am delighted to see here. Only the day before yesterday, he and I were discussing adult basic education, which means, in practice, helping people who have learning difficulties. Such people have often left school and might be in their late teens or twenties, or may be considerably older. Some may have handicaps and difficulties with reading skills.

The usual method of assisting such people in Leicestershire and Rutland—and probably in other counties—is either to work in small groups with a maximum of 10 students with individual support and some voluntary assistance, or, in many cases, on a one-to-one basis in the student's home or in a neutral place such as a church hall. These people do not find it easy to go to formal classes in colleges of further education or schools.

I have received a letter from some people who act as tutors or perform similar roles in Syston in my constituency:

"Every student within the scheme is visited in their home by a specially trained tutor. The tutor finds out what the student's needs are and informs them of what adult basic education actually is. They tell them that the groups are small and informal, you leave whenever you feel ready and join when you want to. Students are treated as adults and therefore all our materials are adult based."

The lady goes on to ask:

"Informal groups such as ours help to build confidence and enable students to apply for better jobs or to attend further courses . . . Will an FE teacher be able to handle this situation correctly so as not to cause further harm, whilst getting information at the same time?"

She goes on to ask whether students who are physically or mentally handicapped or who have Down's syndrome will be catered for in the new arrangements. She wants to know what will happen to groups during the day, held for unemployed people, mothers at home and people who cannot attend during the evening. These are genuine questions, and they must be answered.

I have had a number of moving letters from students who are receiving help by means of adult basic education in community colleges, and receiving one-to-one teaching. I want clear assurances from my right hon. Friend that the matter will be properly dealt with.

My hon. Friend the Minister of State wrote to me on 28 October on this very matter:

"We want to see a pattern of provision which makes the best use of facilities and expertise and which is readily accessible to local communities. This will mean using all resources properly—whether these are in further education colleges or in adult education centres and colleges run by local education authorities. We shall expect colleges and local authorities to work closely together, building on existing collaborative links, to secure a pattern of provision for adults which best suits local circumstances and is accessible to local communities. We are looking at this might be achieved."

I presume that my hon. Friend meant, "looking at what might be achieved in this regard."

I want clear assurances from my right hon. Friend that matters have moved on since that letter and that Ministers can reassure me, my hon. Friend the Member for Harborough and people from other county authorities in which adult basic education is handled on a one-to-one basis. We need to know that the new arrangements will not disadvantage these people, who are struggling and who often experienced difficulties in their school careers. They are trying to bring their reading and numeracy skills up to scratch so that they can go on to other courses, to better jobs or to any job at all.

We must help these disadvantaged people. I am worried by the number of letters that I have had from them. They, in turn, are worried about the new proposals; and I look to my right hon. Friend to offer me clear assurances that their needs will be tackled.

Sir John Farr (Harborough): I am much obliged to my hon. Friend for giving way to me on this important subject. I echo all that he has said. Leicestershire is in a peculiar situation, because we have spent more than the national average on one-to-one education and adult basic education, and we want to be absolutely certain that anything the Minister puts in place under the new legislation will provide us with no less than we already enjoy in the form of high standards.

Mr. Latham: I am most grateful to my hon. Friend for putting it so well. He reflects my views exactly. I commend his views, my own and those of my constituents to my right hon. Friend.

5.53 pm

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I should like to bring to the attention of the House serious matters that arose in Northern Ireland on Friday 22 November.

That morning, the people of Northern Ireland read in their papers and heard on the broadcast media reports that, in its first ever decision, the Fair Employment Tribunal, established by an Act of this House in 1989, had found the Eastern health and social services board guilty of religious discrimination when making an appointment. That was regrettable, but my complaint is not with the finding of the tribunal. The news went on to say that the tribunal had found that it was discrimination, and thus unlawful, to display in a workplace the union flag and pictures of the royal family. It was also said that one of the board's supervisors had displayed a photograph of herself and a leader of a principal party in Ulster. We were told that that was also unlawful.

These reports were based on a Fair Employment Commission press release issued the previous night. The first page of that release, after announcing in its first two sentences that the tribunal had held the board guilty of discrimination in failing to appoint a Catholic laundry worker to a permanent position, continued:

"The tribunal recorded that the officers of the EHSSB who appeared and gave evidence appeared to know of the existence of the board's equal opportunities policy but that none of them were acquainted with the contents of that policy and none of them appeared to be in the least disturbed by that fact."

The press release further recorded that the undisputed evidence of the applicant was that party tunes were played in the laundry, the union flag was displayed in the laundry, pictures of the royal family were displayed, and one supervisor displayed a photograph of herself and the leader of a political party in Ulster; but that the Eastern health and social services board stated that the board did not have a policy on such matters as flags and had no reason to think that offence would be taken to the union flag. The tribunal described the respondents' evidence as "contradictory and fundamentally so".

This press release clearly gave prominence not to the reasons why the board failed to appoint the applicant but to what, on any reading of the case, was a peripheral issue. This emphasis was reinforced by the behaviour of one of the commission's directors who, the night the press release was issued, telephoned the main media outlets to let them know that the commission was releasing an important statement on flags and emblems. That of course biased the discussion the next day. The director followed that up in interviews. I did not hear those interviews, but the director's conduct of them has been described to me as aggressive and as leaving the listener in no doubt that these emblems must be removed from the workplace.

The press release and the comments on it gave considerable offence to a wide range of people in Ulster who were appalled by the disrespect shown by a public body to the royal family.

The story so far is bad enough. It gets worse when one realises that the reaction of the press and its presentation of the story was based on a complete misinterpretation of the tribunal's decision. The case concerned the failure of the board to make an appointment to a job and it turned on the reasons why other candidates had been preferred, and on the interviewing panel's assessment of those other candidates.

The tribunal's reasons concentrated on the conduct of the interview. Paragraph 7(g) of the tribunal's judgment reads:

"Whilst it is not in any sense conclusive regard can nevertheless be paid to"— three matters are mentioned here, and the fourth is:

"whatever may be said about the effects of the union flag or indeed pictures of the royal family in the work place in Northern Ireland, the fact that the local management permitted the playing of party tunes in the laundry at Purdysburn".

It is clear that in this part of the judgment the tribunal is taking into account only the playing of party tunes, which is fair enough. I should perhaps point out that "party tunes" does not refer to the sort of festive music in which people might be engaged at this time of the year. Party tunes might involve on one side Orange songs and on the other, Republican songs—or any other form of what we call diddle-de-de-music.

It is fair enough to criticise the playing of party tunes, but it is also clear that the tribunal does not take into account at any point in its decision the display of the union flag and pictures of the royal family. The most that can be said from the Fair Employment Commission's viewpoint is that the tribunal left those matters to one side and criticised the absence of a board policy on them. But the FEC distorted matters so as to give a false impression. In the reasons given by the tribunal no reference was made to the photograph, which appeared prominently in the press release of the FEC.

I consider the most damning aspect in the FEC's press release was the description by the tribunal of the board's evidence as "contradictory and fundamentally so", which, in the FEC's press release, comes after the words:

"but that the [board] informed [the tribunal] that the board did not have a policy on such matters as flags and had no reason to think offence would be taken to the Union flag."

That gives the reader the impression that "contradictory and fundamentally so" is related to this aspect. But it comes nowhere near the brief mention of flags in the tribunal's judgment; it comes at the tribunal's assessment of the evidence of the interviewing panel and its reasons for preferring someone else to the applicant. It is a comment on the evidence of the chairman of the interviewing panel when comparing the applicant with one of those successful in obtaining employment.

I have said enough to show that the commission issued a press release which created a false impression. Sadly, I have to say that I am convinced that that false impression was created deliberately. This was not a case in which someone, in his enthusiasm, misinterpreted a complex legal document. The judgment was fairly short and clear.

[Mr. David Trimble]

Moveover, the commission director who issued the press release is a lawyer who is perfectly capable of reading a short tribunal judgment correctly. She cannot have forgotten how to read a case so soon. You see, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that that commissioner is known to me not just as a lawyer but as a person of strong nationalist opinions who would probably be hostile to the display of our national flag or our sovereign's portrait at any point in Northern Ireland.

There are important issues of principle. It is appalling that a public body should issue such falsehoods. That will only reinforce the widespread impression in Northern Ireland that the commission is biased, following its own political agenda. I am sorry to say that that impression is strengthened by the commission's silence since I first exposed the errors more than two weeks ago.

The fair employment code of practice speaks of promoting a harmonious working environment where no worker feels threatened or intimidated. That is a fair objective. One can easily think of slogans and emblems which would intimidate. One could even think of circumstances in which the union flag might be used in an intimidating way—for example, by pushing it aggressively at people—but I cannot see how it can be said that our national flag or pictures of the royal family can by themselves ever be threatening or intimidating.

If they were—if the commission's apparent view on the matter were followed—it would lead to absurdities. Portraits of Her Majesty are displayed as a matter of course in schools and police stations. The union flag is regularly used in advertising and packaging. It is even used by some firms which bear the name "British". Are those uses to be outlawed?

It is significant that in this matter the commission has pursued and attacked only those emblems which express a British identity. It does not pursue the emblems of Irish nationalism with the same vigour, and it is silent on Roman Catholic religious symbols prominent in some schools and a national health service hospital—symbols which many would find offensive, not just on aesthetic grounds.

The Northern Ireland Office must curb that campaign. I wrote to the Secretary of State on that matter on 25 November, nearly three weeks ago. Not only has there been no reply but to my knowledge no statement has been made by the Northern Ireland Office on the matter. It is time for that silence, which might appear to give consent, to be ended. I hope that the Leader of the House will arrange for a statement to be made on the matter before the House rises.

6.3 pm

Mr. Douglas French (Gloucester): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) on the moving way in which he presented his case on behalf of those who have received contaminated blood. I also congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes) on a vintage performance in which he reminded the House of the great traditions and components of British public life. He is a touchstone of sound values and common sense, which we neglect at our peril.

I was interested in the case made by the hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon). He spoke about rail safety, and I want to refer to road safety, which merits attention before the House rises. Road safety usually finds a place in the Christmas Adjournment debate, because it is a sad fact that, during the holiday, there will be many road accidents. I hope that the number of those will be down on last year, but I am afraid that many will be killed or injured and vehicles will be damaged.

In all such cases, the drivers will need to produce details of their insurance. Many will be able to provide such details for the police or for the other drivers involved on the spot, but unfortunately many will not. Some will not have their insurance certificate or cover note with them, some will think that they have it but on looking will find that they do not know where it is, and some may have to produce their documents at a police station within five days, a procedure which is reported to cost the police about £20 million a year. Some involved in an accident will adopt an indignant attitude because they believe that they are innocent, and may refuse to produce their documents altogether for fear that that might affect their no claims bonus.

In some cases, it will be discovered that the insurance cover has expired, that the driver has no insurance cover at all, and that has serious consequences. Sometimes that situation might exist knowingly or even deliberately, and in other cases it will be the result of an oversight.

On the face of it, that problem could be eased by requiring evidence of insurance to be displayed in the windscreen of every vehicle in the same way as the tax disc provides immediate and visible evidence that a vehicle has been taxed and may be used on the road. In the same way, an insurance disc could be required to be displayed in the windscreen, and would provide visible evidence of insurance cover.

That would not be a total solution to the problem. The uninsured motorist who has failed for one reason or another to obtain the necessary insurance cover may not be persuaded by that procedure any more than the person who is determined to avoid the payment of the tax necessarily finds that the requirement to have a tax disc persuades him to abide by the law. But it can be fairly said that, if the tax disc were not required to be displayed, the level of evasion would be likely to be higher. It follows from that that, if an insurance disc were required to be displayed, the number of uninsured motorists would be likely to decrease.

It has been estimated that the number of drivers driving while uninsured is in the region of 1 million. Some may have stolen the vehicle that they are driving, a situation which the House had an opportunity to consider on Monday, 9 December, when it debated the Aggravated Vehicle-Taking Bill, but tonight I am not so much concerned with those who steal vehicles—they can be dealt with by separate legislation—as with those who decide to take a chance on not being insured. They may think that it is a fair bet that they are unlikely to run into difficulties if they do not have insurance cover, and will at the same time save a considerable amount of money. There are also those who simply neglect to get cover because they are disorganised or cannot be bothered, and who do not appreciate its importance.

The proposal for an insurance disc has some objections. Under section 143 of the Road Traffic Act 1988, the user of a vehicle is required to be insured rather than the vehicle itself. Some insurance policies cover an insured person and his spouse or a named driver only; it is not the vehicle that is insured but the individual. Therefore, an insurance disc would not necessarily prove that the person driving the vehicle was insured to drive it.

A similar difficulty might be said to arise in regard to the use to which a vehicle is being put. Some policies restrict use to social, domestic and pleasure purposes only, and that problem would not automatically be solved by displaying an insurance disc on the windscreen. Such a disc would not provide total proof, because the terms of the policy might be being broken. However, it would provide usable and tangible evidence that cover of some kind existed in relation either to the driver or vehicle; evidence of the existence of an insurance policy, rather than proof of its adequacy.

It would be possible to incorporate in the design of the disc information about the insurance cover in force. It could specify the name of the driver, which should be no more difficult than specifying the make of a car on a tax disc. Likewise, specifying the restricted use attributable to a particular driver should be no more difficult than specifying on a tax disc the class of vehicle that it covers.

As to insurance being based on individuals rather than on vehicles, most people are accustomed to driving one or perhaps two vehicles most of the time—but an individual could display his or her own personal insurance disc in the windscreen at the beginning of a journey in any other car that they might drive.

Those arrangements have found favour in several other countries. It is the prevailing system in France, Italy, Belgium, and the Irish Republic. It was introduced in Ireland and France as long ago as 1986, and has proved very successful. In Ireland, it was estimated that, prior to the system being introduced, as many as 20 per cent. of drivers on the roads in the Republic were uninsured. Within one year, the number fell to between 6 and 8 per cent. It was estimated also that each uninsured car was costing as much as £70 extra on the insurance of those drivers who did take out insurance.

In the Republic of Ireland and in France, it has become the practice for insurers to provide discs as part of the certificate issued when a policy is granted, in the form of a tear-off section to be displayed in the vehicle's windscreen. If any details change during the term of the insurance, the old disc is called in and a new one is issued. That simple procedure has presented neither country with any difficulties.

The time may eventually come when the Chancellor of the Exchequer decides to abolish vehicle excise duty and the tax disc in favour of a duty on petrol. Successive Chancellors have considered doing so for a very long time, and Jersey is to adopt that system with effect from 1 January 1993. If that practice were adopted in the UK, it would bring to an end the annual regular check on insurance, under which drivers are required to produce insurance documents before a new tax disc is issued. That would increase the argument in favour of being required to display a separate insurance disc.

It remains an anomaly that, in order to obtain a vehicle excise disc that relates to a vehicle, one has to produce documents that relate to an individual. It is anomalous also that the driver's insurance may expire within a week of the issue of a tax disc that could remain valid for as long as one year afterwards.

The scheme that I have described would discourage evasion and effect considerable savings in administrative and police costs, and in insurance premiums, and would provide greater certainty and knowledge for motorists. In due course, such a system could form part of a greater scheme in which driving licences, MOT certificates, excise duty, and insurance all found their way on to the same database, which would bring great benefits to the organisation of motoring in general. However, a good start could be made by the introduction of insurance discs.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): I should not want the House to adjourn for the Christmas recess until I have raised the issue of the desirability of the Government reviewing the distribution of food surpluses from Europe.

Today, I received a telephone call from a reporter on the Halifax Evening Courier informing me that, at 10 o'clock this morning, a constituent of mine—79-year-old Mrs. Maria Clark—died as she stood in the freezing cold, queuing for free surplus butter and beef that is distributed to those eligible for it. I understand that, earlier this week, two other elderly people collapsed as they queued for hours in the cold for that food.

In March, a member of the women's section of the Halifax branch of the Royal British Legion contacted me for advice on how she could help to distribute food surpluses. I contacted the local authority's director of social services, Mrs. Meryl Denton, who arranged for that lady to approach the local Council for Voluntary Services. It decided to apply for a licence to distribute food surpluses—as did another voluntary organisation, the Islamic Cultural Centre.

I tried to highlight through the local press the fact that Government policy meant that not all elderly people were eligible to free surplus food, but only those who are on income support, and that strict criteria had to be observed. The local press did a very good job in conveying that information to the public. However, many pensioners who believed that they could be recipients were left disappointed when they realised that they were not eligible.

Such has been the increase in poverty during the last 12 years under a Conservative Government that 17,000 people in Halifax and the Calder valley are eligible for free butter and beef. The local authority cannot act as a distributor, and in any case does not have the money or the resources to do so, given the cuts that it has suffered in recent years as a consequence of poll tax capping and the rest.

Instead, applications to serve as distributors were made by the CVS and the Islamic Cultural Centre. I supported the former's application, but was unaware of the second. Nevertheless, I am pleased that the ICC applied, because the application by Mrs. Jackie Stark of the CVS was turned down by the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. In August, she received notification that it had been made one day late. She was very cross, and disputed the fact that her application was late.

Given that it took the Ministry five months to respond, I cannot help but suspect petty bureaucracy and deliberate obstruction. The Ministry could be much more helpful to the voluntary sector, which is hard pressed trying to cope with the state's abandonment of caring for the less well-off.

[Mrs. Alice Mahon]

That left the Islamic Cultural Centre. I place on record my gratitude and thanks to that organisation, which works hard to distribute food to queues of literally thousands of people who turn up every time that it is available. It is a small organisation, and its centre cannot accommodate indoors all those who queue for the food. The Asian community are known for their respect for the elderly and concern for those who are not very well off. The ICC had a herculean task given the resources available to it, and it worked very hard.

I can think of no other recent incident that serves to highlight the way in which the Government have divided society and impoverished our nation over the past 12 years. The queues for food are reminiscent of what we saw in the 1930s. I find it tragic that a 79-year-old woman should die in freezing cold conditions while queueing for food.

The Government should be ashamed of their inability to organise a better distribution method. Every community should provide a place to which people can take a voucher and collect the food to which they are entitled, without experiencing the humiliation of queueing in the cold. All pensioners should be automatically eligible to such provision, as should everyone who receives benefit. The present criterion is much too mean.

I understand that the United States has called today for a conference on food aid for people of the Soviet Union to be held in Washington. In the light of what has happened in my constituency, I feel that the United Kingdom should be included in that conference.

Mr. William Powell (Corby): I understand that the Select Committee on Sittings of the House—which is chaired by my right hon. Friend the Member for Westmorland and Lonsdale (Mr. Jopling)—is considering a proposal that Adjournment debates such as this should cease to be part of our procedure. I hope that, if any such proposal is made, the House will reject it.

Yet again, our debates this afternoon have been extremely interesting and informative. My hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes) made a characteristically splendid speech, and the moral strength with which my hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) treats the subject that he raised is without parallel. The quiet authority with which he advanced his case made his speech one of the most impressive that I have ever heard in the House, and I hope very much that it will be taken seriously by my right hon. Friend and his colleagues.

I strongly agreed with what the hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton) said about Croatia. I am a member of the all-party group chaired by the hon. Gentleman, and I have twice called in the House for the recognition of Croatia. What is going on there now besmirches the reputation of our continent, and we must take a more robust attitude towards bringing the current dangerous nonsense to a halt.

We have heard other remarkable speeches this afternoon. It would be a great pity, and would diminish our procedures, if Adjournment debates ceased to take place.

A year ago, my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) asked for the prosecution of President Saddam Hussein for war crimes. She was quite right, and I strongly supported her view that he should be brought before a suitable international tribunal and required to account for his behaviour in the Gulf region.

The United Kingdom, Germany and the United States are all extremely concerned about the prosecution of those who are alleged to have been involved in the bombing of the aeroplane that exploded over Lockerbie a year or two ago. Warrants are out for their arrest, and no one has a greater admiration than I for the work of the Lord Advocate and the constabulary of Dumfries and Galloway: they have carried out a magnificent investigation. The fact remains, however, that it will be virtually impossible for us to bring those whom we wish to hold to account before any criminal tribunal in this country. Moreover, we must be honest and admit that the reputation of the quality of justice administered in British courts is not as good as we should like, following the alarming miscarriages of justice that have taken place in recent years.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley was absolutely right to call for the prosecution of Saddam Hussein; there is, however, no international tribunal before which he, or any other international criminal, can be brought to justice. I hope that the country will begin to take seriously the work that is being done in the United States and many other countries to establish such a tribunal, under the authority of the United Nations.

The first international court of criminal justice—I am not talking about appeal courts or bodies such as the European Court; I am talking about first-instance criminal courts which try people to establish their guilt or innocence—was established in 1474, in Breisach, Germany. No fewer than 27 judges of the Holy Roman Empire—I imagine that my hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge approves of the Holy Roman Empire just as much as you and I, Mr. Deputy Speaker—judged and condemned Peter von Hagenbach for his violations of the laws of God and man. He had allowed his troops to rape, kill and pillage innocent German citizens and their property.

Modern international criminal law began with the Congress of Vienna in 1815. Those present—we heard about Prince Metternich only last week—discussed an international law relating to the suppression of the slave trade. Since then, there have been no fewer than 315 declarations, international instruments and protocols on substantive international criminal law, covering 22 crimes that could be recognised as having a genuinely international dimension: aggression, war crimes, unlawful use of weapons, crimes against humanity, genocide, apartheid, slavery and related practices, unlawful human experimentation, torture, piracy and crimes on board commercial vessels, aircraft hijacking and the sabotage of aircraft, kidnapping of diplomats and other internationally protected persons, the taking of civilian hostages, the mailing of explosive and dangerous objects, illicit drug cultivation and trafficking, destruction and theft of national and archaeological treasures, environmental damage, bribery of foreign public officials, international traffic in obscene materials, interference with submarine cables and the false accounting and theft of nuclear weapons and materials. Many of those are grounds on which an indictment or impeachment could be applied to Saddam Hussein—and ought to be—but the world has no tribunal before which he, or anyone else who could legitimately be charged with such crimes, can be tried.

From time to time, efforts have been made to establish such an arrangement. At the end of the first world war, at Versailles, it was agreed that the Kaiser could be tried; he was not tried. It was agreed that the Turkish leaders could be tried for the mass genocide of 600,000 Armenians during their occupation of the area in which Armenians lived during the first world war, but no progress was made. After the second world war, international tribunals were established at Nuremberg and in Tokyo, but their authority was subsequently undermined. Meanwhile, the United Nations has been trying to establish an international court of criminal jurisdiction.

This is not the first time that I have raised the matter in the House. I did so in the debate on the Queen's Speech. I did not, of course, expect my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to have sufficient grasp of the subject to reply, but I did expect him to pass on my views to the Foreign Office. I expect that he did so, but I have heard nothing from the Foreign Office about the action that it is taking. I regard that as disgraceful: I do not believe that the Foreign Office is doing anything about the matter, and it ought to be doing something.

An immense amount of work is being done in the world, under the leadership of one of the most remarkable legal scholars alive today—Professor M. Cherif Bassiouni, professor of law at De Paul University in Chicago, Illinois. His international institute has the support of the Italian Ministry of Justice in Syracuse, Sicily. Officials as well as academics in many countries have worked hard and the United Nations has published two draft constitutions for such an international court—the most recent was published in 1990. Professor Bassiouni took the leading role in the preparation of each, and is regarded as the UN draftsman on the subject.

What should we be doing? I have several suggestions. First, this country is a permanent member of the United Nations Security Council. Given the change in the international situation since the collapse of the iron curtain, and the fact that the UN is now for the first time capable of operating in the framework which its founding fathers envisaged, we and the other permanent members of the Security Council should take a lead in bringing forward the draft convention which is in place and turning it into agreed international law with an agreed permanent international tribunal capable of enforcing it.

I shall not go into detail on all the legal rules, and so on. They are all there. For the benefit of the House, they are easily available in the spring 1991 editions of the Nova Law Review and the Indiana International and Comparative Law Review. My right hon. Friend and our colleagues in the Foreign Office may find the articles by Professor Bassiouni in those two journals rather more interesting than many of the other documents that they may be given by their Departments to take away over the Christmas recess.

We need to start taking the matter seriously not only in the Security Council but in the European Community. Over the past few days, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, with our other right hon. Friends, has been involved most successfully at Maastricht, but in the new architecture of the European Community no place has been found for an international criminal tribunal dealing with European matters. I am convinced that, if there were such a tribunal, it would be easier to bring those accused of the Lockerbie bombing to justice.

Surely that would be true in the dimension of Irish terrorism, too. The quality of justice in British courts has been called into question from Ireland so many times that I am sure that it would be easier to overcome the difficulties of extradition if we had an international tribunal operating on a European basis.

One of the biggest deficiencies in the European institutions is the absence of such an international court. I hope that we will use our presidency of the Council of Ministers in the second part of next year to advance and bring to a successful conclusion the establishment of such a court.

One other factor is noticeable. Not only is the Foreign Office doing very little, if anything, but almost none of the vast literature on the subject is British. Almost none comes from English or Scottish universities, or the professional literature of lawyers and law libraries. In this country, an international tribunal is a Cinderella subject. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary and my right hon. and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor should do much more to stimulate the study of how such an international institution could be used to overcome some of the deficiencies in our present system.

I have already said that Professor Bassiouni is one of the outstanding legal scholars in the world today. His work seems to be taken seriously in almost every country in the world—except this country. I am glad to say that in the United States Congress his work has been pursued with considerable vigour by Senator Specter and Congressman Jim Leach, who have brought the idea to the attention of the American public.

It is worth remembering that the US Senate voted by 97 votes to two that Saddam Hussein be brought to trial—but even if we manage to get hold of him, there would still be no place to try him. That problem must be dealt with.

In his seminal article in the Indiana International and Comparative Law Review, Professor Bassiouni concluded:

> "We no longer live in a world where narrow conceptions of jurisdiction and sovereignty can stand in the way of an effective system of international co-operation for the prevention and control of international and transnational criminality. If the United States and the Soviet Union can accept mutual verification of nuclear arms controls, then surely they and other countries can accept a tribunal to prosecute not only drug traffickers and terrorists"— and those who ensnare people into slavery, and so on—

> "but also those whose actions constitute such . . . crimes as aggression, war crimes, crimes against humanity and torture.
> Many of the international crimes for which the court would have jurisdiction are the logical extension of international protection of human rights."

I entirely agree with Professor Bassiouni. We proclaim human rights again and again. Many people both in the House and elsewhere have distinguished reputations for proclaiming human rights. Long may they continue—but it is not enough merely to declare human rights: we must provide a forum in which we can enforce them. Some human rights can be enforced in the domestic courts of individual countries, but the world is getting smaller all the time. More and more crimes are being carried out across borders, and many of those crimes are becoming more serious in their extent, scope and inhumanity.

[Mr. William Powell]

That is why it is our duty to do everything that we can to ensure that there is a tribunal available that has authority not only in our continent but throughout the world. Great Britain should take the lead.

I urge my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House to ensure that this time my remarks are brought to the attention of the relevant Ministers, and that action is taken to ensure that an idea which I am certain would command wide support in this country if only people were aware of it, can make greater progress than it has done hitherto.

6.37 pm

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): There is one more Conservative Back-Bench Member who wishes to speak, and as the Front-Bench spokemen want to sum up soon, I shall try to split the remaining time between us. I imagine that if I take five minutes that will not be too long.

I apologise to you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, for the theme of my speech, because you, more than anyone else, already know what I shall say. I have raised the issue in the House with growing momentum since the Report stage of the Bill that introduced the poll tax, because it was obvious that that would have some devastating consequences. We now have empirical evidence and details to show that that was true: the poll tax has seriously damaged electoral registration in this country.

A report by the Office of Population Censuses and Surveys reveals that 1 million people are missing from the electoral register—2·5 per cent. of those entitled to be registered. That represents the equivalent of 21 parliamentary seats—more seats than exist in Northern Ireland, for example—having their entire electorate disappear. But there is no problem with the franchise in Northern Ireland, because it never had the poll tax. The register there is in a healthy state.

The worst deficiency in the register is in youngsters coming up to vote for the first time—those approaching 18, who are called "attainers". The attainer figures in Northern Ireland are healthier than they have ever been. They are worse than they have been in recent years in Scotland, in England and in Wales. They began to become worse first in Scotland where the poll tax was introduced. The House should be deeply concerned about that.

I make no apology to the House for raising the issue, because I think that we should take the matter seriously. It should not be left to me to raise the matter as if it were my bugbear. The Government expecially should take the matter seriously. It is appropriate to raise the subject on the Christmas Adjournment because we are approaching the time when there must be a general election. We still have some opportunity to try to do something about the disastrous situation.

We cannot put the electoral register right before a general election, but we can at least show that we are aware of the problem. Money spent on seeking to encourage electoral registration would be worth while. Advertising on television, in cinemas and on billboards to encourage people to register is of vast importance. There are about 350,000 expatriate voters on the register who have been encouraged by new legislation. We have spent £22·50 of public money for each voter who has been registered. For registration in this country on what is supposed to be the compulsory register, we have spent one tenth of a penny per person. We should spend considerably more.

There has been massive expenditure on all types of Government advertising, such as advertising for fancy employment schemes and for privatisation programmes. The money spent on advertising to encourage electoral registration amounted to 0·32 per cent. of the Government's total publicity expenditure.

The matter should seize us considerably. We are supposed to believe in democracy and in a full franchise, but those views are becoming dogma from the past. We repeat them without fully understanding them. The people who fought for the franchise through the Reform Acts of the 19th century and through the legislation that introduced votes for women in 1919 and 1928, which finally gave us a full franchise, understood the importance of people having a vote and a full say in decision making. It is now becoming a matter that should apply to Europe as a whole and to proper democratic federal structures in which the vote begins to mean something and is not neutralised by deals being done in secret by the Council of Ministers.

We must ensure that the franchise is correct. It would be bad enough if the franchise were being destroyed at random so that a cross-section of voting patterns was affected, but what is happening is worse. The poll tax has deterred from registration the people who have most to fear from its operation and who have the most reason to object to the Government. A fiddle is involved in the franchise.

The Leader of the House knows the matter well, because I have often raised it with him. I hope that he will tell us tonight that something is being done to overcome the problem and that legislation will be introduced which stipulates that the two registers are kept wholly separate from each other and that the present arrangement by which they are linked by computer will cease.

We introduced legislation to try to separate the census from poll tax provisions in the Census (Confidentiality) Bill. If something similar were produced for the operation of the poll tax, it would at least be a sign that things were being done. The council tax, which is the likely successor to the poll tax, will still require a register for local authorities.

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): Before the House adjourns for the Christmas recess, I wish to raise three points. Last week, Essex county council decided to give my constituents and their children a Christmas present by announcing in a sub-committee that it intended to close Fryerns secondary school. The announcement came as a bolt out of the blue. There was no consultation and there was not even the common courtesy of informing the local Member of Parliament. As ever, the local socialists were out next day delivering leaflets saying, "Save Fryerns school. Vote Labour." They play at politics; I intend to ensure that the school does not close. As long as I am Member of Parliament for Basildon, there will be no closure of schools in my constituency.

I have five children, which is not unusual for Basildon. In contrast to the rest of Essex, we have a growing population. The idea that the other six secondary schools could absorb the children from Fryerns schools is crazy.

Over the past year, I have spent a lot of time working with the excellent headmaster, Mr. Slater, and his wonderful teaching staff. They offer the full range of the national curriculum, they concentrate on helping children who have special educational needs and they run an excellent adult education centre. We certainly need Fryerns school. I give Essex county council a warning. Fryerns school will not close and I intend to ensure that it does not close.

At my surgery on Saturday, I had a deputation from shopkeepers in Whitmore way. In Basildon, we have the largest covered shopping centre in Europe. It is an excellent shopping centre and I hope that people throughout the country will do their Christmas shopping in Basildon. One effect of the covered shopping centre has been that local traders have suffered to an extent. The Basildon development corporation and the Commission for New Towns have spent a huge amount of British taxpayers' money on the infrastructure in Basildon. There is, of course, a duty for the CNT to return some of that investment to the British taxpayer.

However, it came as a tremendous blow to the local shopkeepers when they recently received the rent review on the leases of their shops. Most of those people are small shopkeepers who have been in the town for 30 years. They have found that their rents have gone up by 50 or 75 per cent. That is not acceptable. Trading conditions over the past 18 months, as we all know, have not been favourable in the south. We need to help those small shopkeepers stay in business and the rent proposals are quite unacceptable.

Earlier this year, I tried to amend the Pet Animals Act 1951. I know that it may seem unpleasant to spoil children's fun at Christmas, but, extraordinarily, under the Act minors are allowed to go into pet shops without their parents' permission and to purchase all kinds of animals including dogs and exotic reptiles. I am delighted to say that the House gave my Bill an unopposed Second Reading. The Bill was referred to a Standing Committee, but we ran out of time.

I hope that the House will unite on the issue. We can then amend the 1951 Act so that any child who wishes to purchase a pet will have to have the permission of a parent or, better still, be accompanied by a parent. As the Royal Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals can testify, many pets are abandoned at Christmas time. Let us make this a happy Christmas for human beings and also for animals.

6.49 pm

Mr. Bruce Grocott (The Wrekin): The debate on the Christmas Adjournment is always interesting. Hon. Members speak on a variety of subjects about which they feel strongly and on which they feel they are knowledgeable. However, it is an impossible debate to respond to. Therefore, I will not make much of an attempt to respond to it but instead will concentrate on a few issues that I believe it is appropriate to consider at this time of the year.

I am sure that hon. Members were concerned to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) about people infected with HIV. Several other contributions will also be worth reading.

I cannot possibly carry on without mentioning the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon). As a result of his position as deputy Chief Whip, he does not often have an opportunity to speak in the House. However, my word, I enjoyed his speech today. Perhaps we should alter the convention that deputy Chief Whips should not speak in the Chamber.

I apologise for not being able to respond to all the points that have been raised. I want instead to refer to two issues that have a holiday and seasonal flavour. The first is holidays, and in particular bank holidays, and the second is television, which is the nation's most popular entertainment during holiday periods and which, for reasons that I will spell out briefly, is facing tremendous problems not least as a result of the Broadcasting Act 1990.

As hon. Members will be aware, we will enjoy three bank holidays during the Christmas recess, two of which —Christmas day and new year's day—are common throughout the European Community. That is a basic standard of provision for workers throughout the Community. I am not sure whether the Government are hostile towards that harmonisation of holidays. Perhaps they feel that our competitiveness would improve if there were no holidays in this country or that investment would flow into this country if we ended those basic minimum standards of provision. However, even this Government must agree that it is not a bad idea to have some bank holidays. Mercifully, we will not have an opportunity to discover whether the Government want those privileges to be removed because the Conservatives will not be in office for much longer.

It is worth drawing attention to the fact that we have the worst provision of any European Community country in respect of national public holidays. We have only eight and we will be using up three of them in the next few weeks. Ireland and Holland have nine; Italy and Denmark have 10; Germany and France have 11; Luxembourg and Portugal have 12; and Belgium, Greece and Spain have 13. I cannot for the life of me understand why we should not have more public holidays in this country. I am a reasonable fellow, so I will not ask for 13 overnight. However, perhaps we should have 11, the average for the Community.

The bank holiday on 25 December will be the first bank holiday since 24 August. That is a huge gap. Almost every other country has at least one public national holiday between those dates. Only Denmark and Holland are the same as us in that respect. It is high time that we had a holiday between 24 August and 25 December. That is another harmonisation that I would be delighted to see developed. There would be no crisis of confidence in British industry if we had another holiday then. The Government talk about a crisis in confidence whenever we make any improvements in basic employment rights. There would be no flight of capital, so why not will the Government take a risk in that respect?

The other subject to which I want to refer which is oddly appropriate at Christmas time is the television industry and broadcasting in general. Whether we like it or not, television is the national recreation at Christmas time. The highest viewing figures always occur on Christmas day. The figures stagger me: 30 million of our fellow citizens will be watching television at peak time on Christmas day. The average person watches television for six hours on Christmas day. Over the last Christmas holiday period, an average of thirty-three hours of television were watched by our fellow citizens. That figure is much higher than for the rest of the year.

[Mr. Bruce Grocott]

I believe that the British television industry and British programmes produced by British television are the best in the world. It would be a sad day if we began to slide down the road towards American-style television. I should perhaps declare an interest as I once worked in the industry, but I have no financial involvement with the industry now.

Morale and confidence in the television industry are at an all-time low, largely as a direct and deliberate result of the Government. I do not often pray in aid the present and former Prime Ministers. However, we all know the former Prime Minister's view of what she did to the television industry via the Broadcasting Act 1990 and the ludicrous franchise round that followed. When TV-am was told that it could not continue to broadcast, she wrote a letter to Bruce Gyngell in which she said that she was "only too painfully aware" that she was responsible for the system and that she was "mystified and heartbroken" by what had happened. It is astonishing that anyone could respond like that to legislation for which her Government had been responsible.

Even the present Prime Minister announced in his usual ringing rhetorical tones, "I don't think it has been an optimum success." That was his description of what happened during the franchise round. What happened was absurd. Sixteen companies had to tender for the franchise by placing bids in sealed brown envelopes. On those bids depended the jobs, programme plans, hopes and careers of many people and, most fundamentally, the quality of the programmes that we see on our screens.

The results of the round were absurd. The most dramatic contrast involved Central Television, which I was delighted was able to beat the system. It received its franchise with a bid of £2,000 a year, while Yorkshire Television—a smaller company—bid £38 million a year. There are no winners or losers in such a situation. It was a farce of free enterprise and so-called market forces. The irony is that the franchise that went via market forces was TV-am, about which the former Prime Minister was most upset.

Of the 16 independent television companies, three went to the sole bidders; five went to the highest bidders—Anglia, Tyne Tees Television, HTV and a couple of others. Eight were awarded on so-called quality grounds; in other words, the franchise went, not to the highest bidder, but to one of the others.

The net result has been chaos and uncertainty in the ITV system and that is mirrored in many ways by fear and anxiety in the BBC. The BBC is deeply afraid of the plans that the Government—should they remain in office—have for it. I can reassure the BBC that none of those plans will come to fruition, but it is still very worrying for the people working at the BBC.

As a result of all the changes, about £100 million which was previously available for programme making will go to the Treasury through taxation, and that is bound to have an effect on programme quality.

I referred to the number of people who will watch television over the Christmas period, but I did not mention that much of that television material would be made by the BBC. About 150 hours of Christmas programming is made by British film editors, producers, production assistants, location managers, lighting engineers and sound engineers. All that expertise is in Britain, and it is under threat because of the Government's broadcasting lottery.

Conservative Members do not often get worked up about some matters, but I shall mention one about which they will get worked up. Another effect of the so-called free market on broadcasting is that, in the gloomy days of February when the world cup cricket series is being played in a sunny clime, because of a higher bid by British Satellite Broadcasting, we will not be able to see it on our television screens. The free market at work will ensure that most of our fellow citizens will not be able to watch it. I hope that plenty of constituents rightly complain about the operation of the free market on broadcasting.

Mr. Ward: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Grocott: I cannot give way, as I have only a minute left.

I should like to think that the Government would pay attention to those considerations, but I know that they will not do so. In a sense, that does not matter, because the Government will not be with us for much longer. The only reason why this Parliament is stumbling on is that the Government are waiting and hoping that something will turn up. There is no raison d'etre left for this Parliament. It has no functions of substance left to perform. The Government have no mandate left to fulfil. As we all know, it is simply a matter of the Prime Minister checking the opinion polls and hoping desperately that three or four in succession will show a slim lead for him. As soon as that happens, Parliament will be dissolved. The sooner that happens, the better.

7.1 pm

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John MacGregor): Unlike the hon. Member for The Wrekin (Mr. Grocott), I do not have the luxury of not being able to respond to the debate. As always, many interesting and often detailed points have been raised. I try to keep abreast of most issues of policy, but I cannot cover every detail of what happens in constituencies. As usual, there has been a fair amount of telephoning to Departments during the debate. If I do not manage to cover all the points in the short time available to me, I will certainly draw Members' comments to the attention of my appropriate right hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge (Sir J. Stokes), with his characteristic courtesy, warned me that he could not stay for the end of the debate. However, I must comment on his speech. As always, my hon. Friend spoke for England, which makes me wonder how appropriate it is for a Scotsman to reply to his comments. However, as I have represented an English seat for nearly 18 years, I can say that we would be sad if we did not hear his voice and sentiments.

My hon. Friend the Member for Halesowen and Stourbridge paid tribute to the armed forces. As recent conflicts have shown, the benefits of their discipline, courage, training and professionalism have been very evident. He also commented on the effect of progressive methods in education. He had in mind some of the heavy emphasis on child-centred education in primary schools. He will know that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Education and Science and I have been concerned about such matters and have been trying to obtain a different approach in some of our primary schools.

My hon. Friend was a little off balance today in the picture that he painted. He might have pointed out that there are many outstanding teachers and clergymen, and a huge improvement in British management. In the 1970s, there was constant interference by the Government and difficult industrial relations which prevented managers from managing. We must contrast that with the position today: many British firms are performing extremely well, not least in export markets. I hope that he will agree that, over the past 10 years, there has been a huge improvement rather than the reverse.

My hon. Friend also referred to the competitive world in which we live. I could not agree more. In training, which is a vital part of the performance of British industry, we have seen a two and a half times increase in real terms in Government expenditure on training, and, of course, a massive £20 billion emphasis on training and expenditure on training by British industry. I am pleased that that training priority has been maintained throughout the past year.

The hon. Member for Jarrow (Mr. Dixon) made a rare but very welcome contribution to the debate. It was an understandable intervention. It was sad that it had to be about such a tragic accident. I am sure that the whole House would wish to offer its sincere condolences to Mr. and Mrs. Mohamed on the loss of their daughter. I understand that the authorities concerned—British Rail and the South Tyneside metropolitan borough council—are pursuing the provision of an alternative access road to land on the south side of Harrison farm crossing with a view to closing the crossing. The hon. Gentleman emphasised that he wanted a public apology from British Rail for some of the comments that he quoted from local newspapers. Of course, I will refer his comments to the chairman of British Rail, and I will do that straight after the debate.

The hon. Member for North Down (Mr. Kilfedder) spoke very movingly about what happens in Northern Ireland, particularly in relation to our sentiments as we move towards the Christmas period. All hon. Members share his view about Mr. Hill and hope that he will recover. We share absolutely the abhorrence of terrorist activities to which he referred. I join him in his tribute to the business men of Northern Ireland for their resilience and determination. The hon. Gentleman knows well that the Government remain absolutely committed to bringing terrorism to a permanent end.

The right hon. Member for Manchester, Wythenshawe (Mr. Morris) raised a couple of points, one of which was about homelessness in Manchester. He will know of the considerable sums of money——

Mr. Alfred Morris: Will the right hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. MacGregor: I cannot give way at all.

Mr. Morris: It was not only about Manchester.

Mr. MacGregor: The right hon. Gentleman referred to Manchester. I cannot give way, because I must be fair to all hon. Members.

I was about to say that, with reference to homelessness, the right hon. Gentleman will know that the concentration is very much on London, because many people come to London for a variety of reasons. He will be aware that there has been a considerable increase in the provision available to the homeless. About £100 million over three years is being spent on that issue because of the heavy concentration of the problem in London.

In respect of areas outside London, where concentrations of rough sleepers are comparatively small, the Government expect individual local authorities to make emergency provision for people sleeping out in their areas. The right hon. Gentleman will know that the Government provide funding for voluntary organisations concerned with homelessness throughout the country. Grants totalling £4·5 million have been given in the current financial year to 93 voluntary organisations in England, which involves an increase of about 30 per cent. in expenditure. I have in front of me the names of the three organisations in Manchester which are currently receiving support.

Another important point is that much housing stock in Manchester—6·5 per cent. of homes—is currently empty. Action on that front by local authorities is a way of dealing with the problem. There are points that I could make about repossessions, but, in view of the time, I must move on.

The right hon. Gentleman asked particularly for answers to some factual questions that he raised with my hon. Friend the Minister for Health. I have been endeavouring to obtain answers in the short time available since the right hon. Gentleman spoke, and I regret to say that I cannot supply the figures that he requires. However, he will know that the Government expect local authorities to be well aware of their legal responsibilities under the 1970 legislation and to ensure that their policies and practices comply with it. The Government have powers to intervene in alleged cases of default, and will not hesitate to do so if necessary.

My hon. Friend the Member for Newbury (Sir M. McNair-Wilson) made a most moving speech. We understand not only his tremendous interest in such matters but his outstanding concern. His point has been substantially considered already and raised on many occasions in the House. I have great sympathy with the plight of those who have been infected with HIV as a result of blood transfusion.

As my hon. Friend knows—this will disappoint him—the House has only recently decided that it does not support the principle of no-fault compensation for medical accidents. I say "disappointed" because that point has already been made to him in the context of that case. It is widely accepted that the haemophiliacs are a special case, and the Government have acted accordingly. However, we have not been convinced that the blood transfusion recipients who have been infected by HIV are a similar special case, but we would consider any new arguments that might be made. As my hon. Friend requested—this was his precise point to me—I shall certainly draw his comments to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Health.

The hon. Member for Liverpool, Mossley Hill (Mr. Alton), who has also advised me that he cannot be present for the close of the debate, raised the question of the recognition of Croatia. As he will know, considerable efforts are being made to try to achieve a lasting ceasefire in Yugoslavia and my noble Friend Lord Carrington has been unceasing in his efforts, as has the European

[Mr. MacGregor]

Community. In addition, Mr. Cyrus Vance has only recently returned from a visit to Yugoslavia. I understand that his report to the United Nations will be issued today.

We shall continue actively to explore the possibility of United Nations involvement. However, recognition would not stop the fighting. The Serbs could be provoked to tighten their grip on the areas of Croatia that they now hold. Recognition now, without any agreement on such issues as minorities, could be a recipe for chaos. The southern republics might also seek independence, and fighting could spread to them. Although there are difficulties, the hon. Gentleman can rest assured that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has been taking the closest interest in all the peacekeeping efforts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Poole (Mr. Ward) raised two matters. The first related to foam-filled furniture, an issue in which I recall being involved when I served at the Department of Trade and Industry. As my hon. Friend knows, the United Kingdom supports the introduction of the European directive that will provide a level of fire protection that is commensurate with the requirements of our furniture regulations. However, the Commission's former proposals were not acceptable because they would have resulted in a lower level of safety requirements than we already have. They would not have provided any protection against the toxic effects of foam fillings. We have made it clear to the Commission that the United Kingdom will retain its regulations until a satisfactory regime is available under the directive. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to pursue that point.

My hon. Friend's second point related to animal welfare. He is absolutely right to pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. When I held that post, I put a lot of effort into animal welfare issues and into trying to ensure that the Community sought to achieve similar high standards to our own. My hon. Friend referred especially to the new directives on pigs and calves. They do not satisfy the necessary basic welfare requirements that are provided for in our legislation. That is why we voted against them. I assure my hon. Friend that we shall continue to press for the Commission's reviews to be completed as soon as possible.

The hon. Member for Upper Bann (Mr. Trimble) raised a detailed case relating to fair employment tribunals. It would be wrong for me to comment on a tribunal decision. The hon. Gentleman knows that the Fair Employment Commission is independent of Government. However, I shall certainly draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, who will bear them in mind. I can advise the hon. Gentleman immediately, however, that there is nothing wrong with the display of the Union flag or royal portraits in appropriate locations and circumstances. I have already referred to the difficulty of making statements next week, so I cannot promise the hon. Gentleman one then but, as I have said, I shall ensure that his remarks are drawn to the attention of my right hon. Friend.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gloucester (Mr. French) spoke interestingly and with much knowledge on the subject of uninsured drivers. I shall draw his suggestion about the introduction of insurance discs to the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport.

I advise the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) that the Community funds for butter aid allow for considerable expenditure in this country. About £43 million-worth of surplus produce has been distributed in the past three years, and we rely on the voluntary organisations to carry out that distribution. This year we have designated 774 organisations as potential participants, which is way up on the number designated last year. That is why there must be rules. Although I greatly sympathise with the hon. Lady's constituent, I do not know of the individual circumstances to which she referred.

I have only one comment to make about the closing remarks of the hon. Member for The Wrekin. There are plenty of raisons d'etre for the House to continue with this Session, because we have plenty of work to do. His comments totally ignored the fundamentally important outcome of the Maastricht negotiations and the importance of the fact that it was my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary who undertook those negotiations, not his right hon. Friends, as the country has widely recognised. That is why the country will want my right hon. Friends to lead Britain into the 1990s and beyond.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House at its rising on Friday 20th December do adjourn until Monday 13th January 1992.

CONSOLIDATED FUND BILL

Order for Second Reading read.

Question, That the Bill be now read a Second time, put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 54 (Consolidated Fund Bills), and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Question, That the Bill be now read the Third time, put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read the Third time, and passed.

Motion made, and Question proposed, pursuant to Standing Order No. 54 (Consolidated Fund Bills), That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Lightbown.]

Crime

7.15 pm

Mr. Peter Archer (Warley, West): It is said that fortune smiles alike on the just and the unjust, and I am grateful that in the ballot for this evening's debate, fortune did not make that distinction, because I invite the House to consider the subject of crime and how to reduce it. That subject is a source of great concern to my constituents.

In the industrial black country of the west midlands, we could list many problems. We are never short of topics for conversation these days, but one recurring source of anxiety is the crime wave. I accept that the statistics show that the increase is not uniform across all offences, but no one will persuade the people of Rowley Regis and Oldbury that crime has not been increasing or that it is not continuing to increase. Their experience tells them what the statistics confirm—that between 1980 and 1989, recorded crime rose by 46 per cent. In 1990, the last year for which we have the figures, it increased by a further 17 per cent. And those figures relate only to recorded crime. People increasingly say to me, "I had a break-in but, no, I did not report it. What's the use?" I shall return to what they mean by that observation in a moment.

My constituents sometimes read about massive frauds, and some of them are the victims of what has come to be known as white collar crime. However, when they speak about crime, they have in mind the burglary of people's homes, malicious damage and petty but distressing assaults. They believe that it is a function of Government to do something about it. They have lived for 12 years with a Government who believe that nothing is the legitimate concern of Government. It is all the fault of parents or of the decline in churchgoing or of the break-up of the family. That is a bit rich from a Government whose policies on the poll tax and social benefits are driving children away from home.

"But," the Government say, "it is nothing to do with us." My constituents do not accept that. They believe that Governments can do something about the increase in crime, especially when they see the Home Secretary receiving standing ovations at successive Conservative party conferences for saying that he jolly well will do something about it.

I do not suggest that there is a single simple solution that will restore law and order at a stroke. There are as many ways of reducing crime as there are reasons why people commit crime. Human conduct—whether human virtue or human wickedness—is not reducible to one single motivation. I would not dispute that increasing the penalties that the courts may impose may help to reduce some offences.

As the Minister of State and my hon. Friends the Members for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) and for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) will recollect —I am encompassed about with a great cloud of witnesses —earlier in the year I was responsible for tabling an amendment in Committee to the Criminal Justice Act 1991 to increase the penalty for badger baiting. To her credit, the Minister of State, Home Office, the right hon. Member for Mitcham and Morden (Mrs. Rumbold) listened and was persuaded. I believe that increasing the penalty will go some way to reducing that vicious manifestation of cruelty.

My constituents would not dispute with the Home Secretary the part that increased penalties can sometimes play, but they think it reasonable to expect that he should sometimes have some other ideas. Like the old army doctors who thought that the answer to every complaint was a laxative pill, the Home Secretary goes on prescribing the same remedy as he offered last time, while the patient's condition continues to deteriorate. That is despite the fact that the Home Office, even under Tory Governments, has produced some valuable studies of the factors that encourage crime, as the Minister and Opposition Members have agreed more than once.

It is not always necessary to wait until a crime has been committed and then respond to it. It is better, if possible, to prevent a crime from being committed. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] There seems to be some unanimity about that. In the past few years, a whole science of crime prevention has grown up. No one now argues that medical science is confined to waiting until people fall ill and then curing them. Everyone knows about preventive medicine. If we are wise, we all try to arrange our diet and life style accordingly.

A great deal of work has been done recently on what has come to be called situational crime prevention. I am happy to announce that I did not invent that expression, but it refers to a valuable field of activity. It involves such measures as improved household and car security, property marking, better street lighting, safer pedestrian access and better design for car parks and shopping areas. It includes building security considerations into planning practice and improving the design of public transport systems. It would be sensible to bring together, by greater use of crime prevention committees, all the various groups and bodies that should be involved in taking those measures. Indeed, local authorities could give a better lead if they were not confronted by a Government determined to reduce them financially and funtionally to impotence.

I repeat, perhaps at the risk of being tiresome to some of my hon. Friends and some Conservative Members, what I have said many times before. Of course it is not true that everyone who is unemployed or deprived resorts to crime, nor is poverty an excuse for lawlessness—that is not the argument—but there is such a thing in every locality as a social climate. The greatest single influence on most people, especially in the age groups where, unhappily, crime is most prevalent, is the opinion of a peer group.

A teenager on a deprived estate will not respect the law because the Minister and I say that he ought to do so, but if his friends and associates and other teenagers tell him that the authorities are trying to be fair and trying to build a better environment, and that taking out his frustrations on his neighbours will not help, he may listen to them. Of course, they will not be conned into telling him that if it is manifestly not true.

The Government paid lip service to the Scarman report. They denounced "Faith in the City" without even reading it. No prophetic messages from the Government reach those peer groups. Common sense tells us that three of the factors that are most likely to induce crime are poverty, boredom through enforced idleness, and resentment. The Government would do us all a favour if they did something about those factors and explained what they were trying to do.

I should like to concentrate the remainder of my contribution on one aspect of crime reduction. There is virtually no dispute between academics and the people whom I meet in the clubs, between the two sides of the House, or between social science and common sense that an important factor in reducing crime would be greater activity by the police, giving them a higher profile and in particular putting more officers on the streets.

The West Midlands police force has been addressing that problem. I have an account of its thinking over the past few years. It has considered how to arrange administrative tasks so as to leave the maximum number of officers free for operational duties. It has established administrative support units manned largely by civilians to remove as many administrative tasks as possible from officers who have operational duties. It has saved an average of one hour per officer per day. It is seeking to replace controls at sub-divisional level with single divisional control rooms. It has established a computer and communications system. If time permitted, I could list more of its initiatives.

West Midlands police force then considered carefully how the operational officers who had been made available should be deployed. Some have to be put on specialist tasks. The more we urge the police to undertake a wider range of activity, the more special tasks there will be. The West Midlands police force has a programme of working with schools. The programme is designed to induce more confidence and co-operation with the police and to reduce the number of juvenile offenders. It has set up special domestic violence units.

I suspect that I would be naive if I did not expect some reaction when I mention special units in the West Midlands police force. No one in his right mind would accuse me or any of my hon. Friends of minimising some of their units' less praiseworthy digressions. This is not the occasion to discuss them, except to say that I have learnt that if any group of people have specific duties imposed on them and discover that the burdens placed on them are not matched by the time and resources available, they may be tempted to cut corners.

The West Midlands police have made provision for the various special units. Subject to that, they have tried to arrange that as many officers as possible are out on the streets. Of course, some of them need to be in squad cars so that they can respond quickly to a call. Sometimes they need more squad cars, but the object is to have as many officers as possible on patrol and for residents to have a resident beat officer who is available when they need help.

The chief constable and the police authority in the west midlands calculate each year the number of officers they will need to perform their duties, but it is not left to a police authority to decide what its establishment should be. It must obtain the approval of the the Home Secretary, with or without the advice of the Minister of State. Lest there should be any confusion, let us be clear that police authorities do not come as beggars asking for a gift that will cost them nothing.

When the establishment figures are approved, the police authority has to pay its full share of the cost. The cost is shared between central Government and the police authority, precepting on its constituent councils. The authority consults the councils. Councils know that money for policing has to be raised out of poll tax or by cutting some other service to their residents, but they recognise that, if their residents are to be protected and crime is to be reduced, the money must be found, subject to the amount that the Government have cut by poll tax capping.

In 1988, the West Midlands police authority went to the Home Secretary and said, "Here are our proposals. These are our detailed calculations. We need an increase of 350 officers." Do you know what the Home Secretary said? He said, "You can have 70." In the following year the authority said, "We have looked at it again and we still need 350 officers." The Home Secretary said that it could have 62. The next year the authority asked again for 350 oificers. The Home Secretary said that it could have 63. Last year the authority tried to compromise and asked for 148 officers. It was allowed 48. This year it asked for 121 officers and he has allowed it 11.

Those are depressing figures on any showing. They mean, translated into fact, that in Sandwell there are whole estates the doors of which are made of steel because, if they were made of wood, they would have been kicked in on the first night they were put up. People living alone are afraid to go out shopping beause they fear that when they get back they will have been burgled. I know people who park their cars a quarter of a mile from where they live because if they parked them outside their homes the vehicles would be vandalised, and by the next morning they might not be there at all.

Happily, there is some good news from time to time. Recently on one such estate, the CID arrested an entire gang. They were tried, convicted and sent where they belong, and I hope that there will be a period of peace on that estate. But it is all like the Roman empire in its decline, with the forces of law and order too thinly spread, racing to beat the latest threat, only to learn that while they have been away the vandals have broken through somewhere else.

I am somewhat inhibited in telling the House the whole story. If I made all the details public, a welcome signal might be sent to the criminal fraternity, but I know of a sub-divisional station which on some nights is manned by one woman police officer, together with one male officer who has agreed, with no great joy, to do a night's overtime.

If that male officer is out responding to a call and another call comes in, the woman police officer must seek such help as she can get from another sub-division, or close the station and go herself. So people who telephone the police station may or may not see an immediate flurry of activity, depending on whether somebody was available when the phone rang. Hence, sometimes they do not bother to telephone. That is why I say that the recorded crime figures do not tell the whole story. That situation is the despair of local residents and heartbreaking for the police. It is not the way to reduce crime.

Let me add one other matter, on which my hon. Friends who represent Sandwell constituencies and I have written to the Home Secretary seeking a meeting. I shall understand if the Minister of State does not respond tonight to the issue, and I am not inviting him to do so, but it is part of the picture and is well known to you, Madam Deputy Speaker.

The present headquarters of the West Midlands police is situated in central Birmingham. It is overcrowded and unsuitable in many ways. A number of changes that the police wish to make, which would increase efficiency and save expense, are not possible in that building. The car parking space is too limited for the purpose and, in any event, the whole place requires extensive refurbishment, which would be very expensive. As it is held on a lease, the cost of the refurbishment would virtually be money thrown away.

It would be better—and, over a reasonable time scale, cheaper—to construct a purpose-built headquarters. An ideal site is available in West Bromwich, in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape). The police authority has decided that it would be common sense to go there.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Hear, hear.

Mr. Archer: I knew that I would not have to try hard to persuade you on that point, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Such a move would offer a bonus, because it would regenerate the appearance, the environment and the economy of the area. The project is wholly supported by Sandwell metropolitan borough council. It would greatly assist the effectiveness of policing, and be value for money, if the Home Secretary looked favourably at that proposal.

That being so, wisdom may suggest that I should abstain from further comment about the Home Secretary, but he should know that my constituents would find the quality of their lives changed if crime were more effectively reduced. They expect more from a Home Secretary than a periodical upgrading of the penalties and a rousing speech at the party conference, followed by a wave of hysteria from pinstripe-suited and blue-hatted lynch mobs. A little thought would be worth a great deal of that kind of reaction.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): At the last Conservative party conference, which rightly gave a standing ovation to my right hon. Friend, there was only one hat worn by a lady in the audience, and it was grey and knitted.

Mr. Archer: I suppose that even a cosmetic improvement is to be welcomed. Some of us wish that when the leopard changed its spots, it changed its behaviour as well. While perhaps I am responsible for the frivolity, I am making a serious point.

My constituents want some serious thought applied to the problem. That would be worth a lot of shouting. Our constituents deserve better, and we are not asking for the impossible. It is better to spend money on crime prevention than on long criminal trials, prison sentences that could have been avoided and repairing and replacing property which need never have been damaged or lost in the first place. My hon. Friends and I say that a little thought and some resources now would pay a worthwhile dividend.

7.35 pm

Sir John Wheeler (Westminster, North): It is a particular pleasure for me to speak following the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) and to be able to respond to some of the points he made. He must know that much of what he said is well understood and that the general thrust of his argument is supported by my hon. Friends and myself.

I wish at the outset to trespass into the area of his jurisdiction and comment on the methodology of arriving at police establishments in the 43 police forces of England and Wales. The right hon. and learned Gentleman will know that I have a particular interest and responsibility for the subject, and I comment accordingly.

It is right to say that it is for the chief constable to decide what his police resources should be, both police and civilian, with the increasing emphasis these days on civilian resources, for what they do in support of the police and in the prevention of crime is increasingly recognised and often outstanding. I think, for example, of scene of crime officers. Without their work, the information and necessary evidence would not be available to clear up crime and make arrests.

So the chief constable decides what his establishment ideally should be, and he discusses that with the police authority, which inevitably supports him. But then it is a matter for Her Majesty's inspectorate of constabulary to decide, on an independent basis, what resources should be available. It is on the advice of that body that the Home Secretary makes his decision about police strengths.

We should not just ignore the number of police officers in a constabulary. We should think also of the ways in which they are used, and my recent Select Committee on Home Affairs report, for example, on sick leave was a good example of an analysis of the use of police officers and their time.

Mr. Archer: So that nobody is misled, may I ask the hon. Gentleman to make it clear that the Home Secretary is not bound to act on the advice of the inspectorate of constabulary, and the fact that he has made a decision does not necessarily reflect what the inspectorate said?

Sir J. Wheeler: That is correct. The Home Secretary is not bound to act on the advice of the inspectorate of constabulary, but he must take into account a large number of other factors. For example, he may want to see whether the chief constable has been making use of civilian resources as well as he should, and he might be saying to the inspectorate of constabulary, "If you can demonstrate a better use of money and resources through civilianisation, that might have a bearing on the availability of uniformed police officers."

The Home Affairs Select Committee report, when the Committee looked at sick leave, for example, found that some progress could be made in improving on the sick absence record of police officers. The equivalent of the entire strength of the West Yorkshire constabulary is absent on an annual basis through sick leave, if we use that as a means of illustrating the depth of the problem, and, by improving on that, more police officers, who are expensive, would be available. My right hon. Friend must also take into account the fact that, by one means or another, 90 per cent. of the cost of the police service comes from the Exchequer, the taxpayer, and only 10 per cent. is raised through local government tax.

I was very interested in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's remarks about crime figures and the extent of crime in Britain today. It is widely believed that the United Kingdom has a rising crime wave, and crime is thought to be more widespread in the United Kingdom than in other western countries. That is simply not the case. Crime levels have been rising throughout the western industrialised world since the 1950s, on average by about 6 per cent. per annum. They have risen everywhere, under Governments of every political complexion, so it has nothing to do with the nature of the politics of a country.

[Sir J. Wheeler]

It is widely believed that the United Kingdom has one of the highest rates of crime, whereas it has one of the lowest in the western world. Our society is much less violent than that of north America or of the Commonwealth of Australia, as the 1989 international crime survey showed in the report published in March 1990. The United Kingdom and Germany have the lowest overall crime rates of all the industrialised countries.

Crime statistics, to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred, are the most commonly used indicators of the level of crime, but they refer to notifiable offences reported to the police. That measure does not show the total crime, only the incidents reported to the police. When these figures show a substantial increase, it is usually assumed that crime, in particular violent crime, has risen dramatically, but, particularly in recent years, other factors have influenced those statistics.

Women have been encouraged to report rape and domestic violence. I was delighted to hear the right hon. and learned Gentleman refer to the work of his own police force in setting up a unit to receive that kind of report from women. That is a very desirable objective. Because this is being done, crime statistics are increased and their nature is changed. This is particularly true in this country, where the insurance industry requests that thefts and burglaries are reported so that a claim may be proved.

The increasing ownership of telephones has created a greater inclination to get in touch with the police. Five million more motor cars on the roads since 1980 mean that there is bound to be more damage to, theft from and taking of motor vehicles. Also, of course, 15,500 more police officers are likely to detect and record more crime and, indeed, to be available to receive reports. So a whole host of factors influence the collection of statistics.

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): Will the hon. Gentleman give way on that point?

Sir John Wheeler: I was going on to give an explanation, which may help the hon. Gentleman. May I do so and see whether he is still of the same mind?

Since 1980, the Home Office has collected its own crime figures through the British crime survey, which attempts to gauge the total number of crimes committed rather than those notified to the police. The survey shows that crime is not rising anywhere near as fast as police figures suggest. For example, the 1988 British crime survey reported a 12 per cent. rise in wounding, the most common form of assault, between 1981 and 1987, whereas police statistics showed a 40 per cent. rise. The increase in robbery was 9 per cent., compared with a police total of 62 per cent.

The fear of violent crime has risen out of all proportion to the actual risk. I am not saying that that is not worrying, and we must address that problem; I shall seek to suggest how in a moment. Interviews with 10,000 people for the survey showed that one in five women felt very unsafe when out walking at night; yet fewer than one in 70 claimed to have been attacked in the past year.

It is very important to get the facts if we are to contemplate what the police should be for controlling and preventing crime.

Mr. Sheerman: The hon. Gentleman must also know that it depends how one selects one's facts and which surveys one looks at. Referring to the point at which I first tried to intervene, he will know that there is under-reporting of crime. At a time when there is more sympathetic treatment of rape cases and domestic violence, there is greater reporting, thank goodness, but all the evidence shows that there is under-reporting of burglary as people become worried about making claims against their insurance policies. We know also that police screening encourages people not to report.

Can I direct the hon. Gentleman's attention to the Islington crime survey, which gives rather different evidence about how much crime is being committed and how much it is rising?

Sir John Wheeler: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because I suspect that we are not really disagreeing. I am suggesting that the British crime survey is very important. It is independent of Government and is formulated by researchers who are anxious to establish the truth, because without those facts we cannot deploy the resources effectively. I know about the Islington survey, and I also share his concern about under-reporting in some areas of the country of some types of crime in particular, but let me continue with the facts before we begin to look at the solutions.

It is very important to know that less than 6 per cent. of all recorded crime is violent; 94 per cent. of the crime about which most members of the public are concerned relates to property. Rape, for example, accounts for less than 1·5 per cent. of violent crime. In 61 per cent. of cases, rape is by someone known to the victim, so women are not at risk from every man they happen to encounter when they go for a walk on a dark night. Over half the assaults on women are domestic, according to the crime survey of 1986, and, as the right hon. and learned Gentleman said, are now being reported and investigated.

Although women, elderly women in particular, feel at greater risk from violence, it is young men who are by far the main victims of assaults, which occur principally in the middle of the afternoon, not late at night.

Let us begin to look at what is being done to remedy these problems. The Government's initiatives are many and varied and of very great importance. The safer cities programme, for example, has resulted in reductions in burglary on a housing estate in Wolverhampton to the tune of 40 per cent. These are surely the solutions for which the right hon. and learned Gentleman is looking. There has been a drop of 35 per cent. in car crime in a central Nottingham car park through the safer cities programme. Crime in central Birmingham is showing a 16 per cent. decrease after the introduction of new security measures. So there are ways forward in difficult inner-city areas which bring real solutions to the lives of ordinary people, which is what we want to see.

Perhaps I can deal now with car crime. Seventy-five per cent. of people are prepared to pay for built-in car security features. At long last, the motor manufacturers are waking up to the reality that they ought to do more and that they too can assist in the reduction of car crime.

I am delighted that the Association of British Insurers, an organisation committed to a reduction in car crime, has recently issued a video aimed at young males, particularly in the 12-to-16 age group. Those are the people who commit most car crime and who take away and drive away most motor vehicles. The video will try to help them understand the misery they cause and what they should do to avoid being tempted down that road.

That is an example of an institution joining the Government to try to provide a solution to a serious problem. The majority of known car crime offenders are males aged 15 to 16. The evidence is overwhelming; we must address crime prevention far more successfully if we are to achieve the reductions referred to by the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West.

The other important statistic is that 94 per cent. of crime relates to property, much of it to burglary and breaking into people's homes. Here again, more could be done by ordinary people. A large number of homes lack basic security measures. About half those surveyed said that they had no locks on their windows, and one in four were without mortice locks or deadlocks. People have taken very few sensible precautions to stop young male burglars breaking in. Of those surveyed, 73 per cent. felt that they could do more to protect themselves. Part of the crime prevention initiative which many police forces are following is to assist the public to take more precautions to help themselves.

One other initiative was announced in a written answer to me only today, so it is topical and relevant. I refer to the 16 local drugs prevention teams which are being brought into action to assist in dealing with the problem of drug addiction among the young. Again the emphasis is on primary prevention of the misuse of drugs and on preventing young people from being drawn in.

As to serious and organised crime, in the 1990s we must address the subject of police structure with greater enthusiasm. The common police services must be combined in a central police agency so that we can deal with serious and organised crime, not necessarily crime which immediately affects the lives of constituents but crime which can affect them through the stealing of their pension funds or the misappropriation of their assets and savings.

As we examine the structure of the police in the 1990s, I hope that we shall see the need for a national police agency to deal with national and international crime, while preserving the important links through the local constabularies, because it is through the local police links with the public that crime is prevented.

7.53 pm

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) on initiating the debate. He reflected the view of my constituents when he said that crime and how to reduce it are matters for the Government. The Government have failed to tackle or prevent crime. I want to touch briefly on four areas in which the Government could and must do better, in addition to the initiatives mentioned by my right hon. and learned Friend and the preventive programmes, such as that mentioned by the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) in relation to drug addiction.

I shall rely not just on statistics but on the position in communities which I have known well over many years. The Government's record is not as good as the hon. Member for Westminster, North suggested. For instance, the safer cities campaign has minimal resources and ignores Wales completely. Other worthwhile initiatives do not go to the root of the problem.

I compare the Government's record to the experience I once had of helping to redecorate a pensioner's home to brighten up the dingy gloom. As we tried to attach fresh wallpaper to the wall, we found that the damp had so undermined the structure that the wall fell down. That was not a criticism of the redecoration scheme, any more than my remarks are a criticism of some of the Government initiatives. Rather the criticism is that the basic and structural problems are not being tackled with the vigour that is required.

The Government are not giving the police the tools they need to do the job, certainly in south Wales. Here I reflect very much the comments of my right hon. and learned Friend. In Wales, the Home Secretary cannot distinguish a rural community from an urban community, much less appreciate the different policing needs of each. Let me spell that out.

When the Home Secretary announced the additional numbers for police forces throughout England and Wales, I was shocked to find that Gwent merited only one extra officer and was astounded to find that the South Wales police force was not to have a single extra officer, especially as the chief constable has undertaken a major review to ensure the best use of available manpower, a process which must continue.

In the South Wales police area, the crime level this year will be up some 22 per cent. on last year. I spent a Saturday night recently on patrol with the police in central Cardiff and saw just how thin is the blue line which looks after law and order in the city at night. Weekend availability was frightening, even before the Home Secretary's failure to tackle the issues within Cardiff prison, and other areas put enormous pressure on police time and cells.

My constituency includes part of four divisions, so I have had a unique opportunity to see the problems which the police face in diverse communities. Right hon. and hon. Friends could replicate that experience and express the same concern about urban and rural areas throughout Wales and England. The Home Secretary and the Minister of State must face up to two facts: first, that their party is guilty of creating the conditions for crime and failing to tackle the root causes of crime; and, secondly, that the police do not have the tools for the job.

I set out to find out why no extra police were coming to help our communities. It is not enough for the Minister to pass the buck to the chief inspector of constabulary. I found that part of the reason lay in the formula used to decide the police needs of each area, by which the Home Secretary gives greater weighting per thousand of urban population. Hon. Members might say that that was fair enough, but the Government have gone on to use a bizarre and irrelevant definition of urban and rural.

According to the definition, Cwmbran is not an urban area, nor is Aberdare, Rhondda, Abertillery, Neath, Barry, Penarth, Merthyr, Pontypool or Port Talbot, that well-known steel town; nor is Newport, the third city in south Wales. According to the bizarre method of calculation, the urban population of Gwent is nil. Only Swansea and Cardiff fall into the urban category. It is no wonder the Home Secretary came up with a derisory response to the heartfelt plea for more police to restore a sense of security to our communities. How, a week after that crazy decision, are we to place confidence in Ministers who talk about policing and crime prevention in our urban and rural communities when they cannot tell one from t'other?

It is not as if the Home Secretary had not been warned. If present trends continue, reported crime will have risen by 113 per cent. between 1981 and 1991 in the South Wales police area. Incidents requiring attendance by police officers are up by nearly 80 per cent. since 1984, and 999 calls are up by over 20 per cent. in the same period. I am not sure who is more demoralised by that—the local people, who frequently complain that they do not get a quick response when they need help, or the local police, who attend the crime in an attempt to do the good job that they intended when they entered the police force, knowing that they are likely to be pulled in all directions to answer calls on a blue line that has been pulled far too thin by the Government's demands. In 1990, the number of crime calls per officer in south Wales was more than 42, compared with 29 in Cheshire and 39 in Leicester, to take just two examples. Where is the sense or comparability of that?

[Mr. Alun Michael]

In his response to the Home Secretary's manpower announcement, the chief constable of south Wales, Mr. Lawrence, said:

"I must repeat my warning that the South Wales Constabulary cannot be treated like a sponge and continually expected to absorb an ever-increasing workload without an inevitable decline in the quality of the service we provide".

In the light of the facts that I have set out, his conclusion that the Home Office decision is "ill-conceived" is a masterpiece of restrained understatement.

In a number of ways, the police are making positive responses to suggestions of working together to tackle problem areas and undertake inter-agency approaches to the many problems that need a co-operative approach. But they need help from the Home Secretary both to do their basic job properly and to take their share in such initiatives, and I greatly regret that help has not been forthcoming. I understand that the Home Secretary still has some flexibility within this year's resource allocation, and I appeal to the Minister of State who is present for this debate, the right hon. Member for Oxford, West and Abingdon (Mr. Patten), to undertake to reconsider the needs of the South Wales and Gwent police forces.

I wish that I had time to go more deeply into the Government's failure to tackle the root causes of crime in our communities, but suffice it to say that neither unemployment nor lack of a decent home is an excuse for crime. On that, I agree with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer). However, failure to tackle the economy, provide relevant training and create long-term prosperity all help to create a second and third generation of young people growing up with despair ever present in their communities. That is not healthy, and it nurtures the likelihood of crime, which damages victim and delinquent alike, as well as their families and the community in which they live.

I worked in the communities that experienced the most painful impact of the first of the Government's recessions in the 1980s. At that time—at least to start with—we could pick up some of those who had been the least successful in their school careers, often because they had turned their backs on the opportunities open to them, and provide the first steps towards training and employment. They often responded positively to being given a chance, but as time went on, the same families ended up with the father on the dole and older brothers and sisters unable to find work. Younger brothers, sisters and cousins approaching working age did so in an atmosphere of discouragement and despair. That experience angered and frustrated me sufficiently to consider coming to this place to try to change the evil which the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) was letting loose on decent families in decent communities.

Sadly, largely the same communities felt the burden of crime. Most of the delinquent youngsters with whom I worked—I stress most, not all—did not need to be involved in delinquent activity. There remains truth in the adage, "The devil makes work for idle hands"; and I assert that lack of hope is the greatest recruiting officer for all criminal activity.

The assertion, "If it isn't hurting, it isn't working," shows callous disregard and ignorance of the effects of social problems on individuals, families and communities at the sharp end. As for the economy, when it hurts in this recession, the pain is felt most—in a way that is most unfair—by the same families and communities who felt the worst pain in every other recession. It is felt by the same people who experience the pain of all the other inequalities in our unequal society. It encourages the conditions for crime in communities that already feel more impact from crime because they contain more victims of crime, as well as more offenders.

For many hon. Members, unemployment and criminal activity are one-off experiences. It is often a matter of history repeating itself from generation to generation and, under this Government, even within a single generation. That is the real failure of the Government's approach. They cannot wash their hands of social problems and the incidence of crime by saying, "Let the markets take care of it all". That will not work; it is not responsible, and future generations will pay for the Government's failure.

The Government must recognise that there needs to be a positive approach to young offenders if we are not to encourage them to grow into hardened and repetitive offenders. I served on the Committee which dealt with what is now the Criminal Justice Act 1991, in the hope that I could draw on my own experience as chairman of the Cardiff juvenile bench, and as someone who had worked with young offenders. I found that amendments that sought to divert young people from criminal activity would not fit into the Bill because of what an Officer of the House described as "the curious geography of the Bill".

Whatever the Bill was about, it was certainly not about preventing crime and diverting young people from it.

Since well before I was elected to this House, I have pressed for the provision of secure accommodation to end the scandal of young offenders and remand prisoners in particular being held in prison accommodation. Others, particularly my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), have pursued the matter vigorously in the House in recent years. The Home Office has now decided that places should be provided but that the Department of Health and the Welsh Office must find the money. But it gets worse: the Home Office has now decided that those Departments must find the money to build the places but that local authorities must find the running costs. If the Prime Minister really believed in the principle of subsidiarity, as he said yesterday, that would certainly not be allowed to happen.

Magistrates and others who have called for more secure places want them to be used to contain the activities of young offenders who are not currently kept in prison accommodation, like so-called joyriders and repetitive burglars. The current proposals do not meet that requirement. Indeed, they contain the seed of a massive oak tree of nonsense.

At present, if there is an objection to bail on the ground that the young offender may commit another crime while on bail, there are two alternatives. Either the magistrate refuses bail and says, effectively, that the court orders that the weekly equivalent of £20,000 a year is spent on the offender until his case is heard, or the court grants bail and orders that nothing is spent on the offender until the case is heard. There are many cheaper and constructive ways to contain young offenders, but they ware not being funded by the Government. Custodial sentences and remands prevent immediate offending but increase the likelihood of later and more serious reoffending. That is an area for immediate consideration and actions by the Government if they have the slightest interest in protecting society from the growth in criminal activity over which the Home Secretary and the Government continue to preside.

The Government's actions regarding observance of the law do not escape attention by ordinary people. My constituents are outraged by the fact that Ministers seem to regard themselves as above the law. I shall not refer to wider policy matters, or to matters that are currently subject to argument in the courts or on appeal, but I condemn the Government for running away from their responsibilities on Sunday trading. Ordinary citizens cannot understand why they do that. In their squalid and cowardly decisions announced last week, they spelled out in large letters the message that, in Conservative Britain, there is one law for powerful corporations that have a voice at the heart of the Tory party, and another for ordinary individuals in urban and rural communities of Wales and England.

Sir John Wheeler: The hon. Gentleman is being most unfair. The senior Law Officer of the Crown, the Attorney-General, explained to the House that, on the question of the Shops Act 1950, he had to make a decision based not on party politics but on the law.

Mr. Michael: The hon. Gentleman rightly describes the responsibilities of the senior Law Officer. I bow to the knowledge of people like my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West on the technicalities of the law, but the Attorney-General's comments satisfied neither me nor my constituents. My constituents saw him as a responsible Government officer who came to the House to say that the Government washed their hands of the matter and would leave it alone. I repeat my view, which is shared by my constituents, that a squalid and cowardly decision was announced last week, spelling out the fact that there is one law for those with a voice in the Tory party and another for the ordinary individual in the urban and rural communities of Wales and England.

Commercial organisations like the Co-operative Retail Society, the Co-operative Wholesale Society, Marks & Spencer and Iceland have expressed their horror that the Government should so abdicate their responsibility as to say, "We shall do nothing if you break the law," and weakly add the unconvincing refrain, as the Home Office Minister did, "But we'd rather like it if you didn't." Organisations that want to keep the law are effectively being invited to watch their competitors steal their trade, which is not on.

As chairman of the Co-operative parliamentary group, I was delighted to see Sir Dennis Landau's comments on behalf of the CWS. As he said, such a retailer must recognise that each family in such hard times will buy only one turkey, one tin of biscuits, and one Christmas pudding, and the retailer which is not open will lose that custom. However, he went on to say that the CWS

"remains wholly opposed to unrestricted Sunday trading and will continue to seek a sensible reform of the law on the basis of the REST proposals put forward by Keep Sunday Special Campaign."

That must be the way forward. My hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) will tackle that issue later if we reach his subject for debate. The point that I am making is that the argument is not one of Sunday trading, but one of law and order, with the Conservative party ranged firmly among the enemies of law and order.

We should not be surprised by that. I saw £3 million stolen from my local authorities of Cardiff and South Glamorgan when the Government introduced retrospective legislation to change the rules that they had set and which those councils had followed carefully and obediently. From 1979 to 1987, six Conservative Ministers were found guilty of breaking the law—in their official capacity, I hasten to add; I hate to think what the tally is now. The Conservative party has never been the party of law and order, and during this Parliament it has thrown away the last vestiges of any claim to such a title.

To restore law and order in a way that makes sense to, and works to the benefit of, ordinary people—we have an obligation to ensure that Government actions make sense—we need action to tackle the four issues that I have mentioned. We must address the social ills that are at the root of much crime; we must take action to divert young people into more positive ways of using their time and lives; we need the sort of common-sense and long-term commitment shown by my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) and his team. In short, we need a Labour Government as quickly as possible.

8.14 pm

Mr. Barry Sheerman (Huddersfield): This has been a most interesting debate, and I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) on introducing it. I have enjoyed all the contributions, particularly those that touched on the way that crime affects constituents who live in districts such as Cardiff and Sandwell. I have been to many of those areas and seen the problems. I sympathise with the views expressed. I do not want to cover the whole subject, this evening; I shall focus on what I understand to be the thrust of the debate—tackling the causes of crime.

The speech of the hon. Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler) disappointed me, as usual. He is extremely knowledgeable on the subject, and I am still something of an idealist at heart. I have an ideal picture of a Chairman of a Select Committee who is knowledgeable, takes an overview of the subject and does not hold a strongly party political view, but weighs the evidence in a dispassionate way. In such a debate, he should both praise and criticise the Government. That would give the House the impression of a Chairman of a Select Committee of some stature.

However, every time I hear the hon. Member for Westminster, North, I am disappointed, because he is such an awful Government apologist, and is renowned as such. For example, he reels out evidence that the Government are doing a wonderful job. He mentions Home Office research suggesting that crime is not as bad as everyone thinks, but he does not mention any of the other analyses and carefully toes the party line. He avoids mentioning Home Office research that suggests that there is a relationship between deprivation and crime. That causes me deep disappointment. I hope that, before a Labour Government come to power early next year, the hon. Member will give one speech in the mould of a great Select Committee Chairman.

One of the aspects we should consider in this debate is the necessity of taking a pragmatic rather than an ideological approach. My remarks will follow that line. There is a tidal wave of crime in this country, and it does no good to the people of Cardiff, Sandwell and Westminster to say there is not as much crime there as in Chicago or Sydney. That does not wash. Crime has doubled since 1979 under the so-called party of law and order.

The one sphere of crime that the Government will not consider is its underlying causes. Crime is a complex social phenomenon with no single cause or solution. Research has identified some key factors that affect crime rates. There is a critical link between crime, recession and employment opportunities. Last year, Home Office research showed a clear correlation between recession and levels of property crime. Other research has shown a critical link between crime and employment opportunities.

Only last week, the National Association of Probation Officers issued a report showing that up to 80 per cent. of probation clients are now out of work. The Apex Trust work shows that ex-offenders in employment are three times less likely to offend than those who are unemployed, which is remarkable. I wish that the Minister would respond to a point that I made in a debate last week when I spoke of the tragedy that the employment advisory service—available to prisoners both before and after their release—had been withdrawn by the Government. I wish that it could be restored.

The link between recession, deprivation and crime hardly comes as a surprise—it is a common-sense notion. Moreover, it has been obvious for more than 50 years. As long ago as 1940, Mannheim produced a report on the social aspects of crime in England in the inter-war years. His work showed that crime more than doubled during those years. The idea that the 1930s was a crime-free era is a myth. The same disastrous pattern of crime rising in the wake of recession was seen then as now. In 1940, Mannheim concluded:

"Where unemployment and crime both stand at a high water mark, it can safely be assumed that the latter is largely due to the former."

The second critical factor is the treatment of youth. Anyone wishing to tackle crime rates must pay enormous attention to youth crime because of its sheer scale. The hon. Member for Westminster, North touched on that, but he was not convincing when he spoke of the underlying causes of that crime.

Is it not astounding that half of all crime in Britain is committed by people under the age of 21? Some 73 per cent. of all auto crime is committed by those under 21. Some two thirds to three quarters of all solved burglaries are committed by young men under the age of 21. There is a tidal wave of youth crime, and the Government have not begun to answer it.

Mr. John Patten: Is the hon. Gentleman suggesting that there is something new about a substantial majority of crime being committed by young people—that it is a phenomenon of the 1980s and 1990s? If he looks at the statistics, he will see that it has always been like that. Right up to the head waters of time, young men have always been those most inclined to commit crime.

Mr. Sheerman: The right hon. Gentleman is right about the significance of that age group, but I am trying to point out that the age for offending has become very young. The enormous crime rate and the fact that the average age of a young person who takes a car is 15 are new and frightening phenomena.

Mr. Patten: I shall attempt not to intervene again, but I thank the hon. Gentleman for giving way with his characteristic courtesy.

As a student of these matters, surely the hon. Gentleman recognises that in, for example, the past five years, the peak age for offending for a young male has not gone down but gone up. The average peak age for offending was 15 but is now 18.

Mr. Sheerman: We can pick over whether the peak age is 15 or 18, but I am saying that crime has doubled. The youth component of that crime is much more substantial than it was, according to all the figures. Whether or not the peak age has gone from 15 to 18—and specific categories of crime move either way—the average age is 18. That is worrying enough, but we are talking about a category of young criminals up to the age of 21.

Research has shown clear links between the level of crime and number of children brought up in poverty in families in difficulty. I quote from Professor Irving's introductory report to this month's international conference on urban safety, drugs and crime prevention in Paris. I hope that the Minister has read this—it should be engraved on the hearts of the Home Secretary and his Ministers. The report states that rates of child poverty

"remained constant in the 1980's for most countries, but doubled in the United Kingdom . . . The results of longitudinal studies suggest that countries that have more child poverty and do not provide universal child care or other programmes to reduce inequalities before the child goes into the school system will have more crime. This is indeed the case. Moreover the rapid increase in child poverty in England, some of which is mitigated"— admittedly—

"by income transfers, is likely to result in further acceleration in the crime rate in the 1990's".

That is a chilling thought.

The Government are pursuing policies that are directly linked to the rise in crime. There is increasing child poverty in our country. The level of unemployment is rising—especially among the young—and we are seeing the creation of what some commentators call an 'underclass'. We see alienated young people with no stake in society and, increasingly, without even a bed. Is not that what we would have expected when the Government take on the 16 to 18-year-olds and perpetuate the myth that that age group is in full-time employment, in full-time training or in full-time education? We all know that that is a myth or a lie.

Many 16 to 18-year olds are living off their wits and on the streets. That is a sad comment on our society. Only a bone-headed Government would not accept that, by taking away young people's ability to claim benefit and housing benefit and the opportunity to receive a decent reward for a training scheme, and by halving the value of the training allowance in the past 12 years, they are picking on young people who, at the same time, are being pushed ever further towards the consumer society. Television advertising tells them that they must have designer trainers, designer clothes and good stereos. It is a sad comment on our society that the Government cannot see what they have done to young people and cannot see the relationship between what they have done and the crime rate.

The Minister said that the peak age for offending has risen to 18 from 15, but he chose the end of the two-year period that I would describe as covering the most vulnerable young people on whom the Government have picked in the past 12 years.

If, with the help of all the civil servants who advise Ministers and who sit under the Gallery and elsewhere, one worked on a policy to create crime, one could not come up with anything better than what the Government have created in the past 12 years. They have done a wonderful job of creating crime, but they will still not recognise the link to which I have referred.

Any Government who are seriously concerned about dealing with the escalating crime rate must begin to tackle crime at its roots. That means a concerted attack on poverty and it means attaching far more importance to early crime prevention measures, such as the development of pre-school provision. How can the Minister be complacent about pre-school provision? Why do not the Government set up—as the Labour party will when it takes office in a few months—a national crime prevention council to co-ordinate the work of all the Departments of state in crime prevention?

I return for a moment to the link between pre-school education and the later propensity towards crime. It has been shown that the development of pre-school provision has a very marked effect on later offending. As I have said, we lag behind our European counterparts. Ninety-five per cent. of pre-school children in France and Belgium receive state-funded education. Furthermore, each child has access to eight hours daily nursery provision in France and five to six hours in Belgium. In Britain, only 44 per cent. of three to five-year-olds receive pre-school education, and a substantial proportion of them have a school day of only two and a half hours.

The knock-on effect is unacceptable to the Government, because it means having a properly resourced training programme, a properly resourced pre-school education programme, proper training opportunities and the development of measures to counter unemployment. It also means providing a range of creative leisure opportunities for young people. They are Labour party policies, which are desperately needed in their own right but which have a vital knock-on effect on offending rates generally.

Other countries saw the need for such policies years ago. Again, the French have been at the forefront. In 1983, the Bonnemaison report brought the issues to the fore. The result was a network of municipal crime prevention councils which co-ordinate social and criminal justice agencies to deal with the circumstances that breed crime and which focus on youth in particular. Our Conservative Government reject that, as they do so many other aspects of the European social programme.

Indeed, one of the most disgraceful things that we have seen in the Chamber this week was the Maastricht agreement which, in terms of social policy, means that the opportunity to do so much to support the family, children and working mothers has been lost. The knock-on effect will be seen in the crime rate and in other aspects of our social life.

The Government have lead the country into the second division in Europe in this aspect as in many others. Their record on crime is a disaster, and it is time they gave way to a Government who have the imagination and policies to tackle crime fundamentally, not at the periphery.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mr. John Patten): I congratulate the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer), with whom I have debated closely during the past three or four years, on his good fortune in getting this debate at a rather fashionable hour—earlier than the watches of the night—during the Consolidated Fund debate. I think that the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) is as pleased as I that the debate started at 7.15 pm rather than at 4.15 am. I also congratulate the right hon. and learned Gentleman on the style and content of his speech.

It is a sad loss to this House that the right hon. and learned Gentleman should have decided to lay down the burden of representing the electors of Warley, West. He looks, sounds and acts youthful, and it is a great shame when someone like him decides to retire absurdly early. Doubtless he will spend a certain amount of his time enjoying himself. After his retirement, I might try to persuade him to enjoy himself by accompanying me to whatever seaside resort the Conservative party attends for its conference next October—I will ensure his safety of passage into the hall—so that he can see how few pinstripe suits there are, let alone the mythical hats of which he spoke.

I hope that the right hon. and learned Gentleman will forgive me if I answer first the points made by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North (Sir J. Wheeler), who supported the Government's position, before answering the remarks made by Opposition Members, who took a rather different line.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North characteristically set the record straight about manpower allocations in the police force and about the critical role of Her Majesty's chief inspector of constabulary in objectively advising the Home Secretary on correct force levels and on the identification of posts suitable for civilianisation—for that releases policemen and women from desk jobs and puts them back on the beat, which is what the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West wants. He rightly paid tribute to the West Midlands police for what they have done in this process. Would that other forces had briskly followed the excellent example of the West Midlands force——

Mr. Archer: Perhaps it is churlish of me, after the kind remarks of the Minister, to venture to comment on what he has just said, but at the risk of being tiresome, may I point out that what I said before was that it does not follow that a decision made by the Home Secretary corresponds with the advice that he receives from the chief inspector. Lest anyone be misled, I should be grateful if he would confirm that.

Mr. Patten: I can confirm that the ultimate decision is ministerial. Ministers must accept our responsibility for decisions. But the Home Secretary benefits from the objective advice of HMCIC, a distinguished policeman, and of his colleagues, who are all serving policemen and who can therefore speak from both sides of the fence.

The other important point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North concerned looking at English and Welsh crime in the context of the international scene. I agree with Opposition Members that what matters to our electorate is crime in this country. The people in my constituency are concerned about what happens there, not in America or France. Still, it is important to point out that Britain is not a violent country compared with almost every other western European country. Opposition Members like to make great play of comparing our unemployment rates with those in certain west European countries, of course. I do not suggest that, just because Britain is less violent and less prone to crime than most other west European countries, that diminishes the necessity to concentrate on the picture at home, but let us not frighten people unnecessarily by comparisons with the rest of Europe and the United States.

My hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North also mentioned car crime in his short but excellent speech. I agree with what he said about the Association of British Insurers, the insurance industry and the motor car industry, here, in western Europe and increasingly in central Europe—not to mention Japan and Korea. Those industries are scrutinising much more what they can do to make cars more secure and less easily stolen.

Yesterday, the Home Secretary and I saw representatives of car manufacturers and car importers in the United Kingdom for the second in a series of meetings. Considerable progress is being made, and we have agreed a three-point agenda for improvements in car manufacture, not just in this country but in western Europe. Happily, the message is also being carried back to Japanese manufacturers.

The first significant area for improvement concerns visible vehicle identification numbers, which are critical in stopping the international trade in car crime. Secondly, we must continue to work on introducing deadlocking for all cars. Thirdly, we must introduce effective and efficient immobilising devices. We were delighted yesterday to obtain the agreement of the manufacturers to concentrate on these three key areas. I pay tribute to the increasing attention that the industry is giving to these aspects.

The right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West first discussed the causes of crime. Any sensible policy concerned with reducing crime—crime can never be abolished—needs three components. First, we need a tough and hard-edged law and order service. The right hon. and learned Gentleman sits in court and passes sentence himself, so he has seen the issue both from these Benches and from the Bench he adorns when he sits as a recorder. That is the traditional part of British law and order, and it is what people think of when they mention it at Tory or Labour conferences. I do not know what they talk about at Liberal party conferences on law and order, and the party is not represented here this evening.

Secondly, we have added to the traditional approach the new approach of crime prevention. There has been an extraordinary growth in neighbourhood watch schemes. In 1982, there was one such scheme; now there are 92,000—a great tribute to people, for instance, in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's constituency.

There is a great deal of co-operation between the police, the fire service, the social services and South Staffordshire water board, which has devised a crime prevention package which home helps from the social services department distributed to about 5,000 homes in the area. Some of the information was printed in large type so that elderly people could read it. From such little things, considerable advances can accrue. I pay tribute to all who work in these services for what they do.

The third element, on which we have not yet concentrated enough, is criminal prevention—trying to stop people becoming criminals in the first place. Last week I was in the north-west and in Salford, where I toured a number of places, among them a primary school—it would be wrong to name it here—where the head teacher, who was clearly devoted to her inner-city children, told me that there were 260 children in the school.

I asked the sort of questions that visiting Ministers always ask: how many people worked there, what kind of classes they had, what activities and problems there were. She began to talk about the problems. Without my prompting, she said, "I have a lot of people here who I can predict are going to get into trouble." I asked how many. She said, "I have about 30 here who will get into trouble when they reach their teens. They are all right when they are five or six—they are protected then—but between seven and eleven they start becoming"—her phrase is burnt into my memory—"clones of their elder brothers and sisters who have got into trouble before." She was cheerful enough, but she was saddened when identifying those children whom she thought at risk.

It is surely important that we begin to concentrate our efforts on trying to find ways of helping such children before it becomes necessary to punish them, and to prevent them from becoming criminals in the first place. I hope that the Labour party would agree with that.

Mr. Michael: It is hardly our place to agree with something that we have been trying to tell the Minister for a long time. If he is serious in what he is saying now, it is rather like a conversion on the road to Damascus. I hope that the Minister will address seriously the comments that he has just made. Will he now take the sort of steps that people such as myself, my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Warley, West (Mr. Archer) and my hon. Friend the Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) urged on him before, during and after the passage of the Criminal Justice Bill, or is that apparent conversion just another anecdotal experience? Did he really experience a conversion, and will he now respond to the remarks that he has just made?

Mr. Patten: The hon. Gentleman is impertinent, because it was all those who thought like the Opposition who did so much in the 1960s and 1970s to undermine some of the messages which used to come from schools, teachers, park keepers and others who were part of the warp and weft in helping people grow up straight rather than crooked. But that is a debate which will continue.

Mr. Michael rose——

Mr. Patten: I am trying to reply, but I have only five minutes in which to do so.

I agree with the right hon. and learned Member for Warley, West that we need more officers on the beat. That is why, when my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary recently announced 1,000 additional officers, he specified that 80 out of every 100 should go straight on to the beat. However, I shall certainly draw to the attention of my right hon. and noble Friend the Earl Ferrers the right hon. and learned Gentleman's views on police manpower in the west midlands.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth (Mr. Michael) drew attention to the lack, as he saw it, of adequate policing in south Wales, and I shall also draw the points that he made to the attention of my noble Friend. He and I also share an interest in obtaining better secure accommodation for youngsters, particularly for those who are awaiting trial, to which the Government have given considerable priority.

I am concerned when I hear reports from the police on a number of things that trouble them. I was concerned about reports of attacks on the police, which is why the Government commissioned research into that problem. I am also concerned that some police forces are reporting apparent large-scale reoffending by those on bail—bail banditry, as it has been called by at least one policeman. The Home Office is conducting in-depth and rapid research into those suggestions, and I hope that we shall be in a position in the not-too-distant future to tell the House what we intend to do about the problem of reoffending on bail.

The speech of the hon. Member for Huddersfield (Mr. Sheerman) reminded me of the late and unlamented Senator Hughie Long at his worst. I have never heard such a rant. His attack on my hon. Friend the Member for Westminster, North was disgraceful. People not just in this House but worldwide now listen to what my hon. Friend has to say on law and order issues. I wish that my hon. Friend was remotely biddable in the way in which the hon. Gentleman suggested. I still bear the scars of his report on the criminal injuries compensation scheme. It took me a long time to recover from the mauling that he gave me on that. I registered my protests with the Whips, but that has done no good whatever, and my hon. Friend goes from strength to strength.

The hon. Member for Huddersfield provided more equivocal support for the law and order measures which we have debated in the House in recent weeks. We have introduced the Prison Security Bill. That received a welcome from the right hon. Member for Birmingham, Sparkbrook (Mr. Hattersley) which was equivocal in the extreme, and the Labour party does not support it. Earlier this week, we debated the Aggravated Vehicle-Taking Bill, to deal with those youngsters who take vehicles, causing mayhem, injury and damage with them. As always, the Labour party tried to have its cake and eat it by not voting against the Bill on Second Reading but tabling a series of wrecking amendments to destroy the Bill.

Mr. Sheerman: That was for exactly the same reason that I would criticise the right hon. Gentleman's speech tonight. It contained not one word about the fundamental problems that cause crime, but was all peripheral nonsense.

Mr. Patten: Let me end on a cheerful note. The hon. Gentleman must get himself a better brief. His speech was erected on the idea that juvenile offending had increased. Since 1985, the number of known juvenile offenders—that is, those cautioned and found guilty—has declined steadily year by year. If it is to be worth while to deal with the hon. Gentleman's arguments, they must be erected on a sound factual basis. His speech was based on the premise that juvenile offending is increasing, on which the hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong, as he was throughout his speech.

Pension Funds

8.45 pm

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): I am grateful to have the opportunity to discuss this subject tonight. This debate could be regarded as a continuation of the previous debate on crime.

I have two major concerns. The first is the long-term need to protect pension fund contributors, and the second, which has worked as a catalyst, is the appropriation from the Daily Mirror and Maxwell Communication Corporation pension fund, of between £300 and £500 million by the major shareholder, the recently deceased Mr. Robert Maxwell. That in itself points to the need for closer consideration of the matter and probably for reform.

Earlier today, in support of this debate, I introduced a Bill to provide a framework of protection for contributors to and beneficiaries of pension funds. In future, large occupational pension funds will be a major source of British wealth. It is not without significance that we have obliged the public to contribute to pension funds to provide for their old age. We must also provide a framework which will protect them and ensure that those funds are available to benefit them when the time comes.

As the population ages, pension funds will become more significant as support for large numbers of workers in their old age and will play an important part in investment in the economy. We need only look around the City and at company reports to see the importance of pension funds as a form of investment in our major companies and in the economy.

First, I want to address the problems of Mirror Group Newspapers and the Maxwell Communication Corporation. This debacle—that is the only word to describe it—must under no circumstances be allowed to happen again. That, as much as anything, is what this debate is about.

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): I hope that my hon. Friend will not take it amiss if, as somone with an open mind on the matter, I ask him whether he has had any dealings with the Maxwell empire in any shape or form and is now seeking to cleanse his spirit and soul this evening. I make that point because it is abundantly clear from statements made by many people who seem to have spent years toadying the the great man that they are now seeking to cleanse their souls and spirits by saying that they never had anything to do with him. I am sure that my hon. Friend is not such a person, but he probably has had parties in Blackpool and may well have enjoyed the odd tincture with the great man so that he now feels that he is almost obligated to his conscience to present a case this evening which is probably not true to his natural form. I await his reassurance on that.

Mr. Hind: I have no need to cleanse my soul. Perhaps those who need to do so will recollect the words of Mark Antony at Julius Caesar's funeral:

"So are they all, all honourable men."

Mr. Robert Maxwell, a former Labour Member of Parliament, was the subject of an inquiry in respect of his company, Pergamon Press. The inspector's report said of him:

"This man should never be allowed to control a public company."

How right that inspector was. How foolish we were not to take due note of that incisive comment, by a man who read Mr. Maxwell's character extremely well.

In the past, Labour Members criticised supporters of this Government and right hon. and hon. Members for financial mismanagement, but that is not the exclusive preserve of Members of every party other than Labour. No one can point a finger at anyone in this debate in that regard. The guilty have an equal share in that respect.

Robert Maxwell helped himself to the Mirror pension fund. While professional journalists—rightly, in my view—investigated the financial misdeeds of others, Maxwell had his hand in their pocket and robbed them blind. That was not all. A more serious aspect is that, after Robert Maxwell's death, we are led to believe by the newspapers that a further £300 million went missing from the group's various pension funds, which suggests that such activities went deeper than just one man, and that others were involved. They too must be called to account, and we know that those matters are now being investigated by the Serious Fraud Office.

The existing law has failed us in respect of the proper control and management of pension funds. The law is clearly defined. It is based on the law of trust—and most pension funds are trusts. There was a major judgment on that subject in 1883. In the case of Speight, the judges held:

"Trustees also have a duty to act diligently and prudently . . . in selecting an investment the trustee must take as much care as a prudent man would take in making an investment for the benefit of persons for whom he felt morally obliged to provide."

They were saying, in the language of the Victorian era, that a trustee should be as prudent in his selection of investments as he would be in dealing with his own.

More recently, in the case of Cowan v. Scargill in 1984, the same sentiment was repeated in modern-day language:

"Trustees are required to exercise their powers in the best interest of present and future beneficiaries; trustees must put on one side their own personal, social, or political views".

Those are clear guidelines to the way in which pension funds should operate. The Maxwell affair has clearly shown that a coach and horses was driven through that law, so we must consider carefully the need to change it.

Mr. David Martin (Portsmouth, South): My hon. Friend makes a significant point about the duties of trustees. Will he deal also with the trustees themselves, and say whether there should be better legal rights—to provide for a more significant number of ex-employees to serve as trustees, so that the interests of all members of a pension fund can be better protected?

Mr. Hind: My hon. Friend leads me to my next point. My Bill would not allow a director or shareholder to serve as a member of the pension fund trust of the employer company. Control of the pension fund should be at arm's length, by independent persons who are not involved in the management of the employer company.

Robert Maxwell proved the undesirability of having directors or chairmen who are in control of both the company, as majority shareholders, and the pension fund. He was a fund trustee, along with his two sons, so effectively he controlled both the company and the fund. That led to the problems that the fund faces today.

If one individual holds a dominant commercial position in respect of a pension fund, he or she will be able to direct those who operate the fund, in the same way that he or she manages the company—and will be able to select those persons who are to serve as trustees and manage the fund. That clearly happened in respect of the MGM and MCC pension funds.

Mr. Charles Wardle (Bexhill and Battle): My hon. Friend's views will be shared by many pensioners. Does he agree that pension fund assets would be easier to identify if they were held in the fund's own name rather than in the names of nominee companies? Although nominee companies are perfectly legal, do they not present a determined manipulator such as Robert Maxwell with opportunities to cover his tracks as he goes along?

Mr. Hind: My hon. Friend makes a good point. My Bill advocates that there should be no nominee companies, and that a pension fund should be a recognised legal entity. The people who control a fund should be clearly defined, as should the rights of contributors. I will return to that aspect later.

If one person dominates the fund, directors are appointed by this majority shareholder, as well as the trustees. On 31 January, Lord Williams of Elvel, Labour's deputy leader in another place, and a director of Mirror Group Newspapers, addressed their Lordships on that very point—on corporate governance. He raised questions on comments made by my noble Friend the Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Technology, saying——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. The hon. Gentleman is, I think, aware that hon. Members are not allowed to quote directly what has been said by a Member of the Upper House unless that Member is a Minister. I should be obliged if the hon. Gentleman would paraphrase.

Mr. Hind: Lord Williams of Elvel was talking about chief executives, and about non-executive directors confirming what he described as the outrageous ambitions of a chairman or chief executive. Now, the outrageous ambitions of another chief executive, unfortunately deceased, have been revealed for all to see. Perhaps Lord Williams and one or two others should take their own advice.

Mr. John Butterfill (Bournemouth, West): Is it not particularly extraordinary, in the case of Lord Williams——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Perhaps I could give the hon. Gentleman and the House a little guidance. The Chair is not prepared to entertain criticism of Members of the Upper House unless there is a substantive motion before this House. There is no such motion this evening, and I therefore hope that the hon. Gentleman will observe the correct procedures.

Mr. Butterfill: I am grateful for that guidance. I did not intend to express a direct criticism; I merely wished to comment that it was extraordinary that someone with such a distinguished record, who had been a managing director of Barings and, I believe, chairman of Ansbacher, should associate himself with the gentleman whom we are discussing.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. I have given my guidance. Hon. Members are enjoying themselves: let us keep it at that level, provided that it is within our procedures. I know that they will follow the procedures of the House, and stay in line with the guidance that I have given—and that given by Mr. Speaker, which will have been heard by hon. Members who were present earlier.

Mr. Hind: An important aspect of the relationship between directors and trustees is illustrated by the closeness of the relationship between the Mirror Group Newspapers pension fund and the companies. The accounts for last year contain an interesting section headed "Investment Report". It states

> "As part of this process, the following changes were made in the structure of the Scheme's investment. Due to uncertain stock market conditions and relatively high interest rates, the Trustees instructed its investment managers to sell stocks, and hold an average of 20 per cent. of their portfolios in the form of cash deposits".

The trustees and directors must have been aware—as it was in the report—that they were converting stocks into cash, which the company could subsequently borrow and invest in other Maxwell companies. As we know, that is probably what happened. It almost seems as if preparations were made for what subsequently took place.

The report continues:

> "a further £12,034,000 was invested in the Common Investment Fund . . . this fund is managed by Bishopsgate Investment Management (BIM) in conjunction with other pension funds managed by the Pergamon Group Pensions Departments. The Scheme's participation in the CIF remains crucial to the Trustee's overall strategy".

The management of a pension fund must be independent of the employer company. BIM—a company that was charged with the management of a large proportion of the pension funds—was a private company wholly owned by the Maxwell family. Effectively, they were appointing the directors and staff, and, therefore, handling all the funds from the pension schemes.

We are not discussing an arm's-length transaction. If legislation is to be drawn up, as I advocate in my Bill, that is precisely the sort of abuse that we should set out to prevent.

Mr. Keith Mans (Wyre): Is it not slightly ironic that various investigative journalists such as Paul Foot and Alastair Campbell, who spend considerable time investigating corruption in other parts of the business world, should find that their own pensions seem to have been pinched from their own company over their heads?

Mr. Hind: I made that point earlier. While those people were investigating other people's pockets, Robert Maxwell had his hand in their pockets and was robbing them blind. That is a fact of life. I feel deeply sorry for them, and hope that their experience will be a salutary lesson that will help the rest of the country to avoid repeating it.

We cannot avoid the fact that the people appointed to manage the funds must carry some responsibility. Sycophants and nominees of the dominant majority shareholder of the employer company must not be in a position to manage the company.

Lord Donoughue, a Labour peer, was one of the directors of Bishopsgate until fairly recently. Interestingly enough, Madam Deputy Speaker, he is reported to have said in another place—[Interruption.]—I mean, Mr. Speaker. I apologise—it was the wig that threw me.

In the other place, Lord Donoughue said that tame directors were often appointed—friends of the majority shareholder, who would not ask too many awkward questions.

Mr. Roger King: Flunkeys.

Mr. Hind: That is a good word, and I shall adopt it. We must ensure that no more flunkeys are appointed to pension funds. It is not in the interests of the general public.

Mr. Butterfill: It might have been better if the company had been called Billingsgate rather than Bishopsgate. Then everyone would have known that there was something fishy going on.

Mr. Hind: My hon. Friend makes his own point.

The fourth matter to which the House should give serious consideration is the proportion of any pension fund that can be invested in the employer company. I shall listen with interest to what my hon. Friend the Minister says about that. I know that the Government are giving serious consideration to restricting to 5 per cent. the proportion of a total fund that may be invested in the employer company. I would certainly advocate that as a sensible course. It would prevent a pension fund from collapsing should a company go into receivership.

A recent example from the north-west was provided by the Lewis's stores group, which has recently gone into receivership. It was the subject of a motion under Standing Order No. 20 on which, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I spoke some months ago. The receivers found that in February 1990 the company had sold an empty building in Bolton to the pension fund for £2·4 million. That building has not returned any profit to the pension fund and since then, I am told, it has declined in value.

In April 1990, £250,000 worth of contributions to the pension fund were not paid by the company. The following summer, that company borrowed £1·25 million from the fund. That sum has not been repaid, and since then the group of companies has gone into receivership, been broken up and sold. The money is probably lost to the pension contributors and beneficiaries. Although the group owned several department stores, it was not a big company. We must act with care to guard against such things happening.

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): While he is talking about tracing assets, does my hon. Friend intend to say anything about the Labour party's failure so far to admit how much money it received from Maxwell over the years, and to offer to restore it, since the donations were clearly funded directly or indirectly by pillaging the pension funds of working people? Early-day motion 365 refers to the matter. Perhaps my hon. Friend, having introduced this debate, has heard from the Labour party about its intention to reveal how much money it has received.

Mr. Hind: My hon. Friend makes a good point and I have no doubt that the House will note the early-day motion to which he referred.

The fifth point to be included in a Bill is that there should be a declaration that the assets of the pension fund are the property of the contributors and not of the employer company. A case has been decided on those lines, but the principle has not yet gained widespread acceptance.

The first time when such a case came to my notice was in the mid-1980s when BTR—the Birmingham Tyre and Rubber company—tried to take over the Pilkington Group, which is one of the major employers in my constituency. On that occasion, it was made clear to me by the employees who worked and lived in my constituency that they had real anxiety that the balances that were oversubscribed in the pension fund would be taken by BTR as part of the takeover and would be used for the benefit of BTR because they would be regarded as part of the acquisition.

It is important that we make it clear that that should not be allowed to happen, and that all payments into the pension fund are the property of the contributors and of the beneficiaries. If that principle were established, even if there were oversubscriptions, the contributions would be carried forward in perpetuity for the benefit of future contributors and future recipients of pensions.

Mirror Group Newspapers is a similar case. To whom do overpayments into a pension fund belong? At Mirror Group Newspapers, there has been a recent holiday payment for the company of the 14 per cent. that should have been made into the pension fund. That means that the company is benefiting from what would normally pass into the company pension fund for the benefit of the employees. I should like such practices to end, and we should take a clear look at the problem. Oversubscriptions should be not for the benefit of the employer company, but for the benefit of the contributors and of those who will receive pensions from the fund.

Mr. David Martin: On the subject of holidays from contributions, does my hon. Friend consider that there should be a duty to make up pensions that have fallen behind in inflationary terms? That would restore them to their original value. Should that be an obligation over the years so that, as people get older, they do not find that their pension is falling in purchasing value?

Mr. Hind: My hon. Friend makes a good point. Surely that must be the responsibility of the trustees and of the contributors to the pension fund in the terms and conditions when a pension fund is set up. Within the framework of legislation, such an aim would be difficult to achieve. It might be regarded, especially in relation to some of the existing pension funds, as quite an onerous burden to take on. However, as an aspiration, it would seem a sensible approach.

The sixth point to be included in a Bill is that the trustees should make annual reports to each contributor. The directors of an employer company are required to produce accounts which are registered at Companies house and which are distributed to shareholders. They know exactly where the company stands. The company provides a balance sheet and consolidated accounts. Shareholders know how a company performs. That same luxury is not provided to the pension fund contributors. Under the legislation that I have in mind, the contributors would be able to deal with those matters. The trustees would then be appointed by the pension fund contributors. If there was any difficulty, the contributors could go, as in company legislation, to the High Court for directions.

The seventh and most essential point is that we must have regulations to make such a system work. There should be a registrar of pension funds who would be appointed to apply to all funds to register annual returns and to distribute them to their members. Such a registrar would have enforcement powers, so that he could deal with those who failed to register and to carry out the duties imposed under the legislation. I appreciate that my colleagues will say that that is another quango. Of course it is. However, it is an important move which must be taken when we are considering the large sums involved in pension investment and management.

Apart from a home, a pension is probably the largest single item that we purchase in our lifetime. It is also one of our most fundamental purchases, and it is the security for our retirement. Because of that, it is important that it is adequately protected. It should be free from the pilfering or appropriation of the likes of Robert Maxwell and people who want to follow in his footsteps. We should separate the company from the pension fund and protect the workers of this country, so ensuring that we can provide adequately for their futures.

9.15 pm

Mr. David Shaw (Dover): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) on securing a debate on one of the major live issues. That it has only just become so is incredible, because over the years pensions have been regarded as rather boring and not many people have been interested in them, although 11 million people have rights under occupational pension schemes.

The Select Committee on Social Security, of which I am a member, is currently investigating occupational pension funds in this country. Although it is early days, some things are clear. On the evidence that we have received, the vast majority of pension funds are operating satisfactorily.

The case that has highlighted one of the shortcomings of pension funds, the Maxwell affair as it has become known—or Mirrorgate and Labourgate as it is known in some circles—is the only known instance where a man who was once described in a Department of Trade and Industry report as unfit to be a director of a public company ended up running a pension fund. Maxwellgate is the only known instance where a man with a series of major family companies, both offshore and onshore, based in Liechtenstein and Gibraltar, ended up running a pension fund. That is why we are debating the affair today.

The present system for looking after pension funds and pensioners' money should have been more than adequate. Lawyers draw up constitutions of pension funds and normally operate them to a high standard. The actuaries attempt to assess liabilities while the auditors carry out audits. With the benefit of that professional work and advice, the trustees supervise and control.

One should be able to rely on the trustees. They should be the right kind of people with proper training, qualifications and expertise to carry out the job. I would differ from my hon Friend the Member for Lancashire, West over his reference to trustees. Directors are often the right and proper people to be trustees. The directors must determine what benefits the pension fund should provide. They also have a responsibility, as company directors, for earning the money to make up the deficiencies if a pension fund becomes short of money. That can occur when investment returns are not sufficient to meet the benefits that the directors want to pay.

It will always be necessary with occupational pension schemes to have a relationship between the directors of a company and the trustees. However, I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West that there should be at least one or two directors and trustees, who are non-executive directors with wider experience than just being a director of the company and trustees, who are totally independent of the company. That clearly failed in Mirrorgate.

The Financial Services Act 1986, one of the tightest and most bureaucratic pieces of legislation that the House of Commons has ever passed, should have provided many significant controls to protect the Mirror pensioners. It appears to have failed, because the two fund management companies were allowed to come under the control of Mr. Maxwell, his family interests and the Liechtenstein and Gibraltar trusts.

Mr. Michael Irvine (Ipswich): My hon. Friend has rightly referred to the Mirror Group pensioners. Is he aware that, according to my information, it was not just the Mirror Group pension fund that Maxwell was running? He had effective control of no fewer than seven pension funds. Many of my constituents have suffered from his pillaging in another pension fund, and there are other pension funds besides that on which he had his hands.

Mr. Shaw: I thank my hon. Friend for reminding me of that. I am aware that he has been involved in trying to defeat and thwart Mr. Maxwell in his own constituency. I hope that his constituents realise how hard he has fought Mr. Maxwell and his cronies on their behalf. I have every confidence that, at the next election, he will get a result that will show his constituents that he has taken a strong interest in looking after their affairs in this matter.

Besides the professionals and the Financial Services Act, the superannuation fund office of the Inland Revenue takes a strong interest in the affairs of pension funds. As my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West pointed out, the superannuation fund office of the Inland Revenue is an internal organisation, and it is not responsible for publishing accounts. Indeed, today, in answer to a question, the Chancellor of the Exchequer refuses to tell me the latest dates for filing accounts of the Maxwell group of companies pension funds because he regards that as confidential taxpayer information.

Much tax relief is given by the authority of the House of Commons to people who have and run pension funds, yet, with large amounts of tax relief being given, we do not have, through the superannuation fund office, rights of access to very large pension fund accounts for the general public as well as, perhaps, for the people who are interested as beneficiaries. Some form of registration, very similar to that of the Registrar of Companies' operation, is necessary for major pension fund accounts. About £200 billion to £300 billion is now manged in pension fund form. Not only beneficiaries but the general public should have access to those accounts, as happens with private companies that must disclose their accounts to the Registrar of Companies.

We should focus on the main safeguard that Mirror Group pensioners and all other pensioners should have been relying upon—the role of the trustees. The trustees should have been the protection for the Mirror Group pensioners and the Maxwell Communication Corporation pensioners, and for all the other pensioners whom my hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich mentioned.

What has gone wrong, and what questions should we ask? I prefer to ask questions rather than give answers and suggestions, because the Social Security Select Committee is still investigating the matter, and other matters connected wth pension funds. How could one man who was unfit to be a director of a public company have so much power?

That is not the only thing that was said in the report. I read the Department of Trade and Industry report extensively in 1981, when I worked in a merchant bank and Mr. Maxwell came on the telephone to say that he wanted to be a client of that merchant bank. I rejected Mr. Maxwell as a client of that bank not only because of the statement that he was unfit to be a director of a public company but because the rest of the report shows that he did not take professional advice. He was not interested in legal or financial advice; he was interested only in the ends of whatever he wanted to achieve.

We must also ask how Mr. Maxwell, with his reputation, could end up running an investment management company that was controlled through Liechtenstein and Gibraltar.

Mr. Butterfill: Mr. Maxwell's track record did not relate only to Pergamon. Before that, a mail order company had collapsed in considerable disorder and disarray. There was therefore a long track record of such problems being associated with Mr. Maxwell.

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is correct. Before Mr. Maxwell became a Labour Member of Parliament there was what one might call a "blemish" in his background, but it got worse over the years. What happened is, therefore, all the more strange given the Liechtenstein connection, which was obviously set up for tax avoidance or tax evasion purposes. Mr. Maxwell was a man who wanted to avoid doing what the rest of us in this country do—pay our taxes—by operating through Liechtenstein. According to a written answer that I received today, nine Departmeat of Trade and Industry reports have been produced in recent years showing that Liechtenstein is a dubious place for any company in this country to have business connections with. However, Mr. Maxwell, who was fiddling his taxes, ended up owning investment management companies that were supposed to be properly regulated in the City of London.

Mr. Roger King: I have been listening to what my hon. Friend is saying and understand the message that he is successfully putting across, that change is required because we need to protect ordinary pensioners from having their pension funds looted by freebooting capitalists. Does my hon. Friend have any evidence of how widespread that practice is? Does it touch every single pension fund? One gets the impression that every pension fund is being plundered by out-of-control behemoths, like the hideous Maxwell. My hon. Friend should look carefully at this case, because Mr. Maxwell was an outrageous and extraordinary creature, who somehow controlled everyone around him, even honourable newspapers such as The Daily Mirror and the campaigning journalists who have been mentioned.

I wonder whether my hon. Friend, in seeking to avoid any repetition of what has happened, is going a little too far in seeking all the changes to which he has referred, bearing in mind the fact that vast numbers of perfectly honest and respectable trustees control pension funds. Let us hope and pray that it does not happen again. After all, Mr. Maxwell is buried on the Mount of Olives and we are told that, in the event of a second coming, he will rise up to haunt us all again. Let us hope that, if we get hold of a JCB, we can eliminate that possibility. But let us remember that we shall probably not see the like of him again.

Mr. Shaw: I began by saying that this is a particularly unusual case because Mr. Maxwell was named in a Department of Trade and Industry report and we do not know of any other example in which somebody who was named in a DTI report has ended up running a pension fund or pension fund companies. I think that my hon. Friend was intending to suggest that Mr. Maxwell was probably not a capitalist, but a socialist who liked living off other people's money.

I am sure that my hon. Friend would want us to ask other relevant questions, such as how all this came about. We must ask ourselves how Mr. Maxwell became so desperate for cash that he plundered the pensions of 16,000 people in the Mirror group and the Maxwell Communication Corporation and other pension funds. We are talking about something serious and about a serious amount of money.

We must also ask ourselves why no one stood up to Mr. Maxwell. Why did the trustees not stand up to him? We have heard earlier about trustees in the other House, whom we must not talk about for various reasons of propriety and the rules and regulations of the House. However, we must question how people with titles could turn out to be such a weak lot. Surely it is not simply because they are socialists or members of the Labour party. Surely there is more to it than that.

Why did directors resign from some of those companies in the past year without explanations being given? Why did not the remaining directors, some of whom are members of the upper House and have socialist and Labour party connections, stand up and inquire? These members of the upper House demand enough information of the Government. Why did not they demand the information of Mr. Maxwell and his cronies? One is led to the conclusion that in this case the trustees consisted of a lot of political cronies and that the real questions were not asked because of Mr. Maxwell's political power and connections.

I come to the last and significant question that I want to ask.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): On the nine o'clock news tonight, we learned that evidence has come out that the Department of Trade and Industry was told about possible irregularities over a year ago and took no action. The hon. Gentleman would do better to address the system and structure that control pensions, rather than make cheap political points. Everyone is worried about irregularities in the City. For a long time, the Opposition have searched for structures and asked the Government to implement them against their friends in the City.

Mr. Shaw: The so-called irregularities of which the hon. Gentleman speaks are being investigated by the Conservative Government and have been investigated for some time. They are being dealt with. I cannot go into the irregularities in detail, because they are not relevant to the debate. However, in all probability the irregularities were financed by pension fund money. The purpose was to create a false market in the shares.

Any decent director of a public company—in the case of Mirror Group Newspapers and Maxwell

Communication Corporation, those directors were Labour party sympathisers and supporters—would take steps to check why the price of the shares in the market was above what it should have been. Clearly, the Labour party supporters who were on the boards of those two companies did not investigate to a sufficient extent their share prices, where the pension moneys were going and what the trustees were doing.

The key questions are: where has the money gone, and what lessons can we learn for the future? The money appears to have been diverted into 400 companies, to end up sometimes in the banks and sometimes in private family money accounts around the world.

But more significantly and importantly, there is a political aspect to the loss of the pension fund moneys. Moneys have gone into publications such as The European. The European unfortunately brings us close to the question whether the Leader of the Opposition and his family benefited from Maxwell or Mirror Group pension fund moneys. Two children of the Leader of the Opposition were employed at The European newspaper. That is very close to the Leader of the Opposition. It is sad, and normally I would not make much of it, but the Leader of the Opposition did not worry about unleashing the dogs of war on Mark Thatcher when my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) was Prime Minister. In the end, Mark Thatcher went abroad to make his money legitimately and properly.

I am sure that the Leader of the Opposition will want to come to the House and make a statement about all moneys that his family may have received directly or indirectly from any Maxwell organisation, whether The European newspaper or any other. He should make a statement about the full amount of money and what he proposes to do. He should state whether he proposes to repay it to the Mirror Group pensioners and other pensioners who are suffering and may suffer as a result.

It would be helpful also if the Leader of the Opposition would answer some obvious questions. Has his office—has he—at any time benefited in any way, shape or form from Mr. Maxwell's and other contributions? We know that the Labour party has benefited from Mr. Maxwell. We know that pension fund money may have gone to the Labour party, even if indirectly. We know that £38,000 went to the Boundary Commission fighting fund and that £44,000 went to the Labour party direct. We know that other sums have been used to support advertising and publications of the Labour party.

The suggestion has been made that a Member of the upper House closely connected with the deputy Leader of the Opposition may also have facilitated that person receiving money to finance his office. We all know that politics is tough in this country and that there are not state moneys in that connection, but it is important when something like this happens that, if pensioners' money has ended up financing the offices of the Opposition, that money must be declared openly, and a statement should be made on the Floor of the House. I hope that personal statements will be made.

Mr. Butterfill: Has my hon. Friend had an opportunity to read an article in The Spectator which says that one of the directors of the Mirror Group was being seriously considered by the Leader of the Opposition as a future Governor of the Bank of England?

Mr. Shaw: My hon. Friend is right. I am aware of that article in The Spectator today, but I had imposed my own self-censorship because the article refers to a Member of the upper House closely connected with the Labour party, and I have taken great pains to remain in order throughout my speech. I accept—one can say this without criticism—that it would have been very dangerous had that person become Governor of the Bank of England.

It seems that the trustees have failed the pensioners and have much to answer for to the Select Committee on Social Security, which has asked them to attend next Tuesday's meeting. More legislation may be required on trustees. At present, case law operates for trustees, and that case law is not as clear as statute law. That is unfortunate, because, until this case arose, by and large we had few problems with pension funds. The vast majority of such funds in this country are run satisfactorily and properly.

It is equally clear that, particularly in the case of the Mirror group, the merchant banks and the professionals—who carefully briefed the City of London to the effect that Maxwell had been separated from control and that Maxwell companies were separated from any influence over the public company and its pension funds—utterly failed the pensioners.

More than anything, the Labour party, its contacts and connections failed the 16,000 Mirror Group pensioners and other pensioners who obtained their pensions through Maxwell-connected companies. The Labour party has a lot to answer for in this case.

9.37 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I congratulate the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind) on obtaining a debate on what is undoubtedly an important subject. I have been seeking for some time to get the issue urgently on the parliamentary agenda, but the Secretary of State for Social Security, whom I have already dubbed the invisible man of the Government, has maintained, and is still maintaining, a deafening silence.

I do not know how he justifies his keep in the Cabinet, when an explosive issue of this kind arises, directly within his responsibility, and he says nothing, apart from suggesting that he may bring forward the regulation on self-investment on which he has already been sitting for over 18 months and which, as I shall show, is in any case irrelevant to the Maxwell saga.

Pension funds currently total £300 billion to £400 billion, the largest single block of funds in the City. The degree of regulation at present is the lightest imaginable. It is true—I did not know that it was Speight 1883, but I am sure that that is correct—that pension funds are run by trustees, who are under a legal obligation to manage the funds in the interest of their members, but in practice the discretion that they exercise is virtually unlimited. Moreover, the trustees are generally appointed by the employer and often—not just in the Maxwell case—the chairman of the company is also the chairman of the pension fund. That may well mean, as has already been said, that the funds are used in highly questionable ways.

There is nothing at present to stop trustees investing in the shares of the parent company. There is nothing at present to stop trustees appointing managers from their own group. There is nothing to stop new owners of a business after a takeover winding up the fund and transferring the pensioners to a new fund and then pocketing the surplus. That is exactly what Hanson tried to do in respect of Imperial Tobacco.

There is nothing to stop employers paying pensioners a miserly 3 per cent. a year increase in their pensions—far below the average rate of inflation of the Thatcher years, which was 9 per cent. a year—while draining off the surplus or taking a unilateral contributions holiday. There is nothing to stop an employer shifting pension fund moneys away from reliable blue chip stock investments into much more risky and speculative gambles. All these things have happened, and they are by no means confined to Maxwell.

Mr. Butterfill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: I shall only give way a few times, because there is limited time.

Mr. Butterfill: I am most grateful to the hon. Gentleman.

While we are on the subject, would the hon. Gentleman agree that Mr. Maxwell clearly had difficulty in distinguishing between personal and corporate assets, and even greater difficulty, apparently, in distinguishing between personal and pension fund assets? Given that Mr. Maxwell was a major benefactor of the Labour party, both corporately and personally, and given that not just the Labour party but perhaps the private offices of some Labour party Front-Bench spokesmen may have benefited, and therefore, quite unwittingly perhaps, benefited from moneys which were tainted and not properly available to be given to them, can the hon. Gentleman give an undertaking tonight that the Labour party will forthwith undertake to repay all those moneys just in case they may have been tainted?

Mr. Meacher: I must say that I find it nauseating hypocrisy for Tory party Members who have for years received hundreds of thousands of pounds from people like Mr. Asil Nadir, the Hong Kong tycoon whose name I cannot remember, and Mr. Latsis, who had a close relationship with the Greek colonels, to seek to lambast the Labour party for receiving money from rich men. It is an utterly disreputable and contemptible attempt to divert a serious debate by those lurid charges.

Mr. Rogers: My hon. Friend is quite right to point out that the Tory party has been the recipient of moneys over the years from the City and has justified it as perfectly proper. As my hon. Friend has said, their hypocrisy is now evident. I do not know whether the bubbles and the heat are bringing up the sewer rats of the Tory party, but some of the statements that I have heard here tonight have been absolutely appalling.

Tory Members, as I am sure my hon. Friend will point out, have opposed the regulation of the City year after year; they have opposed any moves towards the declaration of political funds for political parties. They have dithered like this for all these years, and now, just like sewer rats, they bubble up to the surface.

Mr. Butterfill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Is it in order for an Opposition Member to call Conservative Members who raise legitimate points of interest sewer rats? Is that parliamentary?

Mr. Speaker: That is probably going over the top. I ask the hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) to withdraw the phrase "sewer rats", which is not parliamentary.

Mr. Rogers: Under your direction, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it.

Mr. Meacher: There is a yawning gap in pension fund law. That is agreed on both sides of the House.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Meacher: I am not giving way. I am sure the hon. Gentleman would only perpetuate the low quality of debate which he generally introduces.

Mr. Nicholls: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: That is not unparliamentary.

Mr. Nicholls: That was not the point that I was about the make, Mr. Speaker. I had it in mind that it was a tradition of the House that, if a Front-Bench spokesman deliberately spoke critically of a Back-Bench Member, it was courtesy to give way.

Mr. Speaker: The convention of the House is that, if an hon. Member does not give way, other hon. Members sit down.

Mr. Meacher: As the hon. Member for Dover (Mr. Shaw) rightly said, the superannuation office of the Inland Revenue makes sure that it gets its tax. The occupational pension advisory service makes sure that minimum pension benefits are provided. After that, it is a black hole.

The Government's response has been mind-blowingly complacent. Faced with a national outcry over the Maxwell revelations, the Secretary of State, like the three monkeys, heard nothing, saw nothing and said nothing. Instead, at the end of last night's debate, the Minister of State was wheeled out to mumble a hastily prepared script which purports to be the Government's considered response to a week of angry, blazing headlines. He said:

"but we acknowledge that trustees have a clear duty to act at all times in the interests of the beneficiaries of the scheme. They are required by law to disclose certain facts to their pensioners, the trade unions and the members of their funds. The actuarial valuation of the funds is an important part of that. When we have considered the outcome of the Maxwell situation, we shall consider whether any further changes to the law are needed. I am not prejudging that issue when I say that, if somebody deliberately sets out to commit fraud on a massive scale, there is precious little that the law or regulatory agencies can do to prevent it entirely."

That last sentence takes the biscuit. The Minister says that they cannot stop a deliberate fraudster breaking the law but the Government have not given the regulatory bodies any powers to prevent fraud in the first place. Hon. Members will note that he said:

"When we have considered the outcome of the Maxwell situation, we shall consider whether any further changes to the law are needed."—[Official Report, 11 December 1991; Vol. 200, c. 918.]

The Mirror Group Newspapers case is not by a long way the first episode which should have put a shot across the Government's bows. Many well-known companies, including Vauxhall, Decca, Babcock and Wilcox, Imperial Group and Thomas Tilling, have all over the last few years revealed serious flaws in the structure of their occupational pension funds.

Then, of course, there is Hanson. A week ago, I received out of the blue a letter from a person in Stockbridge, Hampshire, whom I have never met. He wrote:

"I should like to remind you of the raid on Courage Brewery pension fund during the short ownership by Lord Hanson prior to the sale to John Elliot of Elders. The business had been rationalised by the Hanson henchmen—staff sacked, businesses sold off, assets transferred, land thought to belong to the sports and social club sold for an industrial estate, then Courages put up for sale. A dispute occurred over a huge cash surplus, £100 million, I think, in the employees' pension fund. This money was to be transferred from the pension fund of Courage employees to a fund in Lord Hanson's control prior to the sale, of course quite legally. The new fund was not to be used for the Courage employees whose contributions made the surplus but lost to the Hanson empire."

I hope Conservative Members will note that it is not by any means only in the case of Maxwell that wrongdoings occur.

Mr. Nicholls rose——

Mr. Hind rose——

Mr. Meacher: I will give way to the hon. Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind), who made a much more balanced speech.

Mr. Hind: Clearly, there are problems in the industry generally. I use the Maxwell case as an example because it is horrendous. Would both sides of the House agree about introducing legislation on this matter? If it is felt that legislation should be introduced in the near future, will the hon. Gentleman pledge, on behalf of the Opposition, to support it so that it could be taken through the House quickly?

Mr. Meacher: Indeed. I am glad to give that assurance, and if the hon. Gentleman listens to the rest of my speech, he will see that I shall take that line strongly.

In the light of what I regard as cheap party political points made by several hon. Members, I make it clear that Maxwell's actions were inexcusable. But they are not new—such action has been going on for years. Everybody knows that—pensioners, company employees, the media and the public—and everybody wanted action to stop it, except, apparently, the Government.

Mr. Nicholls: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Meacher: No, I shall not give way.

I was interested to read a few days ago an article by Christopher Fildes of the Daily Telegraph, who wrote on 9 December:

"The Minister responsible—Tony Newton, caught with his mouth open, and surely not long for high office—cannot say he was not warned. More than two years ago, I told him here that pensions would blow up in his face".

He then quotes a previous article of his entitled "Bomb in Tony Newton's in-tray", of 31 July 1989.

Why has the Secretary of State failed to act in the past two and a half years? Does he realise that, by sitting on his hands and doing nothing about the matter for the past several years, he bears some responsibility for the losses suffered and for the fact that Mirror Group Newspapers pensioners have been cheated of their pensions? He bears some responsibility for the losses suffered by other pensioners and employees in a string of recent notorious cases because of the lack of a law which would have prevented those dubious and questionable practices from taking place. By his complacency and by dithering over his response—or rather non-response—to the Maxwell scandal, he is still causing anxiety and apprehension to millions of pensioners who are genuinely very worried about whether their pension fund is secure.

I mean no disrespect to the Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Maidstone, but if the Secretary of State does not come out of hiding soon and come to the Dispatch Box with considered proposals to stop the rape of pension funds, he will have forfeited his right to retain his office and, in my view, he should resign. If he has any doubts about what he should do, I shall tell him.

First, the Secretary of State should enshrine in law the clear principle—I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Lancashire, West make the same point—that the pension fund moneys belong to their members, not to the employers. That is not just the long-held view of the Labour party but was the decision last year of the European Court in the Barber judgment, which declared that men and women should have equal pay. That meant that there should be equal pensions, because pensions are deferred pay.

Secondly, the right hon. Gentleman should legislate—again, I am wholly in agreement with the hon. Member for Lancashire, West—to provide for an independent chairman who is not to be the chairman of the parent company, or a member of the parent company board. He should require—we may differ a little on this, but I insist on it—that there be a 50 per cent. employee representation, consisting of at least one pensioner representative, on the trust board. Those employee representatives must be independently elected, not chosen by the managers or owners of the parent company.

That is exactly the framework that we proposed during the Committee stage of the Social Security Act 1990, but it received the same negligent and complacent response from the Government then, on 6 March 1990, as it does now. The then junior Minister for Social Security said in response to our proposal:

"We feel that it would be an unnecessary intrusion into the way that pension schemes are run and set up, to give the state the power to require schemes to have member trustees".—[Official Report, Standing Committee G, 6 March 1990; c. 348.]

It was that folly, due to political dogma—the Government's refusal to require the appointment of 50 per cent. employee representatives to keep a close eye on an errant employer—that led directly to Maxwell's autocratic control of the MGN pension funds and their subsequent misuse.

Thirdly, the Secretary of State should require full and up-to-date disclosure of all relevant information covering the financial state of the pension fund. Every member of that board should be an equal recipient of that information.

Fourthly, the Secretary of State should regulate extremely tightly both self-investment and stock lending—I am surprised that stock lending has not been mentioned more tonight. The 5 per cent. self-investment regulation, which the Secretary of State has already been sitting on for 18 months and has still not introduced, is flawed because it exempts permanently any self-investment in the company's properties, as opposed to shares which exist when the law is finally changed.

More importantly, reference to that much-delayed regulation was the only response made by the Secretary of

[Mr. Meacher]

State to the Maxwell revelations, and it was irrelevant because Maxwell did not self-invest in the parent company, but drained off the funds to an entirely separate set of private interests. Therefore, even if the Secretary of State's regulation had been in place five years ago, it would still not have stopped Maxwell doing what he did by one iota. We await any Government response that is relevant to preventing what has happened, which we all agree involved misdeeds.

Fifthly, the right hon. Gentleman should make statutory provision for the redress of complaints. He should offer recourse to an independent tribunal with enforcement powers—possibly within the industrial tribunal framework—so that the complaints and grievances of pension fund members can be properly addressed.

Sixthly, and most importantly, we need a statutory trust deed to provide a model for the operation and administrative procedures of pension funds. At present, employers can, idiosyncratically, write their own trust deeds. They do not have to conform to a trust framework that guarantees the protection of the proper rights and interests of employees and pensioners. That standard trust deed should regulate the nature and frequency of trustee meetings, establish minimum standards for disclosure, standardise rules for the actuarial calculation of surpluses, which are gravely lacking at present, and regulate investment procedures.

I hope that the Under-Secretary will note that I think that we should look at European procedures and practice. In particular, we should consider the rules in the Benelux countries, whereby about two thirds of pension fund assets must be invested in cash or fixed-interest stock. We should also look at the provision in Germany of a degree of compulsory insolvency insurance so that pensioners are protected against losses suffered from speculation outside blue chip stock investment. I think that the Select Committee is to do so, which I strongly support.

There must be new rules to regulate the allocation of surpluses. It is simply wrong for employers to siphon off surpluses or take unilateral contributions holidays, which amounts to much the same thing, when pensioners are being fobbed off with a mere average 3 per cent. annual increase in pension to protect them against inflation—especially when the average inflation rate in the Thatcher years was 9 per cent. The first duty of the pension fund must be to provide best quality pensions for its members, including adequate inflation protection, which is currently gravely lacking.

I draw attention to the secret protocol to the economic and monetary union treaty which, it was announced today, was signed at Maastricht. In effect, the Prime Minister has signed away equal pension rights between British men and women for the next 40 years, secretly, without warning or consultation, and with dubious constitutional validity because it flies in the face of the Barber judgment of May last year. This is, in effect, the third opt-out from the treaty on economic and monetary union by this outsider Prime Minister.

When that is fully understood, it will cause intense anger among the millions of pensioners and employees who will find that their hopes and expectations of pension equality in retirement have been abruptly and unceremoniously dashed by the Prime Minister and the Secretary of State. However, it raises two important issues.

First, six months ago the Secretary of State suspended the 5 per cent. limited price indexing regulation on the grounds that it could not be afforded with the overhang of costs from the Barber judgment. If that has now been removed by this protocol—I want an answer from the Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Maidstone (Miss Widdecombe)—will he urgently reinstate the limited price indexing regulation? [Interruption.] If the Under-Secretary is worried about time, perhaps she should have had a word with two of her hon. Friends, one of whom spoke for half an hour and one for 25 minutes.

If the LPI regulation is introduced, occupational pensions will be slightly better but still inadequately protected against the ravages of inflation. Will the Secretary of State reintroduce that regulation? Secondly, will he use the latest protocol to ditch the hopes and expectations of equal retirement age and equal pension rights in the state scheme? On that alone, he owes it to millions of people to make clear the Government's position.

If there is one good thing about the Maxwell saga, it is the way in which it has highlighted the flaws and gaps in the control of pension funds so that even this Government can no longer drag their feet and ignore them. Procrastination and delay must stop. We must have a new, effective and comprehensive law on the statute book before the election if it is in six months' time. As I have been asked, I give an assurance that, if the framework of protection that I have spelt out is speedily adopted by the Secretary of State, we shall give such a Bill a fair wind in Parliament. If not, it will be on his head and on that of the Government when millions of pensioners and employees give their verdict on the issue in the forthcoming election.

10.2 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Miss Ann Widdecombe): Well, well, well. On the night when we were discussing matters of supreme importance to millions of pensioners, where were the Opposition? On the night when we were discussing the fears and anxieties of employees—past and present—who worked for years for a major Labour newspaper, where were the Opposition?

It is worth recording that, for the first three quarters of an hour of this one-and-a-half-hour debate there was no one on the Opposition Back Benches, whereas, on the Conservative Back Benches, interest has been shown not only by my hon. Friend the Member for Lancashire, West (Mr. Hind), whom I congratulate on obtaining the debate and on the eloquent and reasonable way in which he opened it, but by my hon. Friends the Members for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley), for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), for Dover (Mr. Shaw), for Wyre (Mr. Mans), for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King), for Bexhill and Battle (Mr. Wardle), for Portsmouth, South (Mr. Martin), for Bournemouth, West (Mr. Butterfill), for Ipswich, (Mr. Irvine) and for Nuneaton (Mr. Stevens). But where was the Labour party?

I find it rather nauseating—I think that that was the phrase used by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) that he should criticise my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for inaction when we have taken consistent action, not just in response to some very large headlines but since the passing of the Social Security Act 1990.

That is only the most recent measure. I could also mention the Financial Services Act 1986 and its importance for this matter, but it is worth recording that the Social Security Act 1990 provided powers enabling restrictions to be based on the extent to which the resources of occupational pension schemes may be invested in the sponsoring employer and—this will interest the hon. Member for Oldham, West—in an associate employer or connected employer. The hon. Member for Oldham, West has rushed in with his mouth open to say that the Act had severe limitations, when in fact we should examine carefully the extent of the Act and make careful judgments on the basis of that.

Mr. Rogers: Will the Minister give way?

Miss Widdecombe: In due course. I apologise, but the hon. Member for Oldham, West did not leave me much time.

Shortly after the passage of this Act the Government commissioned independent consultants—they did not just pass the Act and have done with it—Ernst and Young to report on the extent of such investment and on any problems that could arise in restricting it. We wanted to be sure when we brought in the regulations to follow the Act that they would be sensible and would stand up. That is not inaction: it is sensible action.

Following the report, draft regulations to achieve such restrictions were then referred to the Occupational Pensions Board. That is not inaction either. After consultation with interested bodies, the board reported on the draft towards the end of July. So my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has not been sitting on this for 18 months; there was solid action right up to the time when Parliament rose for its summer recess.

Having considered these representations, together with others received subsequently about the need for appropriate provisions to avoid causing unnecessary difficulty to companies and pension funds in respect of existing self-investment, we intend to lay the regulations shortly.

Mr. Rogers: I agree that the Government have, under considerable pressure, introduced legislation. If the legislation, however, is as good as the hon. Lady suggests, why did it not stop Maxwell criminally diverting funds from pension funds?

The hon. Lady invoked the Financial Services Act. I remember Opposition Members frequently suggesting that we should set up a structure to control the City and its financial dealings. Tory Members said that the City can regulate itself. That is the problem—without control of the City of London there will always be these scandals.

Miss Widdecombe: It is extraordinary that the hon. Gentleman asks why these measures did not stop Mr. Maxwell when, as we have just said, they are about to come into force. They are not retrospective and they would not have bitten on the Maxwell problem.

The protection of pension funds is of importance to the vast majority of people, and the Government have worked consistently to strengthen safeguards for pension funds and to protect scheme members. The bulk of what has been said tonight notwithstanding, I feel that I cannot comment on problems to do with the Maxwell group of companies' pension funds——

Mr. Rogers: Why not?

Miss Widdecombe: Because at best that would be speculative and at worst it could be seen as prejudicing the outcome of the Serious Fraud Office investigation.

In general, we should first consider the legal basis for the vast majority of pension schemes—in the main, it is trust law. This ensures that a scheme's assets are held separately from the employer's assets. This is a requirement for approval of the scheme for tax purposes. Under trust law, the trustees of the scheme, including those appointed by the employer, have a duty to act at all times in the best interests of all the beneficiaries under the trust, in accordance with the trust deed and the scheme rules.

As we have discussed the independence of trustees tonight, it is worth rehearsing their main duties. They must act in accordance with the trust deed and rules of the scheme within the framework of law. They must act prudently, conscientiously and honestly and with the utmost good faith. They must act in the best interests of beneficiaries and strike a fair balance between the interests of different classes of beneficiaries. They must take advice on technical matters and any other matters which they do not understand and they must invest the funds.

The duties of trustees in relation to investment have most concerned the House tonight. Under the Financial Services Act 1986, it is a criminal offence for an unauthorised person to carry on investment business, and that includes the day-to-day management of pension scheme investments. It is most unusual, therefore, for trustees to seek authorisation under the Act. Instead, trustees mainly delegate the work of detailed investment management to an authorised investment manager. However, they must retain control over broad strategic decisions such as the proportion of the total funds to be invested in particular categories of investment.

Mr. Butterfill: Does my hon. Friend agree that, in the Maxwell case, that work was delegated to Bishopsgate, which is an authorised investment manager—regulated by the Financial Services Act and a member of the Investment Management Regulatory Organisation, and that there may be a claim against IMRO as a result?

Miss Widdecombe: As I have said, I shall not comment on the details of the Maxwell case, pending the outcome of the specific investigation. It would be prejudicial for me to do so, but I shall take on board my hon. Friend's point.

In stating what the Government have already done, there is no suggestion that we are not interested in other representations. Not least among those representations must surely be the outcome of the Select Committee's deliberations. It would be wrong for us to rush in and take precipitate action without making judgments based on the important representations of the Select Committee and others which we shall receive.

If a trustee carries out some act in relation to the trust which is not authorised by the terms of the trust or a statutory obligation, or fails to do something that he should have done, there is a breach of trust. If that causes a loss to the fund, the trustee is personally liable unless the scheme rules exempt the trustee from liability—for instance, where there is some entirely unintentional error, which could be something as minor as paying a pension to someone who, upon examination, is not strictly entitled to it. Most pension schemes contain a provision binding the employer to indemnify the trustees against any liability or costs resulting from the proper exercise of their functions, but that would not apply to fraudulent transactions.

The trustee body sets out the procedure for the appointment of trustees and who is eligible. It may include people who are members of the board or senior executives of the company. It may include members of the scheme or the pensioners. The trustee body may be a company with individuals as directors of the compnay and it may include one or more persons with no direct interest in the scheme.

It is interesting that there are about 160,000 such schemes, of varying size and complexity and with different memberships. One of the difficulties in taking the sort of action being recommended by Opposition Members and one or two of my hon. Friends is that we have to devise schemes that will not have an adverse impact on genuine operations by smaller companies. It was precisely that sort of consideration which led us into such detailed consultation on the self-investment regulations and which would lead us again, however worthy a proposal might seem at first sight, to investigate the effects thoroughly.

We do not want to lay regulations only to find that we then have a string of amending regulations because, owing to the varying types of schemes, exceptions keep coming to the fore. Membership of those schemes now totals 20 million. It is a serious business. With all due respect to Opposition Members and to my hon. Friends, it is not something into which we can rush without full and proper consultation.

To improve understanding of the role and responsibilities of trustees, the Occupational Pensions Board, in its report to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State on protecting pensions, expressed the view that a brief statement of the principles of trusteeship should be prepared and that the disclosure requirements, which have not featured much in tonight's debate but which are important, should be extended to include information on whether each trustee has received a copy of the statement.

My right hon. Friend accepted the board's recommendation—again, action not inaction—invited it to prepare a booklet and undertook to extend the disclosure requirements as soon as it was published, to include information as to whether trustees had access to that booklet. My right hon. Friend will then be in a position to extend the disclosure requirements accordingly.

Trustees are governed not just by trust law in that respect but must comply with legislation enacted by——

In accordance with MR. SPEAKER'S Ruling—[Official Report, 31 January 1983; Vol. 36, c. 19*]—the debate was concluded.*

Homelessness

10.15 pm

Mr. Tom Cox (Tooting): The time is 10.15 pm, and all over the United Kingdom people are getting ready for bed—not all in the comfort of their own homes, and certainly not in two, three, or four-star hotels, but in shop doorways, on park benches, and in derelict buildings.

The homeless of the United Kingdom—our country—are men and women of all ages. This evening they are sleeping rough, as they do on many nights, on the streets of this country. That is the United Kingdom of December 1991—be it in the cities of London, Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, or Bristol. The list is endless.

Those are some of the principal cities of our country, but a survey undertaken in February shows that, even in small towns, people are sleeping rough tonight, as they were at the beginning of the year. The survey revealed that the number of people sleeping rough in Andover was 50; in Cambridge, 60; in Luton, 50, and in Blackburn, 25. Not half a mile from this building—the mother of Parliaments—hundreds of people are sleeping rough tonight.

Early-day motion 304, "Homeless people sleeping rough in severe weather outside London", was signed by more than 70 right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House. I have over a long period tabled questions on that issue. I did so in June 1990, February 1991, and November 1991. As long ago as December 1989, I put this written question to the then Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher):

"To ask the Prime Minister if she will visit the Crisis at Christmas centre in London during Christmas."

She replied:

"I have at present no plans to do so."—[Official Report, 19 December 1989; Vol.164, c.122.]

And she did not.

That is the background to the homelessness that stretches throughout the country, but there are other aspects. Official estimates suggest that some 40,000 homeless households in London are in temporary accommodation. Many of those families include young children. The figure for homeless households in the whole of the United Kingdom is estimated at 145,000.

We all know what such accommodation offers: a roof over one's head, but very little more. People must live in a single room with all their belongings. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House have visited such accommodation, and seen suitcases and plastic bags piled high on wardrobes or cupboards. There is nowhere for youngsters to play, and what facilities there are—bathroom, toilet and kitchen—are shared. Often, the accommodation is some distance from where the occupants have been living, and the move involves a major upheaval.

As I have said, there are 40,000 homeless households in London. In 1979, there were 2,750. Both figures reflect a pattern that is repeated throughout the country.

Why do such conditions exist in 1991? There can be no doubt that the position has worsened every year since the Government came to power in 1979. Since then, however, the country has gained enormous wealth through North sea oil and the sale of state assets. Where have those vast sums gone? How much of the money has been spent on trying to tackle the tragedy of homelessness, which many would describe as not only a tragedy but a national scandal?

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): The point about privatisation is important. We should bear in mind the fact that the assets resulting from the sale of council houses total more than £23 billion—more than the assets from all the other privatisations put together—while investment in housing has been cut from £11 billion to £6 billion. That is a measure of the extent to which resources have been wasted.

Mr. Cox: My hon. Friend has considerable experience of all aspects of housing, and, as always, he has made a telling point. I intend to develop it further, and, if he catches your eye, Mr. Speaker, my hon. Friend will no doubt do so as well.

New elements have entered the problem of homelessness. It has been estimated that, in the first half of this year, well over 36,000 properties were repossessed. We know the reasons for that: high interest rates and ever-increasing unemployment have caused the break-up of marriages and families, and have introduced tensions.

According to official figures, so far this year 162,000 people have incurred mortgage arrears of between six and 12 months, with over 59,000 being more than 12 months in arrears. There can be no doubt that the position is worsening month by month. I had a letter earlier this week from the all-party group on homelessness. It is dated 10 December, and gives notice of a meeting in the House next week on the subject of mortgage arrears and how to prevent homelessness arising from repossesions.

In The Observer last Sunday there was a major article about repossessions headed: "'Homes catastrophe brewing' as losses soar". The report gave harrowing details about what happens when people lose their homes, not because they are idle or could not care less but simply because they have lost their jobs and cannot get others, so they cannot keep up the payments that they were making before the loss of the man's job, or that of his wife.

Housing experts estimate that there will be between 80,000 and 90,000 repossessions this year. I have here a Public Accounts Committee report on homelessness which was published in May. As I expect hon. Members know, the PAC is chaired by my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashton-under-Lyne (Mr. Sheldon). On the extent and causes of homelessness, the report says:

"We are gravely concerned that homelessness has more than doubled over the last decade . . . and is continuing to rise at a higher rate than before. Our concern is underlined by the fact that the official statistics may well significantly understate the true scale of homelessness, since they are confined to those applying as homeless and accepted as having a priority need".

Under the heading "On Department of the Environment action", the report says:

"We note the improvements being made in the Department's arrangements for allocating resources to local authorities for general housing purposes"—

I am trying to make my comments as fair as possible—

"and we support the aim of targeting resources increasingly on authorities with the worst housing problems, including homelessness . . .

We regard it as unsatisfactory, however, that the Department have not set clear, quantified targets for the extra homes these substantial expenditure programmes are expected to provide and the impact on the numbers who are homeless . . .

We expect the Department to review their homelessness programmes accordingly, with a view to setting appropriate targets and timescales . . .

We are very concerned about the extensive use of bed and breakfast accommodation which is often very expensive and unsuitable for families".

I described earlier the kind of accommodation that people who become homeless are offered. The report continues:

"a cost of £15,000 per family a year is bad value for money."

I think that all of us would agree. As well as being bad value for money, such accommodation provides bad conditions for the families who, sadly, find themselves put there.

Let us consider the views of organisations that have enormous experience in all aspects of housing. Even Ministers would not sneer at Shelter's comments and, if they did, they would be unwise.

Mr. Sydney Chapman (Lords Commissioner to the Treasury): Who said that they sneered?

Mr. Cox: I merely made a comment, which I have a right to do.

Shelter, in a letter dated 14 November 1991, says:

"People sleeping rough in severe weather . . . Despite the enormous publicity of the plight of thousands of homeless people, the Government took no action outside Central London."

In May 1991, Shelter published a booklet called "Left Out —Sleeping Rough in Severe Weather". It followed a survey by Shelter in February 1991, when, as we are now, we went through a period of severe weather. Shelter made some damning indictments of the Government and their policy on helping homeless people. Shelter says:

"Outside central London (where the Government contributed to a basic—and highly publicised—relief operation) 7,000 'roofless' people were almost entirely dependent on the charity of volunteers. Government and most local authorities refused to accept any responsibility for these people's survival."

I will quote some of the authorities which had to pick up the pieces in February 1991—and which will no doubt have to do the same this December. Cambridge city council says:

"Local authorities were left in an ad hoc and pretty much accidental situation. It was pure luck that ad hoc arrangements actually worked. We would expect the Government to provide funding for what the voluntary sector do over and above normal arrangements. They cannot be expected to do it with no money."

The Shelter housing advice centre in Manchester says:

"Voluntary groups . . . can point to a need but don't have the resources to begin to fulfil it."

The Bishop of Chelmsford said on 18 February 1991:

"Voluntary agencies, including the Church are therefore doing all they can to alleviate the problem but it is vital that in the short term the Government acts quickly in collaboration with local authorities to meet the needs of the homeless in these critical circumstances and in the long term that the underlying causes of homelessness are addressed."

Those comments were made in February 1991. All the evidence shows clearly that, within hundreds of yards of Parliament—in Victoria, for example—people are sleeping in cardboard boxes tonight. Indeed, that is true of others throughout the country. As I have said, that is what happened in February 1991, and it is happening again this winter. More people are sleeping rough and becoming homeless. More pressure is being placed on organisations like Shelter, the Churches and local authorities.

I received a letter from the Association of London Authorities and the London Boroughs Association. They represent Labour and Conservative-controlled authorities in London. The letter was sent on 2 December and it states:

"It is an understatement to say that the growing problem of the backlog of homeless families in temporary accommodation is causing the homeless working party major concern. This is reinforced by recent research by the London Housing Unit on behalf of the homeless working party which shows that unless there are some significant changes in Government housing policy the gap between the supply of permanent homes and demand from homeless families will widen even further."

It was signed by the directors of the London boroughs of Haringey and Kensington and Chelsea. Those boroughs are under different political control, but they both make the same damning indictment of the Government's lack of action in respect of a problem that sadly has been with us for far too long.

When the Minister replies, it would be interesting if he would comment on a letter that I received today which questions the future of the resettlement agency. Do the Government propose to close next March four Government-run homeless units? Many people would like to know the answer to that. It would also be very interesting to hear from the Minister exactly what contact the agency has with those who work with the homeless.

What I have said about London as a London Member can, I am sure, be said by hon. Members irrespective of the part of the country they represent. As I have said, the problem gets worse every year. We must ask why it worsens year by year. I have referred to the reasonably new tragedy of repossession of property. That problem ranges across the board in respect of the professional backgrounds of the people who are losing their homes.

I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us about the Government's involvement with the banks and building societies to help people when they have difficulty repaying their mortgages. What discussions have the Government had with the banks and building societies about impressing on them the urgent need to keep families together and to keep people living in their homes instead of repossessing homes which causes people to become homeless?

Within the past month, I heard of the case of someone who had a mortgage with Nationwide Anglia. I took up the matter with the director of that building society. To his credit, he expressed deep concern at the way in which my constituent had been treated. The behaviour of many banks and building societies is an utter disgrace. They should hang their heads in shame at the pressure and harassment that they inflict on decent, honest, law-abiding citizens who sadly have lost their jobs and find themselves in the great dilemma of how to pay their mortgage.

Banks and building societies have much to answer for. It will be interesting to hear from the Minister just what meaningful discussions—not just, "You really should know better, gentlemen"—have taken place. I have mentioned the estimated number of repossessions that will take place not only during what is left of this year but well into next year.

Our great housing problem is that there is not enough affordable housing for people to buy, if possible, or to rent. There has been a massive decline in council house building. The Government have encouraged councils not to build properties.

Let me quote one or two figures to show the enormous decline that has occurred over recent years. In 1974, 120,000 council properties were being built. In 1979, 56,000 council properties were being built. In 1989, the figure went down to 14,000. In 1990 the figure went down further to 7,500. The figure for the first half of this year is 2,412. Since the Government have been in office, 56,000 properties have been built. I am being generous, as the Government would have inherited properties that were in the development pipeline. The figure this year will be even lower. About 130,000 council properties have been sold. Those properties have moved out of the affordable market.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tim Yeo): Perhaps I can help the hon. Gentleman, because I think that he is having difficulty in reading his script. In fact, 1·3 million houses, not 130,000, have been sold under the right to buy. The hon. Gentleman may have left a nought off the end.

More important for the purposes of the debate, the hon. Gentleman has completely overlooked the large and growing contribution made to affordable housing by the housing association movement, into which the Government are pouring huge, ever-increasing amounts of taxpayers' money, and delivering value for money and attractive accommodation with which tenants show themselves highly satisfied.

Mr. Cox: That sounds attractive, but it is not borne out by the facts or by what is said by the various people whom I quoted earlier, who work in all areas of housing and not only in connection with the homeless. They are not saying what the Minister is saying, so I shall not be swayed by him.

Mr. Soley: To put the record straight, the housing associations are only just getting back to the number of housing units that they were providing in the mid-1970s.

Mr. Cox: My hon. Friend makes the point more forcefully than me.

This Government have given people every encouragement to buy their own home. That may be commendable and may help those who can afford to buy. Some can, but many cannot. Who helps them? The Minister will say, "I've just told you who helps them," but why is there such an enormous need for housing in this country if what we are told is true and various organisations—not local authorities—are now providing housing?

Like many other hon. Members, I believe that now is the time for a massive house-building programme. We all know from the letters and documents that we receive that our construction industry is on its knees. Thousands of highly qualified building workers are on the dole—not only for a week or two when the weather is bad, but for month after month. What has happened to some of the big building consortiums? We have seen how their profits have slumped, but why is that happening when we all know that new properties should be built?

A valid criticism to make against the Government is that vacant land throughout the country is being sold—not for affordable housing, but for supermarkets and up-market property—[Interruption.] Perhaps the Minister will have his conversation with his hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) privately——

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): Oh, do let us get on with it.

Mr. Cox: The hon. Gentleman says, "Let's get on with it." Some of my comments are undoubtedly embarrassing for the hon. Gentleman, who is an outer-London Member of Parliament and must have problems similar to those that many other hon. Members are encountering, irrespective of constituency. Perhaps it is expecting a little much of the hon. Gentleman to ask him to consider the plight of people who are looking for somewhere to sleep or for somewhere they can be with their families this Christmas.

Given what the Minister has said, I ask him where people without large incomes can find affordable housing either to rent or to buy. What discussions are held with the local authorities and hospitals that have a lot of land? The London borough of Wandsworth, for which I am one of the Members of Parliament, contains classic examples. Tooting Bec hospital is now nearly closed and there is demand for a massive supermarket to be built on the site. There is demand for a golf course at Springfield hospital, which also has a great deal of land.

In inner London, as my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith will know, old Greater London council and Inner London education authority properties and lands are being sold off, not for local needs, but for the most money that can be obtained. One has to ask—this goes back to the point that the Minister made a moment ago—what is the Government's policy to encourage private house building along with local authority, housing association and Housing Corporation building?

When will the constraints on local authority capital spending to which my hon. Friend the Member for Hammersmith referred be relaxed? Many authorities have substantial capital receipts. When will they be allowed to spend them? It would be interesting to hear from the Minister when local authorities will be allowed to spend that money, the existence of which no one disputes.

If one sadly—[Interruption.] I am delighted that the Minister thinks that is so hilarious. I do not know whether the Ministers or other hon. Members were present for the previous debate. I know that you were, Mr. Speaker, but I realise that you are not in a position to comment. The Minister who replied to that debate made the most enormous play of the fact that there were no Labour Members on the Opposition Benches to debate that great issue and what a scandal it was.

But this is a scandal. Conservative Members are laughing their little heads off because they think that is so funny. I hope that when the debate, or possibly a debate in which they are involved, is over, they will take a walk to Victoria and tread over the people. I am aware of the comments made by the Minister for Housing and Planning a little while ago. They have not been forgotten. I will not be unkind and remind him. He knows what I am talking about.

Mr. Yeo: That is a disgraceful slur on my hon. Friend, who is known by people in all parts of the political spectrum as one of the most committed Members of Parliament, with a determination to see an improvement in the housing condition of the country. For the hon. Gentleman to drag that comment in, even by the appalling standards that he has set in the past 37 minutes, is nothing short of disgraceful. I hope that he will withdraw that slur.

Mr. Cox: I did not make the slur. The Minister for Housing and Planning knows the comments that were attributed to him. The Minister should understand a little about the procedures of the House. I did not cast any slur on the Minister. I referred to a comment that had massive coverage. I suggest that the Minister should not pursue it.

Whatever may have happened in this debate, outside the House throughout Britain many people have nowhere to live and are sleeping rough. They have done so for many years. It will be interesting in the time that is left—there is still quite a bit of time left—to hear from the Government exactly what they propose to do. I have quoted the criticisms of the Government made repeatedly by reputable organisations. If they are untrue, let the Government say that they are untrue. Let them challenge the quotes that I have given. I named where they came from. Let them dispute them in the debate tonight.

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): I shall find it difficult to comment on many of the points made by the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox), for although I tried to concentrate on the thrust of his speech, it took quite an effort. I was impressed with one aspect of it, however, and that was his ability to err in his facts by a factor of 10.

Having misrepresented the number of council houses sold in Britain by over a million, when he was corrected about that, the hon. Gentleman continued with a glissando that was breathtaking and completed his remarks without any recognition of the fact that he might have been pursuing Aneurin Bevan's adage that one should never let a good speech be confused by the facts, and following it rather more literally than might have been advisable.

The hon. Gentleman has only one good point in his favour. That is that he has raised a serious subject of interest to hon. Members in all parts of the House. There is a different dimension to the whole question of housing and the homeless. As we have seen in the past decade, there are a number of issues on which it is appropriate to pay a fulsome tribute to the Minister, his hon. Friends and their predecessors. Less remembered than it should be is the fact that, under Conservative rule, we have attempted to free into the housing market hundreds of thousands of units of accommodation in the private rented sector. Due to no doubt well-meaning but, in the event, totally misguided rent legislation, that accommodation was prevented from being available for tenants to occupy.

Every hon. Member has had experience of elderly owners with available accommodation to let who would have been satisfied with a modest return but who were prevented from letting by the law as it stood and the experience of their peers who had been involved in letting with disastrous consequences. It was extraordinary to hear the hon. Member for Tooting present a picture of housing and homelessness in Britain without recognising the huge impact of the release of property into the private rented sector.

The irony of the work done in that sphere is the possibility that still deters many from embarking on letting property—the vestigial possibility of a change of Government. The prospect of a return to the bad old days under Labour denies the availability of hundreds of thousands of units of accommodation to people who desperately need it from people who are more than happy to provide it.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman is digging himself into an ever deeper hole. He criticised my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) for not being concerned with facts, when my hon. Friend made more of a conventional slip than the sort of fundamental error that the hon. Gentleman just made. When the Conservatives came to power, 14 per cent. of the rented market was in the private sector. The decline continued and has accelerated, to the point where it is now only 7 per cent. There has never been any such suggestion from the Opposition. Indeed, the position has been made clear by me and my hon. Friends—there will be no retrospective legislation, and everybody knows it.

Mr. Norris: The hon. Gentleman is tacitly accepting that our reforms in the rented sector have been in the right direction, and I am grateful for his pledge that retrospection will not be in the mind of a future Labour Government. I am pleased that he accepts that our reforms are appreciated, not just in the inner cities, where they are of particular advantage, but in urban and suburban areas.

Mr. Soley: The hon. Gentleman does not appreciate that the legislation of 1980 reduced rent controls dramatically. Indeed, in Northern Ireland they were abolished in 1956. But in all cases the decline in the rented sector accelerated. The hon. Gentleman will take the figures from the Duke of Edinburgh's report, if he will not take them from me.

Mr. Norris: The hon. Gentleman misses my point, which is two-edged. There is the potential impact of the private rented sector and the extent to which Labour attitudes—as evidenced by their actions when in government and their statements during the last decade—have been a huge disincentive to the release on to the market of many affordable units of accommodation which could be derived from existing single units and which are currently denied to people who have no accommodation.

At the risk of bogging the hon. Gentleman down in argument when I am sure that he will make his own speech, which I look forward to hearing, I suggest that the other great area in which the Government deserve congratulation is the introduction into the housing market of infinitely more creative financing than has been available hitherto.

Again, the hon. Member for Tooting, who has just given us the benefit of his views on housing for 40 minutes, seemed to neglect the marvellous impact that the housing association movement has had on housing in Great Britain. Housing associations have been able to offer shared equity schemes, link equities, rent mortgage schemes, and so on, which have all been of tremendous benefit to tenants in all parts of the country, many of whom are keen to convert tenancies into ownership and who, without the creative financing available through the housing association movement, would never be able to do so.

In addition, the more creative financing which is now available has led to the most desirable schemes for those with special needs—those with handicaps, single parents who would otherwise find it difficult to obtain accommodation, and so on. We all have examples in our constituencies. There has been a very heartening development of this sector and the housing associations and housing corporations continue to make a very significant contribution to meeting the needs in this area.

One thing that is underrated is the extent to which, over the last decade, there has been an attempt to involve tenants a great deal more in the management of their own property. That, again, is something that I very much welcome. The Government inherited the most appalling nannyish tendency to assume that tenants were the last people who should ever be consulted on the way in which their properties were managed.

I look forward to the next Parliament, when I hope that my hon. Friends may both have moved on to higher and even more rewarding pastures. Perhaps the Whip on duty, my hon. Friend the Member for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) will be with us; some good things in life are ever with us and we look forward to his continued presence on the Treasury Bench. I hope that those who will take on our housing policies into the 1990s will continue the very welcome trend of putting more power into the hands of tenants—not just local authority tenants, but housing association tenants and private tenants as well, all of whom deserve to have this extra power in their hands.

This debate is not simply about the benefits that we have derived from housing policy over the last decade. It is also to some extent about the specific issue of homelessness, which the hon. Member for Tooting mentioned. I echo the words of my hon. Friend the Minister in placing on record what I believe to be the incontrovertible record in this field of my hon. Friend the Member for Ealing, Acton (Sir G. Young), the Minister for Housing and Planning.

No one who has taken the slightest interest in the problems of the homeless in London could ignore the beneficial impact of my hon. Friend on this problem, and it is extraordinarily churlish to suggest that he has had anything other than the greatest commitment to this unfortunate group of people, which he has discharged with immense distinction. I place on record the warmest congratulations of Conservative Members and, I suspect, of the vast majority of Opposition Members on the work that he has done.

It is still, however, an immensely disturbing proposition to me and, I am sure, to the hon. Member for Tooting, to his hon. Friends and to mine, that there should be, as he says, as we drive along the Strand or in Victoria, anyone forced to use a shop or office doorway as accommodation on a bitter winter night such as this. That is not something that any sane Member would deny exists, and the hon. Gentleman is perfectly right to point out that it does. The remedy, however, is perhaps more complex than that suggested by the hon. Member for Tooting. It has always seemed to derive from two phenomena, both of which call for attention and of neither of which I fully understand the ramifications.

The first is the extent to which London is still regarded as a magnet by many young people who do not have stable home conditions in their towns and villages, or even in the outer suburbs of their cities. They look to London for excitement, employment opportunity, money or whatever, and so often are sadly, tragically, disappointed and misled when they arrive. There has been a welcome increase in the services available to them. Those services are offered by all the agencies concerned, from the police through the voluntary sector, the social services, and so on.

There is no merit whatever in allowing people to stay in doorways in those circumstances, simply because it may seem a more convenient solution; quick intervention is needed. I say that against the background of the knowledge that my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning made available extra hostel accommodation, and that in many cases the problem in central London is not technically the availability of beds, but rather a question whether the various agencies have chosen to intervene, and on what basis.

My simple observation is that it is in everyone's interest to intervene sooner rather than later. It would be better if the young people could be caught on the first day away without a stable roof over their heads, and returned to their homes. I appreciate that it is not always possible to return them, so if they could be counselled about how to find their feet independently, that would be in everyone's interest.

I do not want to enunciate a philosophy that people who live in doorways are making the place look untidy and should be removed for the sake of it. Most of us would have more charity in our hearts, particularly when the weather is so cold, but we have to recognise that if a young person is allowed to develop the habit of seeking refuge in that way, it is a desperately difficult habit to break. Early intervention, despite the fact that it might be thought by some to be heavy-handed, is therefore important.

The second obvious source of homelessness in London is even more tragic, because its origins are in schizophrenia and other mental illness. Such people find it hard to accept the confines of institutional housing, and are very difficult individuals with whom to deal. My heart goes out to all who have to deal with them. I pay tribute to their work and to the commitment of volunteers, as well as people in the national health service and social services, to those who are mentally disordered and whose behaviour patterns occasionally cause the most disturbing incidents. We have to deal with those people at a slower pace than in the past.

None of what I say is new to my hon. Friend. I merely state it because it is the most important element in the debate about homelessness. Surely we are now in a position to deal with the consequences of our enthusiasm to decant people from the large, long-stay institutions, as part of our genuine commitment to a community care policy which had all-party approval when it was introduced.

It is as clear now to the Secretary of State as to the whole House that there was clinical over-enthusiasm to decant from long-stay institutions people for whom there was not adequate personal planning. It left such people with a tenuous link to social services and to those who had a medical input into their conditions. I urge those with competence in such matters to think again about the extent of decanting, although it may not be a matter for my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning.

I appreciate the desire to achieve a large capital receipt from the closure of a long-stay institution. Incidentally, having been involved, together with the health authority, in Borocourt, an institution for the mentally handicapped just outside Reading—I suspect that my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning and my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary of State know that institution—I shall never regard it as desirable to keep such places a day longer than is necessary, but there may be a day on which it is necessary. However wrong it may have been for a person to be incarcerated in such an institution 30 years ago, it may be better for a person to be retained there, with care, warmth and at least some sort of regime of supervision, before he or she embarks on a life outside where there will need to be adequate support services.

I say in all good humour that we have often listened to the hon. Member for Tooting with interest and he makes a conscientious point. However, it is not sensible to describe the entire private sector market as littered with repossessions and tragedies. It is extraordinarily sad that some young people bought their houses at the top of a market which has declined and that they are now experiencing difficulty. I welcome the fact that the Government have considered creative ways of avoiding repossessions wherever possible. Nevertheless, 99 per cent. of mortgages are still being paid and kept current. The hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) may have queried my statistic, but I assure him that it is accurate.

In the context of the worst recession in many years—that is not even a matter for debate—and substantial reductions in house prices, that statistic is a tribute to the flexibility of the system and to the way in which many building societies have already recognised that their long-term interests lie in trying, wherever possible, in helping home owners to stay in possession of their dwellings, even if it means a slight elongation of the repayment period.

I commend the efforts of my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that an increasing number of people who find it difficult to pay their mortgages are allowed a scheme of, for example, temporary rental or contributions from their local authority. It is desperately sad and pointless to make a family homeless because they cannot afford to keep up payments on their house, especially when they can pay something, in order then to have to find far less satisfactory homeless accommodation for them at public cost. If families can be kept in their own homes, so much the better.

I am grateful for the opportunity to participate in this debate. It has given me a chance to correct an understandable bias in the remarks of the hon. Member for Tooting and to suggest that, even now, when the housing market generally has never been more difficult, my hon. Friend the Minister and his Department have much to be proud of.

11.13 pm

Mrs. Lila Golding (Newcastle-under-Lyme): I wish to congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) on choosing this subject for debate tonight, when the cold weather is with us again and the misery of the homeless increases.

About three weeks ago, I was told by a voluntary worker for the homeless how she had found a 15-year-old girl, five months pregnant, sleeping on the concrete steps of a doorway in Charing Cross. She did not even have a blanket, she had no money for food, and no idea of where to go for help. She had been sleeping on the same step for three nights.

Despite all the publicity that the homeless receive and the many organisations set up to help them, there are still desperate people who do not know how to get help. There are many people who suffer due to lack of affordable housing to rent and inability to cope with mortgage repayments.

However, as the bitter winter weather approaches, I should like to concentrate my speech on the basic problem of enabling people to find shelter so that hon. Members do not again have to face the awful reality of stepping around people huddled under snow-covered tarpaulins, lying in shop doorways in the streets of our city. The Minister announced the setting up of a helpline for the homeless. What use is that if people have no money to telephone? If they are fortunate to have enough money, where are they to find out that that helpline exists and obtain the numbers?

Mr. Yeo: It is important for the House to know that the telephone line is free to the users.

Mr. Golding: I repeat: where do people find out that the helpline exists and obtain the number?

I understand that the Minister is talking to London Transport about advertising the campaign, but it needs much more than that. The Government have spent hundreds of thousands of pounds on imaginative advertising for selling off the country's nationalised industries. I am sure that they did not consider just talking to London Transport about that. Many of our people have become homeless as the result of the Government's policies. Is it too much to ask the Government to spend some of the money raised by privatisation on giving much more help to homeless people throughout the country, not just in London?

The homeless are suffering just as much in my constituency of Newcastle-under-Lyme and other districts throughout the country, as in London. Why cannot money be spent on advertising the help available in places where the homeless gather? Could there not be in every tube station, railway station and bus station, and on bus shelters—especially in rural regions—specially prepared posters with information to tell people where day and night shelters exist for the homeless?

I know that the organisations that help the homeless would be more than willing to co-operate with the Minister to help to identify the many places throughout the country where posters would be of greatest benefit to the homeless. I know that the Government have not found it in their hearts to extend the cold-weather provision for shelters for the homeless outside London and the many districts of need throughout the country. That is no reason not to provide an advertising campaign to cover the whole of the country.

Will the Minister put himself in the place of that 15-year-old girl, too frightened to ask anyone for help, alone, desperate and penniless? Will he please help her and others like her to come in out of the cold?

Mr. Clive Soley (Hammersmith): I congratulate my hon. Friends the Members for Tooting (Mr. Cox) and for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) on their speeches. I think that my hon. Friend the Member for Tooting displayed the facts well, and it was perverse of Conservative Members to pick him up for a slip of the tongue when he gave an incorrect figure, which it is relatively easy to do. The hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris), although well intentioned, made many mistakes. If he had read the Duke of Edinburgh's report or the reports of the Conservative-controlled London Boroughs Association and Association of District Councils he would know that some of his arguments were invalid—I put it no stronger than that. I believe that he cares, and I beg him to read those reports and read his speech.

My charge against the Government and most of the Conservative Back Bench Members is that the majority of them do not care, and those who do—I include the Minister for Housing and Planning—are too wedded to, too unable to break away from, the principles of the Government who during the past 12 years, have created the crisis. Consequently, they are still driving the figures up. They are not my arguments—they are based on the Government's own figures. The Government yesterday released figures showing a 30 per cent. increase in the number of homeless.

The Minister for Housing and Planning (Sir George Young): No.

Mr. Soley: Yes they did, or they appeared in that light in the newspapers. Perhaps the Minister should issue a correction.

Sir George Young: As the hon. Gentleman has accused my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) of making a mistake, he should not make one himself. The figure of 30 per cent. was not an increase in the number of homelessness acceptances. It was the increase in the number of those in temporary accommodation. Even in London, the numbers in bed and breakfast fell. The figures published yesterday did not show a 30 per cent. increase in the number of the homeless.

Mr. Soley: I am happy to refine that, and say that the figures revealed a 30 per cent. increase in the number of those in temporary accommodation, but is the Minister suggesting that they are not homeless? If not, is he saying that there has been a decline in other forms of homelessness? He knows that, in his borough of Ealing, the figures for acceptances have dropped by 25 per cent. because the council has taken a very hard line on the interpretation of legislation and is turning people away. Even more important, the number of those on the street is going up.

The money that the Minister has provided has been recycled more times than I can count—although he talks about it as if it were new money—and it will run out in April, but there is still no commitment to replace it.

The figure of 30 per cent. to which I referred was an overestimate compared to the figure that I suggested, which was based on the same information. I rang a sample of local authorities, but, because I prefer not to err on the side of scaremongering, I gave a figure of 20 to 25 per cent. In fact, the Government's figures were 5 per cent. higher than mine, and they got those figures from a much wider survey based on all council returns.

The figures alone are not enough. The hon. Member for Epping Forest must take on board the fact that the case to which my hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle-under-Lyne referred—that of the 15-year-old girl—is all too common. I have said hundreds of times—in the House and outside—that, in 1979, that girl would not have been homeless. The big turnaround came in the mid-1980s. Never since the first world war have we had homeless teenage children begging in the streets.

Mr. Norris rose——

Mr. Soley: Before the hon. Gentleman gets up, let me say that I worked as a probation officer in the King's Cross area, which was one of the most difficult areas for homelessness in the 1970s. Homeless people got off trains at Euston, King's Cross and Paddington and came to that area. At that time, I could have got that girl a bed straight away in a decent place—I am not talking about a mattress on a floor. She would have been eligible for and would have got local authority accommodation.

That has changed precisely because of the figure of which the Government were boasting—the 1·3 million sales of council houses which were not replaced. The right to buy with a duty to replace is a good housing policy, but the right to buy without a duty to replace is a housing disaster. We have lost 2 million homes from the rented sector. [Interruption.] Ministers should argue the figures with the Duke of Edinburgh—I am quoting figures from the Rowntree report.

Mr. Yeo: They cannot bear it.

Mr. Soley: The Minister says that they cannot bear it, but perhaps the Duke of Edinburgh has more feeling. I was using a figure of 1·5 million homes, but his figure is 1·9 million, half of which have gone from the council sector and the other half from the Government's much-loved private rented sector. The hon. Member for Epping Forest should take enough interest to consider the arguments about the decline in the private rented sector, which started before the Rent Acts were invented.

When the Rent Acts were abolished in Northern Ireland in 1957, 25 per cent. of the rented market was private. No party even hinted at reintroducing the Acts, and that sector is now 5 per cent. of the market. There has been a slight increase recently due to the depression in house prices and, to a limited extent, to the 1988 legislation.

When house prices begin to rise again, all the assured shorthold tenancies in properties whose prices have risen will suddenly look unattractive. People who sell will want to sell with vacant possession, and that means asking people to leave. The hon. Member for Epping Forest does not understand that. The argument is about housing finance. As long as we go on subsidising house purchase to make buying and selling so enormously profitable, and to make renting unprofitable for landlords and for tenants, so long will the rented sector continue to decline.

Mr. Norris: There is an argument about whether 2 million homes have disappeared or are still there, occupied, thus contributing to the housing stock. But when the hon. Gentleman referred to the constituent of the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding), he was, I agree, referring to a new phenomenon of which he has personal experience. That problem is not a function only of Government or their housing policy—it is much more deep-seated and complex than that. It is a function of family breakdown, which takes place over generations and whose consequences the Government will have to tackle. We are only beginning to come to terms with it.

Mr. Soley: Conservative Members desperately want to believe that family breakdown is the cause, but the increase in family breakdowns is much smaller than the dramatic increase in homelessness. By removing 2 million homes from the rented sector at a time when families are becoming smaller, the Government have left young people with nowhere to go. Local authorities that could have taken them before cannot now do so.

As a Social Security Minister, the Prime Minister devastatingly took away from young people the right to income support. That was removed from 16 to 18-year-olds who were not on a Government course or in full-time education. They are the people begging in our streets. Almost overnight, they arrived in our streets. That is a function of Government, not of family breakdown. Families were breaking down when I was a probation officer in King's Cross, but then I could get these kids rent money for private accommodation up front. I would not be able to do that now. They are turned away from River Point and Centre Point—by 7 pm or 8 pm, they are closed or full up.

There are beds in warehouses, but many young people will not use them because they do not want to sleep next to someone who is mentally ill or loused up or alcoholic. It is no good the hon. Member for Epping Forest showing concern if he does not understand this, because it will be empty concern. When he expressed anxiety about people who cannot pay their mortgages, he sounded like the Walrus and the Carpenter—weeping tears as he ate the oysters.

There is an answer to the mortgage problem. The Government should never have used high interest rates alone. For a long time, I have been advocating a mortgage rescue scheme that would allow people to stay on in their properties on a short let tenancy. One in eight mortgage payers are in arrears because the Government have launched a drive towards home ownership so powerful that mobility of labour has suffered. They are screwing up the whole economy, not just housing.

I have often spelt out the long-term answer. We need to invest in housing, to set up a national housing bank, to use all sectors. When we go out into the freezing temperatures tonight, we know that we should be doing something. Capital receipts are important, but they are not enough. Local authorities must be allowed to buy selectively in the private sector. We must relax or remove some of the rules on private sector leasing.

We must change the income support rules for 16 to 18-year-olds and under-25-year-olds. The Government must discontinue their stupid propaganda about empty properties and do something about them. I shall say it again: local authority stock is 2·5 per cent. void; 3 per cent. of housing association stock is empty; 5 or 6 per cent. is empty in the private sector—and 16 per cent. of Government properties are empty.

Today in Swindon, I saw 24 houses in a main street —they were attractive properties—all of which had been empty for 20 years. I correct that. Some of them have been empty for the 20 years since they were built, others have been empty for just a few years. There are 35,000 empty houses, not just those in Swindon. One in five police houses in London are still empty. The Wormwood Scrubs prison houses are still empty after 10 or 12 years—I have lost count.

I challenged the Minister to pick up the telephone and ask the Secretary of State for Defence to say that those houses in Naylor road, Swindon, must now be transferred to the ownership or management of a housing association or the local authority. Families who would otherwise spend Christmas in bed-and-breakfast accommodation would then have a house to live in. That is what I call housing the homeless.

11.30 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary for the Environment (Mr. Tim Yeo): If the hon. Member for Hammersmith (Mr. Soley) and his Labour colleagues around the country, who control far more houses than the Government, showed even a tiny percentage of the indignation that he is now attempting to express about empty houses in Swindon in relation to the 5,000 empty houses in Labour-controlled Liverpool, the 2,800 in Labour-controlled Salford, the 2,000 in Labour-controlled Newham, the 5,500 in Labour-controlled Manchester, the 2,000 in Labour-controlled Newcastle, the 1,000 in Labour-controlled Knowsley, and so on——

[Mr. Tim Yeo]

Mrs. Llin Golding: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Yeo: No. Conservative Members have had only a fraction of the time in this debate.

If the hon. Gentleman had showed even a tiny amount of the indignation that he expresses about empty houses in Swindon in relation to all those in areas under Labour control, there would be scarcely any problems of homelessness in Britain.

I regret to say that this has been a breathtakingly disappointing debate, even by the standards of those initiated by Labour Members, redeemed only by an excellent constructive contribution by my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris), who made an outstanding speech.

The debate began with a 40-minute speech from the hon. Member for Tooting (Mr. Cox) which was nothing but a litany of unsupported assertions. In a spirit of friendship across the Floor of the House, I have to say that if the hon. Gentleman really thinks that he advances the cause of housing by denigrating my hon. Friend the Minister for Housing and Planning, he displays an ignorance that is staggering even by Labour party standards. I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Hammersmith in effect repudiate his disgraceful slurs against my hon. Friend.

Mr. Cox: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker, For the record, I make it clear that I cast no smear or slur on the Minister for Housing and Planning. I simply commented on what has been widely publicised. If the Minister is saying that hon. Members are not allowed to do that without running the risk of being accused of slurs, he is abusing parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Yeo: When it comes to abusing parliamentary procedure, I fail to see what point of order the hon. Gentleman was seeking to make. But I am glad that I provoked him into an unqualified withdrawal of his disgraceful unjustified comments. They will have done him no good in the housing movement, which recognises that my hon. Friend stands for a real commitment, typical of this Government, to the needs of homeless people.

I am sorry to say that the hon. Gentleman did not just stoop to the gutter in terms of smearing my hon. Friend: he used a series of inaccurate figures. To my surprise, many of them were echoed by the hon. Member for Hammersmith.

We have had several exchanges in the House in the past year or so on the number of people sleeping rough. I remember arguments at the beginning of 1991 about the precise number. But we knew, because we were closely in touch with the voluntary organisations which are in the front line, of the efforts that we were making to tackle the problem of rough sleepers. I pay the warmest possible tribute to those organisations, which have made a magnificent contribution. At the beginning of this year, they estimated that the number of rough sleepers was in the order of 1,000. That was borne out by the census that was taken in April, in rather warmer weather.

I am glad, but not surprised, that, after another 10 or 11 months of Government efforts to provide suitable hostels and move-on accommodation for rough sleepers, the voluntary organisations now estimate that the number sleeping rough as of this month is down to about 430.

The hon. Member for Tooting was as wrong about the number of homeless as he was about the number of rough sleepers. He said that there are 40,000 homeless in London. If he had troubled to study figures published a couple of days ago, he would know that was wrong. More importantly, the hon. Gentleman tried to imply that a substantial proportion of homeless are in bed-and-breakfast accommodation, whereas the number is only 7,900—which in London represents a decrease of 5 per cent. over the previous quarter. The number in bed-and-breakfast accommodation in London is falling. That is a result of the Government's £300 million special homeless initiative in London and the south-east last year and this year.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith, who usually knows better, tried to suggest that there had been a 30 per cent. increase in the number of homeless. Again, the statistics published this week—not by the Department of the Environment, but based on figures provided by local authorities throughout the country—show that the figure is not 30 per cent. but 2 per cent. The hon. Member for Hammersmith can flick through his papers, but I have those statistics before me, and they present a very different picture.

Of course the Government are not satisfied with that, but at least it is clear that our efforts are having an impact and are bringing to an end the unsatisfactory increase in the number of homeless in bed-and-breakfast accommodation—which is falling in London, and is virtually stable across the rest of the country. The Government are keen to have a constructive debate on housing policy when they can, but it is a pity when it cannot be based on proper acknowledgement of the facts.

Reference was made to the need for affordable housing. I was deeply disappointed that neither the hon. Member for Tooting, in a 40-minute speech, nor the hon. Member for Hammersmith, except in an intervention, found it possible to acknowledge the contribution made by housing associations. That is, by any standards, a profound insult to the housing association movement, which is supported by people of all political persuasions.

Next year, such associations will house more than 20,000 homeless families, but the hon. Member for Tooting chose totally to ignore that in his lengthy speech. He ignored also the growing contribution made by the private sector, to which my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest rightly drew attention. I was glad that, his skilful speech, he teased out of the Opposition an admission that the Government's policies on the private rented sector are right.

The hon. Member for Hammersmith was at pains to point out, in an intervention in my hon. Friend's speech, how much he supports the Government's policy. Of course I welcome that, but it is a belated conversion. If a similar statement of support for the Government's deregulation of the private sector had been made in 1979, there would have been no decline—but there was, because that sector continued to feel under threat from the Opposition.

Even today, private landlords within a mile of this building would say that they are nervous of letting their properties to homeless families because, and only because, of the whiff—albeit faint—of the risk of a Labour Government. If, in 1979, the then Labour Minister responsible for housing had given the assurance offered this evening by the hon. Member for Hammersmith, the decline in private rented accommodation might have been arrested.

As a result of the Housing Act 1988 and the introduction of shorthold tenancies, we are witnessing rapid growth in the number of shorthold and assured tenancies being let by private landlords—so much so, that at last they are taking up the slack created by the number of secure tenancies. That is welcome news, and I look forward to further endorsements from the Opposition.

The Opposition bitterly opposed the right to buy council houses when it was first introduced; now they are in favour of it—or, perhaps, not quite in favour, for they become very cross when I point out what a huge success it has been. The hon. Member for Tooting was not reading his brief properly; not 130,000 but 1·3 million houses and flats have been sold under the arrangement. The Opposition do not like to draw attention to that, but the Government are very proud of having created so many new owner-occupiers.

Opposition Members are also changing their minds about housing action trusts. In a Committee debate, they have completely reversed their previous position. No doubt, in due course they will completely reverse their position on the private rented sector, large-scale voluntary transfers and a raft of other Government initiatives. The only speech that mentioned the enormous opportunities that we now offer tenants for participation in management systems was that of my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest. He was the only speaker who thought it worthy of mention.

The Government have doubled the resources available to housing associations, from just over £1 billion last year to more than £2 billion in 1993-94. That amount is topped up by a substantial contribution from the private sector in the form of loans. Under today's construction industry conditions, those resources will buy a much-increased level of output.

In an intervention, the hon. Member for Hammersmith tried to suggest that housing association output had not increased greatly since the 1970s. He will be surprised—I fear that he may even be disappointed—by the figures that we shall announce next week, which specify the output that we expect from housing associations in 1992-93. They are able to combine increased contributions from the taxpayer with an element of private sector funding to take advantage of the exceptionally keen prices now being quoted by the construction industry for new output.

We have two private sector initiatives. We are now operating pilot schemes in five different places, allowing owners of empty property which we wish to be returned to productive use to let that property to homeless families, using a housing association as an intermediary or managing agent. That will give the landlord a degree of confidence about his ability to regain his property when he wants it; it will also give the homeless family a degree of confidence about the quality of their landlord.

We are optimistic about the prospects of the scheme, and I hope that, in due course, the hon. Member for Hammersmith will be able to bring himself to give it an unqualified endorsement. It is difficult to see how even the Labour party, with all its promises to the trade unions and others, can find any possible ground for objection to such a scheme.

Our other private sector initiative involves flats over shops. We believe that there are nearly 100,000 empty flats over shops, and we have therefore embarked on a three-year campaign to try to change attitudes in the commercial sector. We have made £25 million available to local authorities for schemes involving housing associations and private owners; we believe that they have considerable potential in regard to dealing with homelessness.

Even Roof magazine—not a magazine normally associated with the Tory party—has acknowledged that the Government's £96 million three-year initiative to deal with rough sleeping is the most determined and comprehensive programme ever introduced to tackle the problem. It is making substantial progress in reducing the number of people sleeping rough in London, and we are optimistic about its continued progress. More places are being made available all the time: last night, a 25-bed hostel was opened in the constituency of the hon. Member for Tooting, to be run by the English Churches Housing Group.

Mrs. Golding: Places are closing.

Mr. Yeo: In view of the continuing cold weather, we have asked Single Homeless in London to see whether other emergency hostels can be opened at short notice. Moreover, despite what the hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mrs. Golding) has said from a sedentary position, there is no question of places closing.

Since the rough sleepers initiative began, 900 places have been made available in houses and flats, 400 of which are permanent, and 700 more places have been made available in hostels and shelters. There is an important distinction between the shelter to which the hon. Member for Tooting referred and the rather higher quality provision in hostels and in permanent accommodation. Almost 200 places, in addition to those in shelters which I have mentioned, have opened this month, and we expect a further 120 places in winter shelters to open very shortly. All that is on top of the emergency accommodation to which I have just referred and about which we are talking to Single Homeless in London.

The hon. Member for Tooting spoke about mortgage repossessions. As my hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest pointed out, 39 mortgage payers out of 40 are not in arrears with their mortgages, and that is after a period of unprecedented expansion of owner-occupation. There have been 7 million first-time buyers since 1979. Even after a period when interest rates were higher than we would have liked, 39 mortgage payers are still up to date. That is the measure of the success story of the Government's expansion of owner-occupation.

[Mr. Yeo]

There are other success stories. We have a range of initiatives which are designed to promote owner-occupation and to widen choice for tenants. All we have from the Opposition is unsupported assertions, uncosted commitments and empty rhetoric. Their policy is confined to giving more money to local authorities—the one group who have proved unable to discharge an adequate housing policy.

Territorial Army

11.45 pm

Mr. Nell Thorne (Ilford, South): We shall now debate the reserve forces and especially the future of the Territorial Army. We have every reason to be proud of the service of the Territorial Army over the years, because we can trace the history of volunteer and reserve commitment back to the Norman conquest. We have a special position in that the oldest regiment in the British Army is the Honourable Artillery Company, which traces its history back to 1537, whereas the oldest regular units go back only to the middle of the 17th century. For that reason, the Territorial Army does not consider itself in any way a second-class alternative.

In the middle ages, all men over the age of 18 were required on Sunday, after attending church, to participate in archery practice; it was from those roots that the Territorial Army grew. The 19th century was an especially important period, for it was then that many of today's Territorial Army units were formed.

I commanded an officers training corps. Those corps came into existence in the early 20th century, when it was discovered that attendance at university did not necessarily mean an ability to lead troops. That was discovered especially during the South African war, when a number of university graduates were commissioned and sent out to South Africa, and it was found that they singularly lacked an ability to act in an officer capacity. It was decided that training was necessary, so the officer training corps were introduced at several universities. I am delighted that they have done so well that it is now proposed, even in these difficult times, to increase their establishment.

At the start of the second world war, there was an enormous expansion in the Territorial Army, as there was in the first world war. It was the custom then to double the size of most infantry battalions and of many gunner and other units. That was done quite simply by creating a new unit alongside the original. The commanding officer, the adjutant and the regimental sergeant major were required to form a parallel unit, while the second in command, the regimental quartermaster sergeant and the assistant adjutant took command of the original unit. In that way we were able to double our Territorial Army forces very quickly.

In two or three months in 1939, territorial units were brought close to the standard of regular infantry battalions and gunner regiments. That was an extraordinarily fine achievement in such a short space of time. It was achieved only because the senior ranks were there and able to provide the infrastructure and necessary training.

Things are more technical today. Equipment is more sophisticated, and more experience is required. However, many jobs require similar skills, and in respect of engineering and signals, the forces can take advantage of the skills that people acquire in their civilian jobs. The same is true in medicine: the TA played a spendid role in the Gulf, where a complete field hospital was made available from Glasgow. That provided support for the regulars in a vital role.

I believe that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence is aware of the situation. He promised in the Chamber that he did not want any volunteers to be turned away from offering their service, and I am sure that he will do his best to keep that promise. He has given me and many of my colleagues the firm impression that he has listened to our recommendations and suggestions, and that he will continue to do that in the years to come. This exercise cannot be completed overnight; it will take many years to accomplish. We must ensure that we get it right and that the alterations that are required take advantage of all the volunteers on offer.

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to say that the Government have given an undertaking not to turn away volunteers, but 102 Royal Artillery in Northern Ireland is at a strength of 103 per cent. I understand that it is to be merged with 105 Royal Artillery Scotland. How on earth is 103 Royal Artillery to be reduced from 103 per cent. to 50 per cent. to comprise one artillery regiment?

Mr. Thorne: As the hon. Gentleman knows, Northern Ireland is a special case. There are already a large number of troops in the Ulster Defence Regiment. I believe that a substantial proportion of the population of Northern Ireland already serve in a reserve capacity with the UDR. The TA there is well recruited, but there are other opportunities for people to serve in Northern Ireland, and I hope that they will use elsewhere the skills that they have acquired in the TA. We need their help.

Over recent years, the TA's establishment has been 91,000. However, the paper strength is only 74,000, of which a smaller number train regularly. The latter figure is thought to be between 63,000 and 65,000. It was originally suggested that the establishment might be reduced to as low as 50,000 to 55,000. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has ensured that that is not the case, and that we will have an establishment of 63,500, because that figure is more in line with the actual number of people available, willing and able to serve.

We must acknowledge that honorary colonels of regiments play an important part. In the middle ages, it was discovered that many regiments were not getting their fair share. When they were asked to turn out and fight on behalf of king or queen and country, some regiments performed much better than others. When an inquiry was carried out, it was discovered that the regiments that had the most influence, either through royal or noble connections, were doing much better in respect of ammunition and supplies than some others. Therefore, a system was introduced which enabled regiments to appoint honorary colonels of their own choosing so that they could speak on their behalf and as a last resort have a direct right to apply to the sovereign in order to make representations on behalf of their unit. The honorary colonel system therefore has an important role to play in the British Army.

It is important that, whenever there is a reorganisation, honorary colonels should be fully and properly consulted. I fear that this has not necessarily taken place in every case. Therefore, I ask my right hon. Friend the Minister to examine the matter, in particular in relation to 151 Royal Corps of Transport Regiment. I am not certain that the honorary colonel of the regiment was given the notice that he could expect. He was apparently told in June that there was nothing to report, and in September, he was told that the proposals were a fait accompli. Clearly, that could not be construed as proper consultation. Perhaps that was the only case that fell through the net, and I hope that it was an isolated case, but I should be grateful if my right hon. Friend would examine the matter and if necessary ensure that such a thing is not allowed to happen again. Honorary colonels, as I have said, have an important role if we are to maintain our fighting troops at the standard that we have come to expect.

It is essential to have a proper press campaign to explain to the general public—particularly those who are interested in serving in the Territorial Army—that the Territorial Army has a bright and promising future. Traditionally, every spring, a campaign is launched, but this year we must hold a special campaign to ensure that everybody knows what the way ahead will be. I fear that, if we do not do that, we will not put the Territorial Army on a proper basis. People will feel that it is threatened, and we shall not get the recruits we need. Those who do not wish the Territorial Army well will point to reduced recruiting figures and make claims for further reductions. That would be most unfair and unfortunate, and I am sure would not be what my right hon. Friend wishes.

We must ensure that, in any future mobilisation of the armed forces, such as occurred in the Gulf and in the Falklands, formed TA units shall be used. We had disagreements in the House about the number of Territorial Army personnel that were serving in the Gulf. At one time, my right hon. Friend thought that there were only 500, whereas I believed that there were 1,000. We eventually managed to reconcile the figures, when we took into account the large number of people who had volunteered to serve on regular engagements in order to participate, but who had been trained as territorial soldiers.

The Territorial Army was therefore entitled to the credit for having trained those people, because there is no way in which, having volunteered off the street, they could have gone out to serve effectively in the Gulf. We must ensure that the territorials have a much more satisfactory and satisfying role in the future and that those who wish to make themselves available in such an emergency have that offer taken up and that they are readily called upon in such times of emergency. I hope that we will not have a two-tier regular and TA system, in future emergencies.

The Territorial Army should provide a basis for the expansion of our forces and as a general reserve. As I have said, it performed extraordinarily well at the outbreak of both world wars, when it provided the bedrock upon which we were able to build. I am not alone in believing that the result of both world wars could have been very different if we had not had those effective territorial forces in place in 1914 and 1939.

I should also like my right hon. Friend to look carefully at what extra help the Territorial Army can give the civilian population in civil disasters. Extensive use is made of reserve forces elsewhere in the world. We could learn from the American experience of using the National Guard not only to help with civil disasters but also with drug enforcement, which are both areas in which we cannot have too much help, provided that it is properly directed and properly trained.

I hope that red tape will not prevent the use of the enormous reservoir of skill and good will that is held in our reserve forces from being available for use at such times purely and simply because Departments might haggle over who will be billed for the cost. Admittedly, this is a Treasury matter, but it cannot possibly be beyond the ability of Treasury Ministers to work out an effective formula to ensure that the Ministry of Defence is properly rewarded for any help that it gives. Such help is certainly required, so I hope that this facility of the Territorial Army will not be wasted.

The Territorial Army provides a reassuring military presence throughout the country. It does so effectively in much the same way as the presence of police on the beat reinforces a sense of law and order. In times of national emergency, it is reassuring to see the Territorial Army around. The Territorial Army also provides important social functions, discipline, comradeship, leadership training, both mental and physical fitness, and a great sense of patriotism, all of which are important and should be encouraged.

One of the Territorial Army's biggest problems in recent years has been the substantial turnover of recruits, which has amounted to as much as 30 per cent. per annum in some units. It is important not only to make the training interesting, stimulating and exciting, but also for the Territorial Army to provide the best possible club in any area. We rely upon the support of the families to retain personnel within the forces.

If the families believe that they can enjoy their social hours with the territorials, they will support their men and womenfolk and encourage them to maintain their membership of the Territorial Army. That would considerably reduce the turnover of personnel, encourage people to serve in the force and enable us to use their expertise in it for much longer, so that less time will be spent on training.

It is extremely important to keep the senior ranks. I explained how, at the beginning of each world war, it was possible quickly to double the number of infantry battalions, gunner and other regiments. That depended on the skill and expertise of those senior ranks. In recent years, we have found that, throughout the Territorial Army, most regiments were undermanned on average by 15 per cent. The 15 per cent. was largely accounted for in the lower ranks. The more senior ranks, such as sergeants, warrant officers, captains and majors, were all in post. Of course, the more junior members of the TA have so many other pressures on their time. They change their jobs more frequently than older people. They get married and move, and may have young children to care for. Those and many other pressures may distract them from remaining for a long period in the Territorial Army.

The more senior ranks are usually more settled. It is very important to keep them, and we would be silly not to provide sufficient places for those more senior ranks to occupy. If we do not provide sufficient places, the necessary skill will not be in the right place at the right time. Moreover, if only a limited number of more senior places are available, very able corporals and subalterns will get tired of waiting for promotion to sergeant and captain respectively, and will be inclined to leave at that stage. We would therefore lose many capable people who have a lot to offer.

The 63,500 places now available should not be allowed to reduce to 54,000 over the next five years, as would be the case if the 15 per cent. rule came into effect. That is why it is so important that we provide challenging and interesting roles to make those senior people keen to remain.

I was encouraged by the Secretary of State's answer to my question on Tuesday that he would be flexible with the extra numbers that were available. I hope that he will find it possible to allow extra ranks to be recruited all the way along the line—not only at the most junior level—to ensure that we do not lose those very able people.

If we are to have a leaner, meaner, keener regular Army, inevitably we shall need a good Territorial Army to support it. After six years of the second world war and 45 years of the cold war, the taxpayer is entitled to a peace dividend. However, if the dividend is to be effectively delivered, it cannot leave us vulnerable to the many other surprises hiding around the corner.

Two years ago, few people could have accurately forecast the possibility of the Gulf conflict. Certainly the trouble in Yugoslavia has been a great surprise to many. Today, we hear that Mr. Gorbachev thinks that his time of public service is near its end. That will raise a number of new question marks throughout what was the Soviet Union. Therefore, we must expect some major changes in that region in the coming years and be prepared for anything that might arise as a result.

Much has been done in recent months to draw those matters to the attention of the Department and, as I said, I believe that Ministers have been listening. I am extremely grateful to the chairman of the Greater London Territorial, Auxiliary and Volunteer Association, Sir Greville Spratt, and to Brigadier Peter Bowser, the secretary, for all that they have done to lead the way in ensuring that the Government have been properly informed that the Territorial Army is adequately provided for in the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Norwich, North (Mr. Thompson) is grateful for what has been done to help him with the preservation of his local Anglian Regiment. Many other hon. Members are equally grateful for what has been done to ensure the future of the TA in their areas. I believe that the Secretary of State agrees with us about the importance of the future role of the Territorial Army, and I am sure that he will do all in his power to help us achieve that objective.

Mr. Allan Rogers (Rhondda): I thank the hon. Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) for having initiated the debate and for giving us an opportunity to discuss some of the implications of the Secretary of State's announcement earlier in the week. I thank him also for the history lesson on the Territorial Army, although my recollection is somewhat different. My stint in the TA was as a conscript, and those of us who did our national service in the TA made many friendships that have lasted to this day.

That has been the cornerstone of the TA concept, and many people have protested about the changes because activities in and around the TA and the drill hall created a culture of its own, certainly in many working class communities. That may not be so evident in larger towns, but in smaller towns and villages—for example, in the mining valleys of South Wales—the TA is held in high esteem.

Hon. Members in all parts of the House recognise the valuable role that all arms of the reserve forces have played in defending Britain, and the hon. Member for Ilford, South reminded us that, in the two world wars, it was possible quickly to enrol sufficient numbers to save Britain. More recently, they were deployed in the Gulf, and more than 1,700 reserve personnel, including the hon. Member for Wimbledon (Dr. Goodson-Wickes), served with the British forces in Operation Granby. We should put on record our tribute to those reservists and members of the TA who served in the Gulf. I know that, in saying that, I reflect the sentiments of all hon. Members.

My hon. Friends and I were interested to note that the NATO summit declaration in London on 6 July 1990 called for the alliance to place more reliance on reserve forces, and the Government have emphasised the importance of part-time soldiers. As the hon. Member for Ilford, South said, their skills are extremely high, although the army has become more technical. I think back to the more rigid skills studied by foot-sloggers such as myself. The height of my military skill was the ability to strip a Bren gun blindfold and put it back together in 30 seconds. The fact that it sometimes did not work after that operation was incidental.

The reserve forces were mentioned by the Secretary of State in his "Options for Change" announcement on 25 July 1990. It seems to be a very sensible move by the Ministry of Defence to alter the structure of our forces in the way in which it is at present proceeding.

We are concerned, however, to learn from various Territorial Army representatives that the Ministry of Defence is considering cutting TA and other reserves by a disproportionate amount compared with the regulars. There were at one time, as the hon. Member for Ilford, South said, rumours that the TA could be cut to almost 55,000 or 50,000. I am sure it was the pressure from the warrior class and the impending general election that led to a final figure of 63,500, which is a cut of about 17 per cent. We are not quarrelling with this decision in any way, because I believe that our full-time forces are already overstretched for the roles and tasks that the Government have outlined for them both in and out of area, and that the territorial forces play a vital support role.

As I mentioned earlier, we recognise that, besides the vital role in defending the United Kingdom which the Territorial Army plays, it also provides very positive outlets for the energies of young men and women, many of whom unfortunately are unemployed. That is why, in the defence estimates debate on 14 October 1991, my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) said:

"We should be careful to preserve the opportunity for as many of our civilians as possible to serve in the volunteer forces."—[Official Report, 14 October 1991; Vol. 196, c. 72.]

I was very glad to hear that the Secretary of State, in his announcement on Tuesday, accepted this view when he said:

"we would not wish to turn away willing and suitable volunteers".—[Official Report, 10 December 1991; Vol. 200, c. 734.]

I congratulate the Government on the recognition of the need to keep this doorway open.

My hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan asked a number of questions on Tuesday regarding the reserves, and perhaps the Minister could provide some of the answers this evening. I do not know whether it would be proper to extend it a little beyond the army, but I am very concerned in particular about the ex-pilots in the Royal Auxiliary Air Force and the RAF Volunteer Reserve, because, according to a parliamentary answer on 14 June 1991, only 10 ex-RAF pilots are in these organisations. It seems to me that, if we are spending £3 million on training someone to fly a fast jet and if, when he leaves the force

[Mr. Allan Rogers]

—there are a lot of people leaving before their time is up —he is not being used in the reserve forces, that is a tremendous waste of a national resource.

I hope that the Minister agrees with us and his colleague the hon. Member for Ruislip-Northwood (Mr. Wilkinson), who raised this point on Tuesday. I ask the Minister if he will undertake to develop proposals to encourage greater involvement by ex-RAF pilots in the reserves.

The same applies, of course, to ex-regular soldiers going into the TA. I am not attempting to compare the quality of the Territorial Army now and following national service, but the TA then consisted almost entirely of people who had served for two years on a full-time basis, and the level of skill and general martial ability was very high. Very many men of that vintage had served in action areas such as Malaya and Korea, so it was a reserve of tremendous value, as well as containing the numbers that were required.

Another question that I want to return to is the problem of employment protection. The Secretary of State said that he would note my hon. Friend the Member for Clackmannan's suggestion that the employment protection aspects of the Reserve Forces Act 1980 be extended to cover those TA members have less than two years' continuous employment. I wonder if he could tell us whether he is prepared to amend the legislation in this fashion, and perhaps tell the House exactly what other amendments he needs to make in order to take account of changing circumstances.

Perhaps the Minister could also go into a little more detail about the criteria that are being used when making his decisions. In the White Paper on the Army a number of criteria were listed. It would be interesting to know whether the same criteria were used in the restructuring of the reserves.

On occasion, the Minister has criticised the lack of detail in our overall defence expenditure proposals and what we propose for the Territorial Army and the reserve forces. We suffer a great handicap in dealing with a Government who are obsessed with secrecy. Whenever we put down questions, it is impossible to get answers. That is sometimes the case with the Select Committee on Defence as well. In its recent report, it said that the White Paper

"contains no hint of the Government's financial strategy for defence over the coming decade."

The Minister has also criticised our lack of proposals for individual units, but when we table questions to get information on which to base proposals, which perhaps we will be implementing in six months' time, we cannot get proper answers from the Government. The stock answer to defence procurement questions is that the information is commercially confidential or that the Department does not normally give the information.

When it comes to operational issues and manpower, the stock answer is that information on the running costs of individual units is not held centrally and could be provided only by the use of disproportionate time and effort, yet the Minister criticises us for not being more specific. We cannot be more specific unless we get the information. I assure the Minister that in six months' time, when he is in opposition, we will be kinder to him and much more open with information.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I am sure my hon. Friend well remembers the Committee stage of the Atomic Weapons Establishment Act 1991 when we had great difficulty in discussing the measure properly because the Department would not release the necessary information. He will remember that we also had difficulty over the Tombs report when again we could not get the necessary information. The Department can be very awkward at times. That makes it difficult not only for Opposition Members but for hon. Members on the Government Benches to discuss matters properly. [Interruption.] The Minister is mumbling—I hope that he will get up and clear the air.

Mr. Rogers: My hon. Friend is right. We had great difficulty getting information on the atomic energy privatisation measure. I understand that, because the proposals were so ludicrous, there was no rationale to justify them. As to the Tombs report, that was the correct name for it because the information was buried very deep.

If I may put on my nationalistic hat for a moment, one issue which concerns us greatly in Wales is the disproportionate cut in regular and volunteer troops. The decision to close 217 Air Defence Battery in Cwmbran, leaving only one gunner battery in Wales, concerns people very much. The battery was formed in 1987, and its purpose-built barracks, costing over £2 million, was opened by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition and General Sir Peter de la Billiere. It is noted for its very high calibre loyalty and involvement in the local community. My hon. Friend the Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy) has emphasised those points to me. It provides much-needed jobs and good training for many young people. There has been a great outcry in Cwmbran about its possible closure.

The Secretary of State talked on Tuesday in terms of people moving from one unit to another, and said that it would not be a problem if a unit was closed, because people could simply go to the next one along the road. But that will not happen, because members of the Territorial Army are not so mobile or nomadic in that sense as regular forces. They live at home with their families and, if they should have to travel from Cwmbran to Newport, for example, or from Pontypool further on to Newport, many people would be deterred from getting involved in the voluntary forces. As a result, the loss of trained people and the expense in recruiting and training new people at a new location would be considerable. Many units would suffer a loss of morale and motivation, which may put the operational effectiveness of those units in jeopardy.

The other issue that concerns us in Wales is the future of the 4th Volunteer Battalion the Welsh Regiment. It may be my wish upon them, but this is the second time this year that the two regiments in which I served, the Royal Welch Fusiliers and the Welsh Regiment, have been under pressure. I thank the Minister very much for saving the Royal Welch Fusiliers. May I implore him now, on behalf of my hon. Friend the Member for Neath (Mr. Hain), to save the 4th Volunteer Battalion? My hon. Friend, together with my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson), my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) and the hon. Member for Gower (Mr. Wardell) are extremely concerned.

We are committed to the maintenance of the defence of this country. It is the one issue on which there is a consensus in this House. Every Government since the war, whether Labour or Conservative, have given a full commitment to the defence of the nation. On both sides of the House, we are anxious to defend the values, traditions and freedoms that we all cherish. The Territorial Army had been a cornerstone of our defence for so many years. It is a civilian army and democracies need civilian as well as full-time professional armies.

Again, I thank the hon. Member for Ilford, South for giving us an opportunity to place on record our tremendous tribute to the TA for the way in which it has served this country over many years.

12.27 am

The Minister of State for the Armed Forces (Mr. Archie Hamilton): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South (Mr. Thorne) for giving us this opportunity to discuss the Territorial Army and for demonstrating his prodigious knowledge of the TA, its history and traditions, going back over a number of years. I must admit that I learned a considerable amount just listening to his speech.

As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made clear in his statement on Tuesday, the Territorial Army, along with our other volunteer reserves, will continue to make a vital contribution to our defence effort.

The reshaping of the Territorial Army is intended to produce a force that meets the new needs stemming from the radically transformed European security environment and the more flexible and mobile force structure which the Alliance is introducing. The new structure that we have designed for the TA also reflects the changed requirements of a smaller mobilised Army and the need for volunteer reserves to be able to complement our regular forces.

In developing the restructuring plans, we consulted widely with those with an interest in, and knowledge of, the TA. In addition to senior serving volunteers, that included regimental colonels and the Council of Territorial Auxiliary and Volunteer Reserve Associations. The advice of local associations on deployment and accommodation issues was also sought. We endeavoured, so far as it was possible, to accommodate those various and on occasion, conflicting views in the plans that were developed. May I take this opportunity to express our gratitude to all those who contributed to the exercise for their positive and constructive approach?

As my hon. Friend said, the current establishment of the TA is 91,000, but its actual strength is no more than about 74,000. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said in his statement in July on the restructuring of the regular Army and in the Command Paper "Britain's Army for the 90s" that we envisaged that the long-term future strength of the TA would settle at between 60,000 and 65,000.

The force structure that we have developed takes full account of our likely future operational needs and assumes a peacetime strength of about 63,500. It would be reinforced in war by the addition of regular reservists to a fully mobilised establishment in excess of 71,000. In addition to integrating our regular and volunteer reserves in a way which enables us to make the most effective use of both, the peacetime establishment is set at a level at which we are confident of achieving full manning, in contrast to the present circumstances.

Substantial numbers—approaching 20,000 volunteers—join and leave the TA every year, and the reduction of 10,000 personnel will be achieved by natural turnover. No active volunteer who remains suitably qualified for TA service will be forced to leave. Where units disband or change their role, every effort will be made to offer volunteers an alternative opportunity to serve, if not in the same TA centre, then in another unit in the vicinity; although precise arrangements will need to balance the requirement of the service and the wishes of the individual.

Volunteers will receive assistance with any additional travelling costs that they may incur as a result, and arrangements will be made for them to retain rank and pay classifications. Where necessary, local overbearing of manpower will be allowed.

It may be important for my hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South to note that, if we want the figure of 60,000 to be maintained—as we do—it will be necessary for some units to overbear and contain excess numbers to compensate for the units in which numbers will inevitably be lower. There will continue to be a requirement for high-quality recruits.

The restructuring of the TA has been undertaken to ensure its continuing relevance in a very different world. It is self-evidently no longer appropriate for volunteers to train for many of the tasks which previously they would have undertaken in support of 1 British Corps in Germany—those are no longer relevant in a unified Germany or under the new Alliance strategy.

In addition to providing essential logistic and combat service support capabilities, the reshaped TA will have a range of new and demanding operational roles in support of the Allied Command Europe Rapid Reaction Corps. The Queen's Own Yeomanry Regiment will provide a medium reconnaissance regiment equipped with tracked armoured vehicles for the corps. Two TA Royal Artillery regiments will be equipped with the 155mm FH70 towed howitzer, and all three future TA air defence regiments will be equipped with the Starstreak high-velocity missile when it enters service.

Mr. William Ross: Given the experience of the Gulf, where air power was a decisive factor, surely it is foolish to cut our air defence commitment. Is that not the one aspect above all others in any rapid deployment force that should be, if anything, overstrengthened, in order to protect our ground troops from air attack?

Mr. Hamilton: Yes, but we must take into account the fact that the number of units in the Royal Air Force regulars and the stations are being reduced. Therefore, we are merely matching the new requirements for the United Kingdom's air defence.

The TA Royal Engineers, in addition to their traditional roles, many of which will be expanded, will in future take on greater responsibility for airfield damage repair and contribute for the first time to the support of the RAF Harrier force. Some TA Royal Signals units will be equipped with the sophisticated Ptarmigan communication systems to improve the support that they can offer to both ARRC and national deployments. Many of those capabilities have previously been provided exclusively within the regular Army.

The TA will also take on greater responsibility for the direct defence of the United Kingdom. The diminished threat and increased warning times will mean that this role will increasingly be seen as that of a general reserve for national defence. It will not be limited exclusively to the essentially static tasks previously associated with military home defence.

Overall, there will be a shift of emphasis within the TA towards combat support and combat service support. Whereas, for example, there will be a reduced requirement for infantry, the Royal Engineers, Royal Signals, Intelligence Corps and Army Air Corps will all need to attract substantially more volunteers in order to meet the new roles which they will be taking on. As with the Regular Army, the TA will be appropriately funded and trained to take on the roles required of it. It is also intended to increase the level of support for the TA provided by the Regular Army by the establishment of closer training links between the two, thereby further emphasising that the Army is one Army.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State set out the main changes as they affect the combat arms in detail in the briefing pack which supported his statement on Tuesday, so I shall not go over that ground again. Suffice it to note that, on completion of the restructuring, there will be a total of five yeomanry regiments and 36 infantry battalions, of which eight will be earmarked to support the ARRC. All but one of the infantry battalions will in future comprise three rifle companies.

In addition to providing a better basis for expansion in an emergency, this will provide a more manageable span of command. It will also enable us to retain appropriate representation across the country. The TA Royal Artillery will comprise two field and three air defence regiments. A second Army Air Corps squadron will be formed, with its headquarters in Scotland. Significant reorganisation will be required within the Royal Engineers and Royal Signals to accommodate their new expanded roles.

The reduction in the threat to the United Kingdom means that we no longer see a requirement for the Home Service Force as a separate organisation, and it will accordingly be absorbed within the mainstream TA. I am sure the House would wish to join me in expressing appreciation to all who have contributed to the success of the HSF during its short history.

We recognise that, because the TA is a volunteer force, it is important that we implement these changes as soon as we can in order to minimise the uncertainty caused by reorganisation. However, further work remains to be done to develop detailed implementation plans before decisions on regimental titles, affiliations and local estate issues can be taken. All these issues will be addressed in the new year, and restructuring will therefore not begin before 1 April 1992.

I am sure that the House would wish to join me in acknowledging the debt that we owe to the Territorial Army personnel who give so willingly of their time in service of the nation. The imaginative proposals that we have set out for the TA will launch it on a new era. They reflect the need to support a smaller mobilised army and to provide a firmer basis for expansion and a more manageable span of command. They also offer the prospect of full manning for the first time for many years.

There will inevitably be disappointment where changes result in reorganisation or the amalgamation or disbandment of units, but I am confident that the proposals will be welcomed by the volunteers themselves as representing new and challenging opportunities to make an even more significant and professional contribution in the future.

My hon. Friend the Member for Ilford, South mentioned 151 Royal Corps of Transport Regiment, whose honorary colonel said that, although he was consulted at the beginning, he was subsequently not consulted about what was happening, but was presented with a fait accompli. I hope that my hon. Friend will allow me to investigate and write to him about it.

He also mentioned—rightly—the need for a press campaign. Such a campaign will be starting shortly and it will combine recruiting for the Regular Army and the Territorial Army. It will remind the country at large that, although reductions are being made in the Regular Army, we still need young soldiers and officers to join up.

We have listened to my hon. Friend's plea that the TA should be more involved in civil disasters. We are looking into that. It has played a role in the past in flood disasters and so on. We see it continuing in that role, and we shall think about whether it has a role to play in combating the misuse of drugs.

My hon. Friend rightly discussed how to make training more effective. That must be one of our ambitions. We want a smaller but better regular Army; similarly, we want a smaller but better TA. It is essential that we increase the number of training days and make the TA's training more effective.

I have already mentioned my hon. Friend's fear that 63,500 will become 54,000, but if the TA goes out to sell itself well and to recruit, and given our enabling certain units to contain greater numbers than their strength, I hope that it will be possible to meet and keep to the 63,500, which we shall certainly pay for.

The hon. Member for Rhondda (Mr. Rogers) brought up again the issue raised by the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) about former pilots in the Royal Auxiliary Air Force and the RAF Reserve. He should realise that pilots cannot train in the RAAF or the RAF Reserve. It is very expensive to train fast jet pilots, and we do not have the money in either of these reserve organisations to enable them to fly the fast jets that would be the only way to keep their training going.

These people are not necessarily wasted. A certain number of pilots leave the RAF and go off and fly with commercial airlines, where to some degree they maintain their skills. If they have only recently left, the regular reservists of the RAF can be called back into service should they be needed, and they can play an effective role again in fast jets if they brush up their training.

We intend to look into the matter of changes in legislation. Once we have decided what needs to be done, we shall return to the House and make our intentions about call-up legislation clear.

The hon. Member for Rhondda asked what criteria we applied to the TA. One of the most essential criteria during the consultation period was the geographical spread. We recognise the need to go on providing opportunities for people to serve in the TA, even if they cannot go on doing the same duties in the same units as before.

We also had to take into account the future roles of reservists, bearing in mind the end of the reinforcement role in Germany. Some units will, of course, have a role in the Rapid Reaction Corps.

To excuse the fact that the Labour party is incapable of spelling out its policy, the hon. Member for Rhondda said that the degree of secrecy in the MOD makes it impossible to procure the detail on which to plan Labour policy. That is a pathetic excuse. It is clear that the Labour party intends to cut defence spending further; the Opposition voted for a recent amendment to that effect.

I do not know what effect that would have on the TA in Wales or anywhere else. It would presumably mean further cuts. There is quite enough information in the defence White Paper and in other publications for any party to know in broad terms what sort of defence it wants for this country. It is about time the Labour party stopped being so pathetic, stopped hiding behind a ridiculous claim that it cannot get the information it needs, and started telling the country what plans it really has for the defence of this country in future.

But the Labour party will not do that, because its cuts and reductions, and the risks that it would take with Britain's defence, are too frightening. Labour Members will never tell the people that, because they know that it will lose them votes at the next election.

Rail Services (North Kent)

12.44 am

Dame Peggy Fenner (Medway): Hon. Members from north and north-east Kent are pleased to have the opportunity tonight to raise the important matter of the breakdown in the rail services provided by Network SouthEast to north Kent.

Long before the past few disastrous months of travelling for our commuters, the line to north Kent, north-east Kent and the coast was, self-confessedly by British Rail, one of the worst two lines in the south-east. The other one, the Essex line to Southend, has attracted a great deal of notoriety.

The chairman of British Rail, Sir Bob Reid, has recently taken a much publicised journey on the Essex line and I am sure that, even if he did not visit our line, he would accept that he would find an equally appalling service on that line also. He knows that.

The transport users consultative committee for southern England, entrusted with listening to the complaints of travellers in the south of England, has been inundated with complaints, and in the third week of November it informed me that the daily service performance continued to be bad. On the day of its letter, 21 November, there were heavy delays of 40 to 50 minutes for many people travelling on the line that morning.

That line has been one of the worst for some time, needing new rolling stock and with heavy commuter pressure. But finally, its terrible performance drove the Medway towns commuter committee to issue an invitation to a public protest meeting headed "Kent commuters have had enough." Despite that meeting being the night of the Gillingham football club cup replay, our local well-supported football team, it had an attendance of 500-plus, with some people unable to get in the hall.

Under that heading, the invitation said:

"The past month has been the worst for commuters that many of us can remember."

Yet from 23 December commuters face reductions which have been deferred and are alleged to be the cause of lower income during the recession, and in the new year they face fares increases above the rate of inflation of 7·9 per cent.

The new rolling stock that we were promised was expected early, but is now predicted to arrive in 1996. In their invitation, the commuters, who are now so pessimistic about it, are talking of having new rolling stock in the next century.

From mid-October, the service was monitored during a four-week period by the transport users consultative committee: it was found that only just over 70 per cent. of the evening peak period trains were arriving within five minutes of their due time. Since then, the situation has deteriorated further.

I received a letter recently which claimed that nearly 50 per cent. of the trains were late. Many additional speed restrictions are being imposed, and BR says that the track renewals are deferred. That reduces the standard of punctuality, although one understands that safety must take its full part as well. Once again, delays on the line have been severe as the annual phenomenon of leaf fall strikes again. Surely technology has some response to that.

In a letter to British Rail's chairman, a copy of which he sent to me, a Medway towns commuter wrote that, on 19 November, the 7.53 am Ramsgate to Cannon Street service which stops at the Medway towns was 25 minutes late, and that no explanation or apology was offered. On 20 November, the 8.44 am service to Cannon Street was 20 minutes at London Bridge, and again there was no explanation or apology. On 21 November, the same service was 14 minutes late, and no explanation or apology was offered on that occasion either.

Whatever disputes there may be about funding, a little human communication can be exercised without involving a great budget. There can be no adequate excuse for lack of information to passengers who are so inconvenienced and frustrated.

Fares increases for Essex line commuters from the new year have been reduced to 5 per cent. by way of acknowledging the poor service that they have suffered. North and north-east Kent commuters are fully entitled to the same consideration. My right hon. and hon. Friends at the Dispatch Box have frequently referred to the exceptional investment currently being made in the railways. It is hard for our commuters to accept that when they see no improvement to their daily travel—only a decline.

The cost of the annual season ticket to Medway towns commuters is more than £1,700. The quarterly ticket is comparatively more expensive, at around £500. I say to my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport, that is highway robbery—or rather, railway robbery.

In view of the emphasis that my hon. Friend the Minister places on rail services and his commitment to them, and reflected by public expenditure on them, my commuting constituents are entitled to significant improvements before they are expected to pay even more for an appalling service.

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) on her success in securing this important and urgent debate on the quality of commuter services serving northern Kent. As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, Members of Parliament representing Kent constituencies have battled for many years to secure improvements to the quality and reliability of commuter rail services. I am saddened that we are having to rehearse yet again arguments that we have made on many previous occasions, both inside and outside the House.

I note that the Opposition Benches are almost empty, although it is good to see the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) in his place. I would have liked to see present also the official transport spokesmen for Labour and the Liberal Democrats, but it is left to Conservative Members for Kent constituencies—indeed, there are such only—to make the strong case for the commuter.

We need a commuter strategy. It would have been nice to hear from Opposition Members their proposals, but they do not care because it is late, no media persons are present, and we are out of sight of the cameras. We shall undoubtedly make that known not only to our local media but to members of Kent county council and local councils. When in future Labour and Liberal Democrat Members pay lip service to the problems of our commuters, others will know that in tonight's important subject, none were present to speak up for them but Conservative Members.

I would argue a little with my hon. Friend the Member for Medway, although she was fair in pointing to the two worst lines in the country—the Southend to Fenchurch Street line and the Dartford loop line, en route to her constituency and elsewhere. I believe that the latter is the worst line in the country. That was confirmed at the Dispatch Box by my right hon. Friend the Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) when he was Secretary of State for Transport, and by British Rail.

My constituency contains two major lines, the Chatham line and the Dartford loop line, and I believe that the catalogue of events mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Medway is of significance to my constituents. British Rail should adhere to three principles when providing a commuter service: reliability, quality and fair pricing. On each of those three counts, British Rail's performance leaves a great deal to be desired.

First, there is not much reliability. Often, trains do not arrive; when they do arrive, they are overcrowded and arrive late at their London or north Kent destinations. Secondly, their quality leaves much to be desired—which is not surprising, given that the rolling stock dates back to the 1950s. Thirdly, the price of BR's commuter service is now significantly higher, in terms of the fares paid out of net income by many people who have to struggle to London to earn their living. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Medway: it is highway robbery.

British Rail must improve its service on all three counts. I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to ensure that all possible representations are made to British Rail suffer a smaller increase in fares, more in line with that experienced by south Essex commuters.

Another problem is timetabling. British Rail prefers to call its timetable changes "redesigning", which I believe is a euphemism for a reduction in service. As many Conservative Members will remember, in August British Rail slipped into the culture of commuter travel radical changes to services from Longfield and Farningham Road, and from Dartford to Blackfriars. Almost all the services to Blackfriars from Longfield and Farningham Road have disappeared, and services from Dartford and Crayford to Blackfriars were reduced by about 60 per cent. That had a significant impact on many people who work in the City, and who have no alternative means of access to it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Medway also mentioned rolling stock. On a number of occasions, my hon. Friend the Minister has pledged that the Networker 465 rolling stock will arrive for the short-haul inner Kent services. I understand that the first will arrive very soon, and should be in passenger use some time next May. Although that is good news, it represents a slippage: we were promised that the trains would be in use in September, and would be taking passengers soon after that.

We want strong representations to be made to British Rail. We want apologies to our constituents who have suffered, and will continue to suffer. We want a radical examination of British Rail's management structure, and proper consultation about timetable changes now and in the future. We want to ensure that British Rail takes all possible action to minimise the disastrous impact on family life, jobs and marriages. Many people are undergoing extreme stress: they are having to cope not only with problems at work, but with the problems of getting to work and returning home. For them, such problems may be just as significant.

We need to work towards the creation of a commuter strategy. There are large gaps in provision on the north Kent to London service. Many people whom I represent have only either the petrol engine or a British Rail locomotive-drawn vehicle by which to gain access to their point of work. Far more needs to be done as motor car ownership continues to increase.

I hope that we can, from now, start to make progess with and assist British Rail. When there are difficulties, we hope that they will be explained to the people who are forced to use British Rail services.

12.59 am

Mr. James Couchman (Gillingham): On Monday 9 December, Kent Members of Parliament were having our annual meeting with local district councils when we heard about a major disruption to rail services at London Bridge due to a fire. We could not know then that it was to prove to be arson. It seemed to us to be the last straw. My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) erupted and melted the telephone lines between here and Euston house, where British Rail lives. Bob Reid capitulated and agreed to meet Kent Members yesterday at 8 am.

I initiated a request for a Consolidated Fund debate, and was immediately supported by seven colleagues. I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) on hers being the name that came up in the ballot for this debate.

Monday's fire at London Bridge was the last straw in a miserable saga of mishaps for commuters from north Kent and on the north Kent line. The saga goes back for some months—even for years—but it has got far worse this autumn. North Kent's rail services, as my hon. Friend the Member for Medway pointed out, are the worst in the whole of the Network SouthEast area—even worse than the notorious Fenchurch Street to Southend line, which the Father of the House, our right hon. Friend the Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), has mentioned so frequently.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) said, the rolling stock dates from the 1960s and even from the 1950s, and is now completely worn out. It is therefore uncomfortable and dirty. It carries too many people, and a substantial proportion have to stand the whole way into London—for 40 minutes from Chatham and for even longer from the stations of Gillingham and Rainham in my constituency. That is twice as long as British Rail thinks that people should stand. The service is uncomfortable, unhealthy, uneconomic for workers whose employers find that they have tired people arriving for work, and dangerous, as the Cannon Street crash earlier this year proved.

The service has seen a sharp deterioration in reliability this autumn. The notorious leaf fall is blamed, but I believe that that may be a smokescreen for other failings. The unreliability is compounded by the attitude of British Rail staff. Their attempt to communicate the reasons for failure is lamentable. People wait in the carriages in main-line stations when trains are late to leave. They get no explanation. People stand on platforms listening to those awful nasal tannoys giving some sort of notice that trains are late, but there is precious little attempt to apologise or to communicate any sort of explanation to people who are, after all, paying customers.

The most unacceptable of all the delays occur because staff do not turn up for work. They do not let their managers know that they are ill or that they cannot turn up for work. People are left waiting for the next train. Trains are in the wrong place at the wrong time, and the problem escalates out of all proportion.

I have a growing file of letters, as has my hon. Friend the Member for Medway, about the delays that have occurred over the past four or five weeks. The return journeys from the Medway towns to London for a whole week should not take more than seven to eight hours. There have been delays of anything up to five hours during one week. That simply is not acceptable.

Travel on the north Kent line is uncomfortable, unreliable and dangerous. To add insult to injury, as my hon. Friend the Member for Medway said, it is also very expensive. The price of an annual season ticket from Chatham has escalated from £1,464 in 1990 to more than £1,600 this year, and it is to rise to £1,736 next year. The prices of season tickets from Gillingham and Rainham further down the line are that little bit more expensive.

Many people cannot afford a lump sum of that magnitude, so they have to pay the quarterly season ticket rate, which takes their fares to more than £2,000 a year. That is not acceptable for the kind of service that is provided. Price increases over the past two years have been beyond inflation. My constituents have been told that they must pay for increases of twice the rate of inflation to fund investment. That is all very well, but it provokes a hollow laugh among my constituents, who see precious little investment on the north Kent line.

The trains get older, dirtier, less reliable and more expensive. There is a rumour that we will see the new Networker 465 trains on the inner suburban lines as far as Gillingham, but that will do nothing for the people who travel in from east Kent and from the eastern end of my constituency.

Only this morning, the chairman of British Rail told us that the 471 Networker programme, the long-haul Networker programme, is not even in the frame for the next three years. It was in the frame when my right hon. Friend the Member for Southend, West (Mr. Channon) was Secretary of State for Transport. It has been taken out of the frame because, as Bob Reid has said, all his investment this year must go on channel tunnel-related projects and because his income from passengers and his receipts from land sales have fallen, while his debt charges and spend on safety have increased. He tells us that the gap has widened effectively by £1·8 billion. He has also told us that there are no trains ordered for London beyond 1993. The suburban Networker programme is incomplete, and the Kent coast Networker programme is beyond the horizon.

My hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport must surely hold one of life's more miserable ministerial positions at the moment. Can he tell me what I can tell my constituents who travel daily on old, unreliable and dangerous rolling stock which is putting pressure on their health and, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford said, on their marriages as well? What hope of better travel do they have? When will their employers be able to rely on their prompt arrival in a fit state for work? When will their spouse or partner be able to rely on their timely arrival home in the evening? When will my constituents who rely on the Kent coast line be able to enjoy the Networker 471 trains for which they are even now being asked to pay?

[Mr. James Couchman]

I have asked many questions. The chairman of BR would not or could not answer them yesterday morning. At this early hour, will my hon. Friend the Minister, whose heart is in the right place and who travelled on the line only last week, give my constituents some hope of better value for money for north Kent's rail services after a thoroughly miserable autumn?

1.2 am

Mr. Roger Gale (Thanet, North): I add my congratulations to those that have already been expressed to my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) on securing a debate on a subject that is of burning importance to those of us with constituents who use the north Kent line.

I must express my thanks to my hon. Friend the Minister for Public Transport for taking a personal interest over a long period in the problems we face. We have discussed the problems of the past few months, but some of us are aware that the Minister took the trouble to come down to Kent some months ago to unveil the mock-up of the new Networker train at Margate station to allow the public to express their views about the design before the trains were built. We appreciate that, and the trouble that the Minister took last week when he spent a considerable time—it was not a publicity stunt—on platforms where he spoke to constituents and commuters. He then travelled by train to see the problems for himself. I only wish that BR's senior management had taken the trouble to do the same thing this week.

We have faced problems on that line over many months. My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford is right to say that we have been pursuing the matter for a considerable time. We regard with some distain the Johnnie-come-lately publicity-seeking activities of some hon. Members trying to cash in on a real problem.

What are the problems? Commuters on the north Kent line are late to work in the mornings because the trains are unreliable. Commuters on the north Kent line are late home at night because the trains are unreliable. For employers, that is a nightmare. It means that they cannot rely on their staff. It means also that people travelling on the north Kent line do not get jobs in the City of London these days, because employers know not that the employees are unreliable but that the train service that they are required to use is unreliable.

Employees who travel, and have done for weeks since June, suffer enormously from stress. My hon. Friend the Minister stood on the platform with me only last week, when a lady and her two young children waited for the best part of 40 minutes for her husband to come home, not being told by British Rail when that train might arrive. It was not just the fact that the train was late but the fact that no information was provided. That is a daily occurrence for families whose breadwinners travel on that line.

Trains are overcrowded for much of the journey between north Kent stations and the centre of London. Passengers are standing to and from work. At the end of a hard day's work, that in itself is difficult to bear. It is also dangerous. My hon. Friends have referred to recent rail disasters. Unless something is done, it will be only a matter of time before a another similar occurrence takes place. Only tonight, we read in the London evening paper of the widow of the train driver who was sadly killed on the outskirts of London not so long ago. At a memorial service, she said that not enough had been done to put things right since her man was killed driving a train.

The service on the train is unusable. Some time ago, we prevailed upon British Rail to introduce a trolley service—a trolley service that is run with great pride by people who take pride in their work and who seek to serve their customers. The problem is that the ride is so bad that the coffee they serve is not holdable or drinkable. That is also very sad.

Last weekend, a group of my constituents came to my surgery to complain yet again about the standard and the quality of what passes for service on the north Kent line. My hon. Friend the Minister has seen the trains that travel from Ramsgate to Cannon Street. He knows, because he has seen them for himself, that the front four coaches on the trains are non-corridor. Travellers in the mornings are aware of that. Passengers boarding at Ramsgate board the corridor part of the train, and those joining in the Medway towns have the inconvenience of travelling in non-corridor trains, but only for a relatively short period, from Medway towns into the centre of London, albeit overcrowded.

Coming back at night is a different case altogether. Those running for trains that may or may not be leaving on time find themselves jumping into the first four coaches of the train—the first four coaches become the last four coaches—they go in at the front and they come out at the back. That means that many of those passengers, many of whom are travelling to the Thanet towns, find themselves in non-corridor trains.

One of my lady constituents told me last week that she was sharing a compartment with a man who was in absolute physical agony and sweating because he needed to go to the lavatory, on a train that had been sitting in a siding or on a railway track—it was delayed and doing nothing because of the signalling outside Cannon Street—for three quarters of an hour. That man had to apologise to the ladies in the compartment, and he urinated out of the window to relieve himself. That is—I hesitate to say it—the pass that we have come to. Those are the circumstances that our constituents face.

British Rail told us at an early hour today that it had lost 7 per cent. of its customers. Is that surprising? Of course the recession has cost customers, but some of my constituents tell me that they will not travel on the railways because they are not reliable and they cannot get to work on time. Now, they drive the 70 miles to London or they use coaches instead of British Rail.

British Rail's response to that is to say not, "We must improve our service," but, "We have suffered a 7 per cent. reduction in the number of travelling passengers, so we will cut 7 per cent. of the capacity." No thought was given to the fact that it might be possible to generate more business by improving the service. The logic of that argument is that one should cut all the passengers and all the trains. That is the downward spiral that we are now experiencing on the suburban lines.

The quality of the transport infrastructure affects jobs in my constituency. The Government have put many millions of pounds into the dualling of the Thanet way, the main arterial road down into my constituency. It was my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell) who first committed money to that, at the same time as he was dealing with the channel tunnel legislation.

There has been a tremendous commitment to the roads, but we need the railways as well—not only to get our constituents to work in the morning, but also because we want to create jobs in our own constituencies. I want to see north-east Kent opened up. It is an area with tremendous investment potential. However, if it is to develop, business men from London have to be able to get into Kent. We need two-way traffic, not one-way traffic. The failure of the railways is having a significant effect on the economic development of north-east Kent.

What is the cause of all the problems that we have been having? Yesterday morning, British Rail helpfully provided us with a pie chart, showing that 12 per cent. of delays are caused by signalling equipment faults. The chairman of British Rail told us that the software for the new signalling at Cannon Street, into which millions of pounds of taxpayers' money has been put, does not work. That is not a lack of investment; it is investment in the wrong product. Seventeen per cent. of delays are caused by faults in trains, which may or may not mean manning faults, and 11 per cent. are caused by civil engineering problems.

The chairman of British Rail lays all those faults at the door of a lack of investment, but although money is being spent on signalling and on new trains on the line covering the constituency of my Friend the Member for Dartford, British Rail Engineering Ltd. apparently cannot deliver those trains either on time or to quality. We were told by the chairman of British Rail this morning that the lavatories and the lighting do not work. Again, that is not lack of investment—it is investment in the wrong product.

Autumn leaf falls account for 6 per cent. of delays, but 6 per cent. over the narrow autumn period means a tremendous impact on passengers in that short time. As my hon. Friend the Member for Medway has said, it is time that we managed to get to grips with that problem. I am not sure what "cancellations of other trains" means, but that accounts for 5 per cent. of the delays. Another cause of delays are the "external factors outwith BR", such as the incident at the beginning of this week when an arsonist burned the signalling at London Bridge.

We cannot and will not blame British Rail for that, nor would we wish to blame British Rail for acts of God or for the tragic attempted, and sometimes successful, suicides. Those are external factors that none of us can control. However, 28 per cent. of the sector of that pie chart deals with operations and retail staff. British Rail tells us that that means management, but not once this morning did the chairman of British Rail, for all his bluster, tell us what he was going to do about most of that.

If a train breaks down on the north Kent line, the driver has to get out of the stopped cab, climb across live rails to the railway equivalent of an AA box and find a telephone so that he can report what has gone wrong. The chairman of British Rail has a telephone in his car because he needs one. Many hon. Members, including myself, have telephones in our cars because we regard them as an indispensable tool of modern business, but the driver of a railway train, with people behind him for whose safety he is responsible and who needs to convey information to people who are waiting on platforms to meet their relatives or to tell signalmen and others what and when something has gone wrong, is not provided with the basic tools to do his job. The train driver does not have a simple radio telephone. Those are matters with which British Rail can and should get to grips. If there is one thing on the line it is the reputation of the chairman of British Rail.

I now come to investment. As my hon. Friend the Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman) said, the chairman of British Rail told us this morning that all his capital allowance for this year and the foreseeable future would be taken up with channel tunnel-related undertakings. When British Rail put through the channel tunnel Bill, the House was given assurances over and over again in one form or another, either direct or by innuendo, that the construction of the channel tunnel and the rail-related expenditure would not have a detrimental effect on the commuter services of Kent. It is patently clear that those undertakings were ill-founded and that that is where the money is going.

I do not dispute with the chairman of British Rail that that is where he is spending his money but I question whether British Rail is spending all the money on the channel tunnel because it has to or whether it is spending all the money on the channel tunnel project because it is aware that it will be the poor bloody infantry—the commuters—who will bear the brunt and shout and make the Government cough up yet more money.

There is clearly a case for more investment, and quick investment, in new rolling stock for the north Kent line. No one would dispute that. Through British Rail, the Government are already spending many millions of pounds, more than has been spent for many years, on new signalling, new stations, new platforms and in some cases new track. But we need new coaches. [Interruption.]

I hear the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape), who came in late and speaks for the Opposition, intervene from a sedentary position. I am sorry that his hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) is not here tonight. Last week, he took the opportunity of a photo opportunity on the train to all the television audience that he had a letter from my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for Transport saying that there would be no new investment in rolling stock for three years.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East told me that he would send me a copy of that letter, so I wrote to him that day and asked him for a copy. It has still not arrived. He also told the television station that he had a plan. His plan was that British Rail should lease for £50 million a year the necessary rolling stock. But he did not say who would pay for that rolling stock in the first place or whether that formed part of the Labour party's public expenditure plans. So I wrote and asked him to answer that question too. Perhaps the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East will take the message back to him that I still have not had a reply to that letter and that I would welcome a response and a copy of the Secretary of State's letter which he says exists.

Mr Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): When the hon. Gentleman has finished griping and whining, which is all he ever does about commuter services in Kent, perhaps in the interests of accuracy he might reflect on something that he has just said. He said that the Government are spending more through British Rail than they have ever done. If we are to have a debate, it must be based on some accuracy in the hon. Gentleman's statistics. His statement is not true: British Rail is borrowing more. That is why the hon. Gentleman's commuters are paying more.

Mr. Gale: No one would dispute that, under this Government, more taxpayers' money—it is not Government or public money—has been spent, even on the lines that we criticise, than has ever been spent before.

Mr. Snape: I dispute it, because it is not true.

Mr. Gale: The hon. Gentleman came to the debate late. Perhaps he would like to listen to what I have to say. Undoubtedly he will make his own speech in a moment.

There are certain things that my hon. Friend the Minister can do to help us. First, it is clear that the programme for the new train sets for the north Kent line must be introduced as quickly as possible. I do not know anyone who disagrees with that. I hope that it will not be too long before he can come to the House and tell us that that programme is back in the frame and on stream and that those trains will be built not only quickly and on time but to a quality that apparently has not existed in recent months.

Secondly, I hope that my hon. Friend will ask British Rail to review the timetable of the programme. The thought of more trains being taken out and more passengers being put on to yet more overcrowded trains is not acceptable to any of our constituents. Lastly, I hope that my hon. Friend will persuade British Rail, in the light of the appalling performance that it has offered our constituents in the past few months, to make financial recompense and, above and beyond that, to guarantee reliability and quality for the future.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): I, too, congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) on leading the debate. It is significant that at 1.25 am there are present in the House six hon. Members who represent north Kent constituencies, all of them Conservative, making the case for our railway line.

It is also significant that, in recent months, we have had heat, but no light, and not a little language from the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) making party political points on television. Here we are, in the House of Commons, where the power lies, debating the issue of service for our commuting constituents, and where is Labour's principal transport spokesman? He is at home in bed.

Mr Snape: Presumably he is in the same place, though one hopes not literally so, as the Secretary of State, and where any sensible person would be at 1.25 in the morning—in bed.

Mr. Arnold: The Minister is here——

Mr. Snape: So is his opposite number.

Mr. Arnold: Whereas the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, East can be relied on always to turn up on time in the TV studios, when it is less convenient for him to turn up—in the House—to debate issues of importance, where is he? He is abed.

My hon. Friends have emphasised the poor service that our constituents have had to suffer for a long time. But it has been getting noticeably worse in recent weeks. Like my hon. Friends, commuters have written to me. I will cite a few of them to exemplify the type of service that thousands of commuters in north-west Kent and elsewhere in north Kent have had to put up with. Mr Brian Sangha of Gravesend writes:

> "I have been commuting for some 20 years and during that time have noted the declining standards of service, combined with substantial fare increases and increases in government funding."

He writes that, in the week beginning 11 November, he carried out an analysis of the performances of the trains that he uses. He reports that, for 20 per cent. of the time, the trains were cancelled, for 60 per cent. of the time they ran between 10 and 15 minutes late, and the advertised journey time was not achieved on one occasion.

Mrs. Lewis, of Lower Shorne, in my constituency, did a similar survey earlier this month and reports:

> "Out of 20 trains, only six arrived within five minutes of their scheduled times, and of the remaining 14, seven were between 17 and 48 minutes late."

That is for a 25-mile journey scheduled to take about 47 minutes, so what price the kind of statistics that British Rail has been issuing about the service?

The effect that that is having on commuters at a time of difficulty over jobs can be summed up by a lady from Meopham who, having gone into similar detail as other letter writers, adds:

> "I count myself lucky to work as a secretary for a gentleman who is extremely understanding."

Employers must indeed be understanding, given the timekeeping that my constituents have to put up with.

Such service is not confined merely to the most northerly lines through north Kent, through Gravesend. It also applies to the line to Meopham and Sole Street in my constituency. Not only must commuters on that service suffer the bad timekeeping and lack of cleanliness which has been particularly evident on British Rail in recent months, but they must also suffer the new timetabling.

British Rail says that the volume of commuters in north Kent has declined by about 7 per cent. of late, so it must trim costs accordingly, as any good business must do. I find it completely inexplicable that in the face of that 7 per cent. it saw fit last August, when many commuters were on holiday, to sneak out the announcement that the autumn programme would involve scrapping 100 per cent. of the services in the rush hour to and from the city on this line. All three trains up and all three trains down were scrapped. After much ado and going into some detail, British Rail somewhat grudgingly, late in the day, replaced one up train, but not one to come back.

We should also look at the kind of cattle-truck conditions that our constituents are supposed to put up with. The carriages on the north Kent line date from the 1950s and the new Networker carriages are long overdue. We in this House know that the Government have given British Rail the largest rail investment since the Conservative Government of the 1950s. It is significant that the occasional Labour Government that we have had since then did not bring a single new carriage on to the routes serving north Kent.

We know that the vast bulk of the Networkers are now being constructed at British Rail Engineering Ltd. and at Metro Cammel. We know that the first such unit is to be delivered next week, with weekly deliveries thereafter. We must, as north Kent Members, insist that British Rail keeps to this programme so that it properly introduces the passenger service of Networker trains early in the spring.

We welcome our hon. Friend the Minister here tonight and we hope that he will insist that British Rail delivers these Networkers trains on time. The overwhelming bulk of them have been authorised and ordered and are coming in. I ask my hon. Friend to make sure that British Rail does not continue to divert its capital investment into channel tunnel services but orders the remaining tranche of 188 Networkers for the north Kent line and makes sure that the system is completely re-equipped. It is high time that we had a 20th century or even a 21st century quality service for the commuters of north Kent.

1.31 am

Mr. Roger Moate (Faversham): I begin by agreeing with the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) and his proposition that most sensible people would be in bed at this time. I am delighted that he is here because he has been a consistent advocate of more investment in the railways and we should give him credit for that. I always remind him of the many very severe criticisms that he levelled at the Labour Government, most of them justified, about the lack of investment between the years 1974 and 1980.

The hon. Gentleman knows that this is not a new problem. In the 20 years that I and some of my hon. Friends here have been in the House, the problems of bad commuter services for north Kent have constantly been with us. There was a flashback in one of our local papers the other week to an item in the news 25 years ago when my predecessor, now Lord Boston, met a large number of very irate commuters and, according to the report, was rather surprised at their intemperate language. I think that most of us are very surprised at just how patient and forbearing many commuters have been in the most incredibly difficult travelling conditions that they have had to put up with in recent weeks.

Terry Boston's predecessor was another Labour member, called Percy Wells, and there is a story told of him in relation to trains. As we all know, in this House we are always forgetting things. We forget where we park our cars, briefcases and papers. It is a fairly well-known characteristic. But on one particular occasion Percy Wells excelled himself. He was travelling back on the last train to Faversham, as was his normal practice, when he remembered that he had left his wife sitting in the Gallery.

My hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) referred to the visit of Sir Bob Reid to the House this morning. We should put on record the fact that we are grateful to him for coming early in the morning, with other senior managers of Network SouthEast. It was courteous and helpful of him to do so. It was a useful meeting. While it is right to level harsh criticisms at times like this, one should also appreciate it when the effort is made. They are doing their utmost to respond. There is general recognition of the tremendous problems. Having got to that meeting at 8 o'clock this morning, here we are debating the position at nearly 2 o'clock the next morning. I feel like many of our commuters, that some of the hours put in are unreasonable.

It should be understood how angry, frustrated and fed up so many commuters are. Journeys that should take an hour are taking two hours. Commuters get no explanations and complaints are legion. The suffering is real and the hardship is very great. I do not need to reiterate that because we all understand it and regret it very much.

I have a bigger worry. The problems over the past few weeks because of leaves on the lines, ice or whatever, have been dreadful, but we could be facing much worse conditions in coming weeks and months because we have not hit the hard winter. We have not had snow yet. The prospect is depressing for tens of thousands of people making the daily journey into London or desperately trying to get home.

What is to be done? The first problem is the old rolling stock. We have had a graphic description of travelling in non-corridor trains without toilets. One can cope with that for a journey lasting an hour, but if one is there for two hours or two and half hours, as can happen, one can appreciate the sheer misery that that causes. No one in any part of the House can justify that. That has not just happened. The problem of inadequate investment goes back a long time.

The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East was crossing swords with my hon. Friends about who spent the most money. I could probably find some words on the record from him, but the only time there was a significant cut in railway investment was under a Labour Government. That was regrettable, but under-investment is still regrettable. Given that it is a nationalised industry, there is always a shortage of investment funds and there are always clashes of priority for extra money. So year after year after year there has been inadequate investment in that line.

The conclusion I reach is different from that of the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East. We have to find a different financial structure. It could be privatisation or it could be separating the railway into different management structures. There is no simple way of raising the billions of pounds that we need if we are to modernise the railway. The fascinating thing is that the hon. Members for West Bromwich, East and for Kingston upon Hull, East (Mr. Prescott) realise that, even if there were a Labour Government, they would not get the necessary capital investment from their Treasury spokesman. So they have come up with the idea of leasing. The significance of that is that they know that they would not get capital funds.

We all face that problem. The commuters are entitled to new rolling stock and somehow we have to get it. If we do not order it now, the prospects for the line are dreadful. One way or another, we have to find the resources and commit ourselves to a programme of new trains on those long distance lines. We are talking about big money —£7 billion. It cannot be conjured out of thin air but it is the first basic requirement.

However, that is a long-term prospect and several measures should be taken immediately to help our commuters. My hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) made this suggestion and it is not new, but communications could be improved and information given out quickly. It is wonderful how quickly a high-grade, high-quality letter can be produced with modern photocopiers to explain to all commuters exactly what went wrong. Most of them are very supportive of British Rail and knowledgeable about the railways, and they want information but they do not get it. That measure can be taken tomorrow. Most passengers understand the problems and are ready to make allowances for the sort of problems that occur on that rail network, but for heaven's sake, let us get on with improving matters right away.

The next measure concerns fare increases. If the Southend line can achieve recognition of the fact that its service is poor and if passengers on that line have had a lower fare increase, the same should have been applied to the Kent line. If, as we are told, it is too late to reduce those prospective fare increases from 7·75 per cent. to 5 per cent., in line with inflation and comparable to the Southend line, the Government should find another way to make a concession to passengers in recognition of their suffering. One way would be to reduce fares; another would be to extend season tickets for a period. But let us do something in recognition of the serious problems.

As soon as new rolling stock is available, may we please have more standby stock ready so that it can no longer be claimed that there is inadequate stock in the wrong place when problems occur?

All those measures involve capital and, one way or another, we must create a larger investment programme. Frankly, I do not care whether that is done by leasing or by more Government investment, but it must be forthcoming. The leasing method is fudging the issue because it is cheaper for the Treasury to raise that money than to borrow it from the City. Unless we lease into a privately financed railway where there is genuine risk capital, it is simply Government borrowing by a different name.

We have a long-term investment problem and a short-term winter problem, coupled with short-term management problems. Those can be dealt with, given the right approach by my hon. Friend the Minister and British Rail management. We have the exciting prospect of a White Paper to be issued shortly on the new structure of British Rail, which can offer the right solutions for our passengers in the long term. That means smaller management units and a much better responsiveness to local customers. Only in that way will the hundreds of thousands of people in the south-east get the first-class modern railway that they deserve.

1.43 am

Mr. Peter Snape (West Bromwich, East): I apologise to the hon. Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner), who initiated the debate, for missing her speech. I had expected the debate to start later, and I hope that she accepts that, although it is my responsibility to be here at the correct time, I did not deliberately miss her speech, and I meant no discourtesy to her.

I arrived in time to hear the speech of the hon. Member for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman). The first phrase that I heard bemoaned the state of the railway service in his constituency, and he asked what he should tell his constituents. I understand that he is desperate for something to tell them. After all, we are approaching a general election and, as he canvasses in the snows of February or March or even in the sunshine of July—none of us know yet—they may say, "Well, after 13 years, shouldn't you have done better on those services?"

I shall try to tell the hon. Gentleman what he should tell his constituents in a minute or two, but first I shall comment on the speech of the hon. Member for Faversham (Mr. Moate). He and I have spent the bulk of the past 18 hours in various Committees, so we have probably heard more than enough of each other. I hope that I shall not damage his career prospects by saying that I found his speech thoughtful, in direct contrast to some of the others that I heard this evening.

The hon. Member for Faversham rightly spoke of the investment problems that have occurred under successive Governments, both Conservative and Labour, for many years. He was right—I was critical of some of the policies of the last Labour Government. I shall probably be telling tales out of school about myself when I say that I once wrote a letter to The Guardian of all newspapers about the Labour Government's railway policies. The matter was taken seriously, because I was then a Whip. I was new to the post and professed ignorance of traditions, but I understand that neither the Ministers involved nor their civil servants were overkeen on my departure from the normal customs.

The two senior Ministers in the Department of Transport at that time were Mr Bill Rodgers and Mr John Horam, and there was precious little socialism in the railways policies from that quarter. One of them, having spent a few fleeting years in the SDP or whatever it was called, is now running the Royal Institute of British Architects. I understand that the other former Minister has been selected as a Conservative candidate for Orpington, in Kent.

Let us hope that if, in the far distant future, the nation is unwise enough to select another Conservative Government, Mr John Horam is not once again appointed a Transport Minister. If he is, I fear that the griping that we have heard tonight from Conservative Members about rail services will be redoubled. Mr Horam is no friend of the railways and the fact that he is a member of the Conservative party merely proves something that most of us long suspected when he was sailing under false colours.

The hon. Member for Faversham made some relevant comments. He rightly talked of the need for British Rail to improve communications. There is nothing more annoying for passengers than to sit in trains or wait at stations without being given information. There is a management problem in British Rail. I appreciate that modern communication equipment has not yet been installed in many stations in north Kent. When it has been installed in other parts of British Rail, it is often not used properly.

Therefore, not only is investment needed, but a little more managerial competence must be brought to bear when that investment is provided, to ensure that information is made readily available. Passengers are much more prepared to accept delays and problems if they know what is wrong and how long it is likely to take to put right. All too often, the most annoying aspect of a delayed railway journey is having to sit in trains, whether with corridors or not.

The hon. Member for Faversham talked about new ways of raising finance. There is no magic method of financing commuter trains. If, in the unlikely event of another Conservative Government being elected, British Rail were privatised, I do not think that there would be too many bidders for the north Kent rail services, whether modernised or not. It is a simple fact of financial life anywhere in the world that running a commuter railway is not, by its very nature, a profitable business. As on any other commuter line, many of the assets on the north Kent line—which are, in these modern days, expensive—spend 18 out of 24 hours doing very little. It is at the twin peaks—the morning and the evening—when those assets are put to full use.

It is difficult to imagine anyone outside the railway industry rushing with cheques to purchase commuter railway lines in view of the fact that peak travel is the most expensive transport provision imaginable. I should have thought it pretty unlikely—but I am prepared to listen to Conservative Members, despite the fact that I rarely believe them on such matters—that there would be a great rush to buy their railway.

The hon. Member for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale) talked about the railway problems affecting his constituency, and complained about the recent reduction in capacity. Where has he been? British Rail or Network SouthEast must cut its commuter coat in accordance with its financial cloth, and it is this Government who have drawn the financial guidelines so tightly. The necessity of living within a budget has led railway managers to reduce capacity on trains, because otherwise they would run over the budget for their sector or route.

The hon. Gentleman should talk to the Minister—publicly or privately—about the reduction and tell him that running the railway system—especially Network SouthEast—in such a parsimonious manner has caused many of the problems that he has graphically if somewhat over-dramatically outlined. No one would feel anything but anguish—

Mr. Jacques Arnold rose——

Mr. Snape: I shall come to the hon. Gentleman in a moment. He has not listened to what I said, because he was turning the other way.

Mr. Dunn rose——

Mr. Snape: I did not hear what the hon. Gentleman said, although I understand that he had a few things to say. Let me deal first with the hon. Member for Thanet, North, who told the—admittedly sad—story of the commuter forced to urinate out of the window because of delays. Everyone can understand that, and sympathise with the person involved. One could find oneself in such circumstances on any mode of transport.

I know that the railway system in Kent—especially in an election year—is set up to be an Aunt Sally, but if hon. Members decided to drive to and from their constituencies they would be aware of the fact that their arrival time, especially at this time of year, would be likely to fluctuate widely, depending on the traffic and the number of accidents on the trunk roads and motorway. They could end up in a traffic jam lasting an hour or an hour and a half.

Mr. Dunn: Perhaps I could be fairer to the hon. Gentleman than I was when he was not here. I accept his apology to my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner), but he did not listen to my speech either. However, I accept his apology in the spirit in which it was given.

My hon. Friend the Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) and I mentioned that British Rail argued that it has lost 7 per cent. of its customers because of the recession and that, consequently, it had to make cuts. Why did it have to cut 100 per cent. of the line from Chatham—in our constituencies—to Blackfriars and 60 per cent. of services from Dartford to Blackfriars? A 7 per cent. loss followed by cuts of 100 per cent. and 60 per cent. does not make sense.

Mr. Snape: The hon. Gentleman must accept that I am unable to give a detailed answer.

Mr. Arnold: He is trying to justify it.

Mr. Snape: From a sedentary position, the hon. Member for Gravesham makes a fool of himself as usual. I am not trying to justify the cuts. I am agreeing with hon. Members that a great deal is wrong with the commuter services from their constituencies. I am making what I hope the Minister will accept is the relevant point—that railway finances, and especially those of Network South East, play a part in the illogical trimming of services, to use the words of the hon. Member for Dartford.

I hope that he accepts that British Rail will say that services have been cut so that it can stay within the budget imposed by its financial straitjacket. Those cuts might be said to be unfair and to bear down unfairly on those who live on the line, but British Rail managers say that they have to make cuts somewhere because they have to live within their budgets. None of us wants cuts that affect our constituencies, but that is what has to happen.

The hon. Member for Gravesham dripped and moaned about services from his constituency. His only consolation must be that he will not have to put up with all this much longer, because he will not be here to complain about the railway after the next election. I know that his Labour successor will do a better job than he has done to improve services from that part of the world—[Interruption.] The hon. Gentleman is obviously obsessed by that successor, because he keeps mumbling about him. I have no doubt that, when he arrives, he will make a better fist of fighting for his constituents than the hon. Gentleman has.

I gathered that the hon. Member for Faversham did not feel that leasing was the right way forward. As he correctly said, it is cheaper to borrow money from the Treasury than from anyone else. He fairly conceded that any Government will have spending priorities governing the borrowing of money, and what British Rail needs to borrow is likely to be beyond the capacity of the Treasury to meet in full.

Leasing is not new. The 1970-74 Tory Government went in for quite a bit of it with British Rail. Deltic locomotives and some rolling stock were leased at that time. By leasing, British Rail can spread the burden over up to 20 years, and that means coming up with much smaller sums at the beginning.

I hope that Conservative Members agree that something drastic must be done. The desperately needed class 465 trains for north Kent have still not been ordered, despite the pleas from Tory Members. I do not think that the Minister of State will be able to pledge that those trains will be provided. That means that British Rail will have to spend £50 million on maintaining and improving clapped-out 40-year-old rolling stock for another four or five years. Apart from the problems that that causes the constituents of Tory Members, it does not make financial sense in the long term.

Some better way must be found. I hope that the Minister will tell us that the Government will do something to provide the rolling stock that his hon. Friends demand. That rolling stock will bring relief to passengers, improve efficiency, relieve congestion and reduce maintenance costs. In the long term, not renewing rolling stock on north Kent lines will be far more expensive. It is expensive to patch up stock that ought to be in the railway equivalent of the knacker's yard.

I hope that the Minister has good news for his hon. Friends. They need it. After all, it is not just the railways and the commuters that depend on better rolling stock and services: it is the necks and the survival of many Conservative Members with Kent constituencies that depend on them. That is the reason behind this debate and it is why these Tory Members, who have so slavishly followed the Government for 13 years, now ask them to come to their rescue. I hope that the Minister will come to the rescue of the railways. It is too late to save his hon. Friends—but I am not too worried about that.

1.59 am

The Minister for Public Transport (Mr. Roger Freeman): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Medway (Dame P. Fenner) on initiating the debate and my hon. Friends the Members for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), for Gillingham (Mr. Couchman), for Thanet, North (Mr. Gale), for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) and for Faversham (Mr. Moate) on their contributions. They have felt strongly for some time about the north Kent line, but particularly during the past three to four months, which have seen a clear deterioration in the service provided. They have made their points forcefully at this extremely late hour, and I am sure that their constituents will note that they have taken the trouble to attend the debate and speak so forcefully in it.

On behalf of the Government, I acknowledge the problems on the north Kent line, particularly during the past few months, as does British Rail. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North for accompanying me on the 7.2 am service from Ramsgate to Cannon Street and the night before on the station platform at Herne Bay, when I talked to a number of commuters, which I found helpful. On the train, I was able to talk at some length and in some depth not only with commuters from Ramsgate but with those who joined the train at subsequent stations. My hon. Friends the Members for Canterbury (Mr. Brazier) and for Faversham also travelled with me.

My hon. Friend the member for Dartford summed the matter up accurately when he said that commuters want a reliable service. That is the most important thing. It must also be a quality service, and that is related to the age of the rolling stock. I use a station that is 90 miles from London, and the journey to London takes me one hour and five minutes. I suspect that Ramsgate is approximately 90 miles from London, but that service takes twice as long and it is a bumpy ride.

Before I make what I hope will be regarded as some positive statements, I should say that improvements are partly up to British Rail and they are partly a function of investment. British Rail has to make the best possible use of its resources. It has to control its costs and live within the external financing limits set by the Government. On behalf of the Secretary of State for Transport, I accept responsibility for setting that limit, but British Rail must make the most productive use of those assets.

I draw the attention of the House to a statement made by London Underground about two weeks ago on the launch of an imaginative plan to make effective use of its manpower by having fewer people but paying them more so that they provide a quality service.

I agree with my hon. Friends the Members for Medway, for Gillingham and for Faversham, particularly about information services. It surely must be elementary that prompt information is necessary not just for the people on the trains, but for the people waiting to depart and the relatives or friends waiting for trains to arrive. Such information must be prompt, audible, apologetic when that is appropriate, factual and honest.

It costs some money to put in a proper information system, but it does not cost tens or hundreds of millions of pounds. It is a simple management procedure, and we want British Rail to follow not only my hon. Friends' advice and guidance but mine.

Investment is clearly part of the solution. I am well aware of what is needed on the line in terms of the 471s. As my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North said, I went, together with his other hon. Friends to see the mock-up at Margate. It looks an attractive train.

I am also aware of the need for the Thameslink 2000 improvements in order to widen the throat of the main London termini, and allow more trains to get in at the peak. I support Sir Bob Reid's proposals for Thameslink 2000. They are important, and when resources permit, I am sure that those proposals will proceed, as they must.

The investment programme is large. My hon. Friend cited Sir Bob Reid's remarks this morning. The wrong impression may have been given about investment in channel tunnel services squeezing out Network SouthEast. For 1991-92—we are three quarters the way through that year—investment will be approximately £1,080 million. Channel tunnel investment will be £390 million; Network SouthEast, £290 million; and non-Network SouthEast outside London and the home counties, £400 million.

Investment in Network SouthEast this year will include £75 million on the new turbo trains on the Chiltern lines, and on Networkers for the Kent link lines. If one wants to deliver new rolling stock, one has to put the cash up front, and that totals £610 million. As my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford said, the first new coach will arrive in December, and I hope that he and others of my hon. Friends will join me in examining the new rolling stock when it is tested. It will enter service in the spring.

Much must depend on the manufacturers—BREL and GEC—delivering that new rolling stock on time. As to finance for future years—a reference was made to the £50 million investment in resignalling on the London to Tilbury and Southend line—that for resignalling in Kent will total £80 million.

Dame Peggy Fenner: If the manufacturers do not deliver on time, will there be a forfeit in the shape of a reduced payment?

Mr. Freeman: Yes, in certain circumstances. If production and delivery schedules are not met, British Rail would be right to withhold payment.

In the few minutes remaining, let me sound a slightly more positive note, to try to help my hon. Friends.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): They are desperate.

Mr. Freeman: As to the hon. Gentleman's sedentary comment, I would respond in the same constructive and helpful way whatever the debate, and whatever the line. I would address the issues on their merits—and that is what I am doing.

I want to make five points about the north Kent line. —[Hon. Members: "Oh."] I am taking this debate seriously, even at 2 o'clock in the morning. As to the 471 investment programme, British Rail must produce its corporate plan by 31 March 1992, and it must be consistent with the external financing limit settlement of £2 billion for 1992-93 that we announced.

That is an increase of £1 billion; it increases the public service obligation grant to £900 million this year, and it will probably be about £1 billion next year. I assure my hon. Friends that, by 31 March, we will clarify the ordering and delivery of the 471s. The House would not expect me to make a prediction tonight. British Rail must produce its plan for the next five years, consistent with the resources that we are making available.

In response to the request of my hon. Friend the Member for Thanet, North, I will ask British Rail tonight, in respect of Network SouthEast service, to review the new schedules for the north Kent lines for 1992. I appreciate that the service has reduced because of the Cannon Street works, and that there is a desire to stop trains at certain other stations in 1992, so that passengers who cannot currently avail themselves of that service will be able to do so. However, I will ask British Rail to take a fresh look at the service schedules for next year.

The service has obviously deteriorated over the last three months. I will ask British Rail to consider as an immediate gesture the provision of some form of compensation—probably by way of rail vouchers, which is the usual practice—to passengers who have suffered disruption over the past three or four months. That would be equitable, and I am sure that British Rail will consider responding promptly and fairly.

Fourthly, from 1 January, I shall be setting new performance standards for the Kent coastal services in 1992. If British Rail does not meet those standards, compensation will automatically be offered to season ticket holders. I shall not fix the percentage tonight, because the details have yet to be worked out. The system will give British Rail an incentive to provide a better service, and I think that passengers will consider it equitable. As we stated in the citizens charter document published in July, we intend to apply a similar system to all Network SouthEast lines to provide season ticket holders —who are locked into the service—with proper recompense. That will apply to annual, quarterly and monthly tickets.

Fifthly, there is the question of future fares increases. My hon. Friend the Member for Medway asked why we could not do something about the fares increases planned for 5 January. Those increases were set in early October, and I am afraid that adjusting them now is not a practical proposition: it would cause even greater confusion. I can tell my hon. Friend, however, that, had British Rail known then what would transpire in October, November and December, the fares increases proposed for that line would undoubtedly have been different. I give her this pledge: when fares increases are next set for Network SouthEast lines, the differential—particularly in regard to the service on the north Kent line—will take into account not only the service that is prospectively on offer, but the service that is being provided.

After Christmas, we shall be publishing a White Paper on British Rail privatisation. The hon. Member for West Bromwich, East (Mr. Snape) is wrong to believe that we are considering only the simplistic solution of selling off the Network SouthEast lines. He knows that that would not work. The lines are currently heavily subsidised, and a much more sophisticated solution is needed to bring in the private sector. We shall unveil our plans shortly.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: When he checks British Rail's forward programme, will my hon. Friend ensure that it includes the final tranche of 465 Networkers that is required for the north Kent line?

Mr. Freeman: I have already made it plain to the House several times that we must finish the Kent link line services —the inner Kent services—before we can turn to production of the 471s. It would be extremely expensive to truncate production of the 465s to insert the 471s, and then come back to finish the Kent link services. I give my hon. Friend that pledge: we will complete the production programme.

I hope that the British Rail privatisation White Paper will prove helpful. I should value my hon. Friends' comments on it; the House will undoubtedly debate it. Unlike the hon. Member for West Bromwich, East, we have positive proposals to improve the quality of service on Network SouthEast. The hon. Gentleman has no policy, no money and no hope.

Hazardous Waste

2.13 am

Mr. William Ross (Londonderry, East): The Minister for Public Transport said a moment ago that it was rather late. Debates such as these usually run all night; in my experience that does not do any harm, because it means that Ministers have to sit up late and answer for what has gone wrong over the years.

Although the subject that I wish to raise relates to my constituency, I believe that it has much wider implications for the rest of the United Kingdom. I am pleased to have the opportunity to raise the whole question of the disposal of toxic and hazardous wastes once again before the House rises for the Christmas recess. Such waste arises from many sources in the manufacture of materials in widespread use. Most of the materials are so useful that they simply cannot be discarded. I see little chance of any of them being replaced. We shall work with those materials for many years.

We also have the problem of waste that was created many years ago before people realised how dangerous it was. The injury to the health of persons who come into contact with such substances is not new. Those who used mercurous nitrate were not aware of its effects, and they were equally unaware that those effects would echo down through history in the phrase "mad as a hatter". I often wonder whether we should all have so cheerfully followed the holy grail of nuclear energy if those who made the decisions had known far earlier what we know about the subject nowadays.

People believe the scientists and then find out, only by a slow accretion of knowledge, that scientists can get it wrong, just as the ordinary individual can. That has fuelled much of the present doubt about the claims of science today.

I received an answer from the Department of the Environment on this side of the Irish sea in response to my request for a copy of the United Kingdom red list of dangerous compounds. It is an interesting list and one almost needs a degree in chemical engineering to understand it. One or two of the compounds are well known. The first is DDT. What a boon that insecticide was when it first appeared and what a concern its residues are to the whole world today.

I also found on the list aldrin and dieldrin. Like the rest of the agricultural world, I embraced those new discoveries when they first came out. They appeared to be the final answer to the problems of sheep dip, because they were powerful instruments against the diseases in sheep which we were fighting at that time and which we still have to learn about. Those compounds were also used for dealing with potato pests and God knows what else. Yet we now find those compounds on the red list. It is no wonder that people today cry caution whenever they are told that some new and wonderful product has appeared on the market.

I am principally concerned with the residues of the manufacture of man-made fibres and plastics. I am especially concerned about the proposal to build a plant to incinerate such residues and about the effect of the fallout from the plant on my constituents. However, there is a wider implication for the rest of the country. There is a world wide danger from such materials. The residues are long lived and cannot be recaptured once they are in the environment. Not all the effects are yet fully understood.

I have taken a keen interest in the proposal since it came to my notice a year or so ago. Whenever a light is placed outside one's own front door, one starts to wonder about the strength of the light and about its effects. An article in the September edition of Chemistry in Britain was brought to my attention. The article refers to PCBs—polychlorinated biphenyls—one of the materials about which I am concerned. The article says:

"Many of these higher chlorinated and mono-ortho-substituted PCBs produce toxic effects and have been reported to accumulate in human tissues. There are considerable species and sex differences, but the toxic effects include the loss of body weight, atrophy (wasting) of the thymus (an important organ in the development of the immune response) skin cell disorders, liver damage, decreased reproduction; diminished immune response".

It was also pointed out that previously the potentially toxic effects of PCBs on man were so little appreciated that they were seriously considered as a substitute for the gum component in chewing gum. That illustrates best just how easily mistakes about dangerous long-lived materials can be made. Heaven knows how many other such materials exist about which we are not worried yet.

According to the article to which I have referred, there is evidence that professional mixtures of PCBs can be carcinogenic and mutagenic when tested on laboratory animals. It is now well established that female rats are more responsive in tests than males.

One really needs a degree in chemical engineering to read the red list, let alone understand it. However, there is enough information in plain everyday English to worry the living daylights out of me. Another article in the same issue of Chemistry in Britain states:

"Environmental exposure to PCBs and eating PCB contaminated food can cause PCBs to accumulate in fatty tissues"— one of which, of course, is human breast milk.

"PCBs can be transferred from mothers to their young during lactation. This finding prompted us to do a small survey of the individual PCBs in samples of breast milk from 10 mothers living in the Reading area. The separation of the individual PCBs by capilliary gas chromatography and their measurement by electron capture detection enabled us to estimate a mean concentration in milk of approximately 1·2 μg total PCBs ml^{-1}, which is at least 20-fold greater than the concentration that can cause adverse effects in humans. Sixty individual PCBs were identified and—were highly chlorinated. Some of these PCBs are thought to promote carcinogenesis in laboratory animals."

That is surely enough to worry any mother or parent for the children and for succeeding generations because these things tumble down the line.

I read in another document:

"EPA has calculated that the tolerable daily intake of TCDD for humans is 0·006 picograms per kg body weight per day. This level would supposedly result in a one in 1 million chance of excess cancer from TCDD. But this level is far, far below the 1 to 3 picograms per kg body weight per day that people are estimated to be actually ingesting. Other nations, using different risk assessment models, have calculated the tolerable intake level much higher. Germany uses 1 picogram, the Netherlands 4, and Canada and the World Health Organisation use 10 picograms per kg body weight per day."

When we stop to consider the wide differences that exist in the information, it is clear that, if the scientists really understood the effects of these materials, they would long since have reached a common standard as to how much the human body can tolerate without serious adverse effects. The reality is that we do not know what we are dealing. The matter has not yet been sorted out that: must be cause for concern and for great caution.

We should be concerned not only with the present generation, but for generations ahead of us. It is clear that experiments have thrown up nasty results, and no doubt the Minister will follow that up.

My constituents are particularly concerned because they are down wind of the proposed incineration plant. I received a letter from the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham), written on 7 November. The letter was written on recycled paper, which gives us some hope for the future. It said:

"In broad terms, Northern Ireland has introduced the legislation required to implement the series of EC Directives."

Of course, they have been broadly implemented across the rest of the United Kingdom.

That letter went on:

"Most requirements of this Directive were introduced here by the Pollution Control and Local Government (NI) Order 1978. In Great Britain the Directive was implemented by the existing Control of Pollution Act 1974."

It was brought to my attention on 21 November that the European Court of Justice judged that EC Governments could be sued in their own courts for failing to implement certain EC directives. That judgment arose out of two Italian cases in which the employees were seeking to recover wages owing to them when the employers went bankrupt, leaving no assets from which the employees could recover their money. They subsequently sued the Italian Government for failing to implement a 1980 EC directive requiring member states to set up compensation funds for people in such circumstances.

One must consider the possible implications. If there are any mistakes in carrying EC directives into domestic law, the Government, rather than the individual, should get the shivers. It could leave them open to heavy compensation claims from their own nationals. Perhaps the social charter is not quite as dead as the Prime Minister thought at Maastricht. There could be ramifications through European avenues, and they could be very costly. Let us hope that the Government have got it right. It is a serious matter. I hope that we shall try to ensure that our people who come into contact with those substances and suffer injury are properly covered.

Another problem has arisen. I am sorry that the hon. Member for Bolsover (Mr. Skinner) is not present, because the problems arose in his constituency. Farmers found that some milk had been contaminated with dioxins. The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food stopped the sale of that milk—good for him—because of the danger to the individuals who might have drunk it. The farmers were left to sue the polluter. That is the answer that the hon. Member for Bolsover received from the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food.

Unfortunately, the Department of the Environment did not close the offending plant. I believe that it was the coalite plant in the area. That was not much help to the farmers. They were told by the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, "You can sue the polluter." Certainly, initially, they did not receive much help from the Department of the Environment or from the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food to identify the polluter.

I always remember the Hanrahan case in the Irish Republic. The farmer eventually won that case on a technicality. His entire milk herd had been wrecked. The case went on for years. It was a telling mark against how Governments deal with the problems that citizens come up against whenever they are injured by insidious, long-term, dangerous materials. It is not a light matter; it will continue to affect our constituents over the years unless we take action.

I now refer to the time that it takes for dangerous materials such as dioxins to go out of an incinerator chimney stack and into the human body. Some people think that it is a long time. However, in certain circumstances, it is a very short time.

I ask the House to consider a situation that I, as a farmer, can well understand. I do not know whether any one else present is a farmer. Let us suppose that, on a dull, quiet, overcast Friday evening, something goes wrong in the local incinerator. A dumpstack is used. When I first heard about dumpstacks, I thought that they were a sort of recycling system, but that is not the case. Whenever something goes wrong, it is dumped into the atmosphere and it flops down on to the grass over a 20-mile radius.

If the farmers' cows are out and eat the grass, they will convert it into milk. When the farmer drives them in in the morning, he milks them and that milk goes straight into the tank. Nobody will know that there is anything wrong with it. When the farmer brings in the cows in the evening, he milks them again. Still nobody knows that there is anything wrong with it. The tanker takes the milk to the dairy next morning and within 24 or, at most, 36 hours, everyone who has bought and drunk the milk has dioxins in their body—and there they stay. It is as quick and as dangerous as that.

There is no escape unless there is total honesty about the burning of the materials by the people operating the incinerators. I fear, however, that the polluters will often try to hide what has happened because the costs are colossal. In the scenario that I have described, the dioxin is on the herbage, the grass. I do not know about dioxins in the ground. I should like to be told whether, if there are dioxins and fluorants in the soil, the herbage that the cattle eat will absorb them and whether the pollutants can enter the human food chain by that path. We need a clear answer on that. There is far too much secrecy at present. The problem will not be solved without public debate and unless people think seriously about it.

Facts such as those that I have described give me grave concern about the burning of those materials. As a result of my investigations, I would be the first to acknowledge that burning such things at the recommended temperatures has, at first sight, a lot to recommend it and many advantages. It is quick and it is certainly much cheaper than any other system of cleaning up those things. But what happens if the temperature control goes wrong? If the temperature falls from the recommended 1,200 to 1,500 degrees, which is mighty hot, to 400 or 500 degrees, the result is not harmless materials.

Incidentally, no one is sure whether the resulting materials that go up the stack really are harmless. However, if the temperature falls, dioxins are created, and out they go into the atmosphere. One knows that they are out once they have left, but there is not much that one can do about it once they are away and in the atmosphere and environment—and they will drift a long way. Parts of my constituency are still suffering from the effects of the Chernobyl explosion, and nobody is happy about that.

Let us suppose that something goes wrong with the burning mechanism and pressures build up. The dumpstack is opened and the pollutants are dumped out into the atmosphere. I am not a technician, but it seems to me, as a fairly practical man, that whenever that happens, the materials bypass a large part of the process. They are probably not quenched and will therefore cool slowly, which is when the dioxins form. We could run into severe difficulties through using dumpstacks, which I understand are frequently used in the United States. This is not a matter to be treated lightly.

The Under-Secretary of State, the hon. Member for Wiltshire, North could not answer the long series of questions that I put to him last winter, spring and summer. The reason why the Minister could not answer was that Du Pont had not told him the outcome of the various experiments.

One of my questions was answered only yesterday. I asked what information the Minister had about

"pyrolysis experiments carried out by Du Pont on the waste to be incinerated at the proposed hazardous waste incinerator at Maydown, Londonderry to determine the products, at what temperatures these experiments were carried out; and what products resulted."

His answer was:

"The Goverment have no information on any such experiments."

I should have thought that, before the Government could give a reasoned answer on whether the thing should be built, they would need access to such information. Even at this stage, it is not too early to ask such questions. It is long overdue that the Northern Ireland Office should have the information.

I do not know the position of the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, the hon. Member for Banbury (Mr. Baldry), but I hope that Ministers at the Department of the Environment are better informed than their colleagues at the Northern Ireland Office. It might not be the fault of Ministers. Perhaps our legislation is not strong enough to extract the information from the firms involved. If it is not, we should introduce the necessary legislation. We need to know.

The Government do not seem to have addressed the point that I made on 10 July about what the position will be if, as some firms tell us, the amount of waste is reduced by 70 per cent. by the end of the century. If the amount of waste is reduced by 70 per cent., all the economics on which the present plans are based will go out of the window. They will simply no longer make sense. I wonder exactly what is going on. The fact that it does not add up to anyone causes me concern, and I must tell the Minister that it is a concern shared by many people in Northern Ireland.

I raised that very point on 10 July, and I did not get an answer then. I am not sure that I shall get an answer tonight, but I am putting down markers for the Government to tell them what they should examine. That has to be done. It is a serious matter. There is tremendous public anxiety in my constituency and an enormous number of objections. Hazardous waste is the one thing that unites north, south, east and west, Protestant, Roman Catholic, Sinn Fein and Democratic Unionist party in the area. I cannot think of anything that unites people so much. The farming community and the general public are involved. The latest groups to voice their anxiety are the Foyle anglers and Foyle Fisheries Commission, who are equally worried about the effect on fish in the Foyle.

Furthermore, at Northern Ireland Question Time today, the Minister seemed unfortunately to be closing the door on the vital suggestion, that the producers of the waste should not be in charge of incinerating it. Financial pressures will be put on management and workers at such a plant by the owners and those who produce the waste. Those who operate the plant will be forced to take short cuts.

In the press at the beginning of the week, I saw horrifying information which has recently surfaced about near misses in nuclear plants. They are enough to make one shiver. It worries me even more that the nuclear plants involved were the Savannah river plants in the United States, run by the very same firm, Du Pont. There were stories of melted rods and God knows what. It was terrifying. In some cases, the workers even ignored the red warning lights and signs until attention was drawn to them by other people.

The Government should not shut their eyes to the point that I make. I have been told—the Minister will correct me if I am wrong—that in Germany incinerators are part Government owned and part industry owned and operate on a non-profit making basis. Such a plant must be built in Northern Ireland. That is the way forward. I wish that such plants could be built in the rest of the United Kingdom, so that financial pressures are not exerted on workers in the plant by the folk who produce and burn the material.

If Du Pont is doing the environmental impact assessment for the plant, who will confirm that work? And what of the methodology used in the work? Many people will be interested to know the answers to those questions, for we believe that it must be checked and rechecked by independent people. It appears that, under EC rules, wastes of this type must be treated at the nearest facility. That reason alone leads one to believe that there will be one plant in Ireland for the whole island of Ireland.

Committee D of the British-Irish Inter-Parliamentary Body issued a report in November of this year. That made it clear that the Republic would build a plant. The proposals had been received and were under consideration, and the Du Pont plan then came into view, whereupon the Irish Republic rapidly said that it would shelve its proposal. It was shelved because of the discovery that the location of such a facility in Northern Ireland would be designed to serve the whole of Ireland. I was surprised that the Irish Republic, which was apparently so far ahead in relation to the Northern Ireland facility, was so willing to drop it. In other words, the Irish Republic thought it such a hot potato that it was willing quickly to get rid of it.

I tabled a parliamentary question on 18 November this year—it was answered on the 25th—asking the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland to "clarify the position regarding the proposal for a toxic-hazardous waste incinerator at Maydown, Londonderry, in the light of the recent statement by the Minister for the Environment in the Republic of Ireland that the Republic would have to construct a toxic waste incinerator in the near future."

The reply was:

"The Department of the Environment for Northern Ireland has not received a planning application for a toxic-hazardous waste incinerator at Maydown, Londonderry. A planning application for a major development involving a hazardous waste incinerator would not be determined without a public inquiry held under the terms of article 31 of the Planning (Northern Ireland) Order 1991".
—[Official Report, 25 November 1991; Vol. 199, c. 387.]

That did not clarify matters much, and that answer is indicative of the attitude that has been taken by the Northern Ireland Minister throughout this affair; he is sitting on the fence. Perhaps he has to sit on the fence. Even so, there are many answers outstanding, and I would like to have them.

It is clear from a reading of the report of Committee D to which I referred that the promoters of the Northern Ireland proposal

"have now completed their feasibility study and announced their intention to proceed with the environmental impact assessment of the project. A copy of the study has been made available to the Department of the Environment and is being examined."

It seems to me—unless there is something wrong with the language—that not only has the feasibility study been completed, but that the environmental impact assessment may also have been completed. May I be told? I appreciate that the Minister may not be able to tell me, but I hope that he will draw that, and the other matters that I have raised, to the attention of the Northern Ireland Office.

That Committee D report also refers to the importation from the Irish Republic of 15,000 tonnes of hazardous waste and 17 tonnes of toxic waste each year into the United Kingdom for incineration or treatment. That is a fair amount of stuff. Given that there was once a plant in Northern Ireland producing acetylene gas by a known method which produced waste that has now also been found to be not quite so harmless as it was once thought to be, there is a lot of other stuff lying about in dumps in Northern Ireland. I have seen the figure of 250,000 tonnes quoted. Whether or not that is correct, it seems that a lot of material requires to be treated.

While it may seem that much of what I have said applies only to Northern Ireland, I assure the House that that has not been my intention, for I believe that this issue has much wider implications.

Again, the Minister at the Northern Ireland Department of the Environment wrote to me last August. In that letter, he drew my attention to the fact that a survey had been carried out of dioxins and turons of soil samples in Northern Ireland and that the results suggested that those levels were generally comparable with those found in England and Wales. He then went on to talk about the fact that there would be rigorous monitoring by the alkali and radiochemical inspectorate.

I would like to know if the results of the those surveys are available to the general public, or to me in the House. Are the reports of the monitoring mentioned also available? I would certainly like to have a look at them, and so would some of my researchers, to see exactly what is coming out. I would also like to know the methodology that is used so that we can be assured that it is being properly done.

The hon. Gentleman has always indicated that the COSHH regulations, that came into force on 11 July just a fortnight before that letter was written, would be relevant to the emission of substances which might affect persons on the site. It is my understanding that the COSHH regulations cover far more than persons on the site; they cover persons outside the site who have no tie-in with it at all. The Minister is indicating here that they apply only to persons who have a right to be on the site. I do not believe that that is so and I would like the Minister to comment on that.

I would also like to know whether the Northern Ireland Minister has reached final conclusions with regard to the Environment Agency for England and Wales, because he said that that would have an effect on his thinking.

Let us look for a moment at the pressures on chemical companies at the present time. They are very great indeed. I feel sure that the Minister will have had drawn to his attention the two articles in the Financial Times yesterday, which are quite interesting. One indicates that there is now over-capacity, that chemical groups are faced with increasing environmental expenditure and that in this country environmental spending is running at 20 per cent. to 25 per cent. of all capital investment, which is a very heavy burden.

In the second article, attention is drawn to the spending on environmental measures and the fact that Europe is estimated to be five years behind the United States in the implementation of these measures. It draws attention to the heavy fiscal instruments to discourage emissions in some countries. It draws attention to the cost in Germany and to the amount that environmental protection measures will cost the whole chemical sector in the United States and in this country over the next few years.

That is not the end, of course. There is also the fact that some companies in the United States have been fined very heavily for illegal disposal of wastes. I read in one publication that the EPA is proposing to fine three New York companies—CWM Chemical Services, General Motors Central Foundry and CECUS International—$35·4 million for violating the Toxic Substance Control Act and illegally disposing of 50,000 tons of sludge contaminated with polychlorinated biphenyls. The penalties proposed are $14·2 million against General Motors, $7 million against CWM Chemical Services and $14 million against CECUS International. That is a sign of how seriously these matters are now being treated in the United States. I think that it is only a matter of time before similar penalties are imposed on such companies worldwide.

The position is serious not only for the general public but for the chemical companies. We need these materials. Nobody will stop using plastics and they will still be made. It is better that they be made in the west where we might be able to exercise some control over them, rather than have them hidden away in a third-world jungle where some of the local people are getting a good backhander and no one knows what is pouring out of the chimneys. We have to keep them in the civilised world. Therefore, we need to be careful about how we handle them.

The incinerator that is to be built at Du Pont is to cost between £40 million and £50 million. If the amounts in use by the end of the century diminish by 70 per cent., the plant will be a dinosaur because it will not be needed. It may well be completely out of date before it is built. Is the money being spent wisely?

The Chemical Recovery Association took an interest in some of the questions which I asked earlier in the year. In a letter to me in July, the chairman pointed out that its member companies "recover an average 450,000 tonnes per annum of contaminated oils and chemicals, a quantity of which is received from Ulster and Ireland.

I was somewhat aggrieved by Mr. Needham's statement that 'the nature of hazardous and toxic is such that recycling is not an option'. We like to think recycling is the second option after waste minimisation and that advice should be sought from the industry before the final option is undertaken."

[Mr. William Ross]

I hope that the Minister will note that advice and consult the association about what might be done.

We have to be more radical than that. As a country we should try to seize the initiative by seeking safe alternatives. Apparently this is not new chemical engineering; it is the oldest chemistry. As I said in July, if the chemists can find a way of zipping the materials together, there must be a way of taking them apart. I understand that it is possible to break them down into their harmless constituent parts of carbon dioxide, which may not be all that harmless, and common salt, but that it is difficult to do so.

If the plant is built in Northern Ireland, it will be a national plant because materials will be moved backwards and forwards; certainly it will be an international plant because it will burn material from the Irish Republic. Perhaps we should consider whether it is wise to spend not just Du Pont's money but much of our taxpayers' money on it, because the taxpayer will fund half of the expenditure.

Will the Government consider seriously setting up, preferably in the university at Coleraine, a pollution technology unit, financed properly with the help of the Dublin authorities, Du Pont and other chemical companies, to try to find a chemical means of reducing the wastes to their harmless base components? If it can be done on a small scale, albeit at great cost, surely it could be done on a larger scale. If the amount of money was poured into it that must have spent on sticking the blasted things together in the first place to get the polymers, surely we could find a way of taking them apart thereby rendering the whole process of incineration obsolete and creating a new industry in which we would be a world leader.

The problem will not go away. It concerns every human being not only in this country but on the whole earth. There have been too many accidents in the past and no doubt there are more in the pipeline. We should break out of the cycle of looking for the cheap, quick, easy way of disposal and try to find a real alternative which will do the job properly by getting rid of the waste once and for all in a way which does not cause hazard to the general public or to the environment in which we all have to live.

2.54 am

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): I thank the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) for taking us in some detail through the problems that he and many experts see in dealing with toxic and hazardous waste.

Naturally, the hon. Gentleman is particularly concerned about an incinerator that may be built in his constituency. He pointed out that, when new products come on the market, they are often treated as great blessings, and it is only after a great deal of experience and use that we learn of their dangers and downsides. It is essential, therefore, that we proceed with great caution when handling toxic and hazardous waste.

The hon. Gentleman also mentioned the environmental impact assessment. I expect that the Minister can reassure him that an environmental impact assessment cannot have been made properly for that incinerator yet, because an application does not yet appear to have been made. When an application is made, the incinerator will face a mandatory environmental impact assessment under the relevant EC directive. In addition to a highly technical assessment document, there is a duty to produce a summary that the public can read.

Some of the important matters that the hon. Gentleman raises have been the concern of several Select Committees. In 1988-89, the second report of the Environment Select Committee was on toxic and hazardous waste. It was a savage indictment of both local and central Government for not taking their responsibilities seriously.

At this time in the morning, I shall not go into the details of the report but will simply say that the Committee was shocked by what it found. It discovered that local government was rather lax and did not appreciate the problems of dealing with toxic and hazardous waste, and central Government were equally lax in ensuring that local government enforced laws under the Control of Pollution Act 1974. We are now more aware of those problems, and there are possibilities under the Environmental Protection Act 1990—some of which are already being followed and others which have yet to be taken up—to deal with past laxity.

In addition to the general comments and proposals that the Environment Select Committee made about tightening up the approach to dealing with toxic and hazardous waste, it said that an environmental protection agency should be set up. The Government have belatedly agreed to do just that, and are currently in a consultation period on the matter.

The Welsh Affairs Select Committee considered toxic waste disposal in Wales. Apart from the general problems that relate to the haphazard disposal of such waste, particularly into landfill sites where little effort is made to seal them off, in the United Kingdom as a whole the land around a third of the 100 sites studied by the Department of the Environment was contaminated.

The Select Committee on Welsh Affairs came across a similar problem in Wales, where, in addition to the general land contamination report—most of the toxic waste has been disposed of to land—a study was also made of incineration. The infamous Rechem plant is located near Pontypool in Wales and there has been widespread concern at its operation. The Welsh Office responded positively to the Select Committee report, and an expert group is currently considering possible contamination dangers to which the public, the land, the cattle and livestock around that plant may be exposed. The result of those studies might have an impact on future incineration policy.

There is also widespread concern in many other districts. Only a week or so ago, most, if not all, hon. Members received a Community Action Against Toxic Waste appeal from Walsall in the west midlands. At Birch coppice, a firm which I think calls itself Leigh Environmental operates some large toxic and hazardous waste sites. What is worse, beneath the landfill sites there were old mining workings. It is estimated that Leigh Environmental deposited 400 million gallons of toxic liquids into the old workings. I believe that, as the law currently stands, Leigh Environmental could surrender its site licences at Birch coppice and Stubbers green, and the residents could be forced to live with the devastation for many years.

Will the Minister say this evening whether the Government intend to implement, if not immediately, at least in the very near future, those sections of part II of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 that prevent the surrender of a disposal licence until a certificate of completion has been issued by the relevant authority?

By coincidence, the British Medical Association was represented in the House this week to report on its study of hazardous waste in the west midlands in the very same district of Walsall to which I referred. It said that its study had not discovered any conclusive evidence on the damage done to humans by low-level exposure, but it stated that the lack of information and knowledge of the effects of exposure to low doses of the chemicals over a long period had led the working party to adopt the precautionary principle that absence of evidence was not evidence of absence.

The report stated that a study had been made of an incinerator at Bonnybridge in Scotland that suggested an increased level of twinning in cattle, and possibly in humans, that may have been linked with the emission of PCHs and other substances from the plant.

The British Medical Association was sufficiently concerned about that evidence, and other evidence from the United States which showed that PCBs and other toxic and hazardous waste should be treated very seriously, to propose a national waste agency, because it claims that, at present, there is no central guidance and little consensus on the best form of industrial waste disposal, 90 per cent. of which is contracted out to the private sector. The BMA believes that there is an urgent need for a central waste policy to give guidance on the safest form of disposal. It also believes strongly that there should be a ban on the import of hazardous waste into the United Kingdom.

In the report of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs, the BMA quoted figures from 1981-88. Those figures showed how the import of what is called "special" wastes —toxic and hazardous waste—had gone up. In 1981-82, 3,800 tonnes were imported, and by 1987-88 we were importing 80,000 tonnes, thereby almost becoming one of the major toxic dustbins of the world. However, I believe —perhaps the Minister will confirm this—that, in the last year for which we have the figures, the import of such waste has gone down to 44,000 tonnes, although that is still 10 times higher than in 1981-82.

The Labour party believes that there are a number of essential approaches to toxic and hazardous waste. The hon. Member for Londonderry, East quoted the experts waste recovery association and said that the first priority should be waste minimisation. We should reduce the amount of hazardous waste that is produced when making products—often useful products—for the market. It is possible, and companies are doing it. If hazardous materials are left after minimisation, there are possibilities for recycling. After recycling, we must find the safest way in which to dispose of the waste.

The first step is to ensure that the waste is disposed of as close to its source as possible. If it is transported over long distances, it can be dangerous. There have been accidents during transportation, which have caused serious pollution. We should also end the commercial trade in waste, except in exceptional circumstances—for example, if there has been a crisis and there is a need for waste to be disposed of somewhere else. By and large, however, we should try to ensure that waste is dealt with as close as possible to its source. We do not believe that the United Kingdom should import any toxic and hazardous waste.

In the longt term, Labour would look to a steep reduction in toxic waste and to the elimination of some of the most dangerous types of waste. It is clear that, as the world becomes wealthier and other countries start to want the things that we want, there is a danger that we shall produce more and more waste. That means that the technologies of waste minimisation and alternative means of disposal are very important.

Towards the end of his speech, the hon. Member for Londonderry, East mentioned the possibility of neutralising toxic waste. Before the products were brought together, they were not necessarily dangerous.

It just so happens that, before I came to this debate this morning, I was flicking through a pile of press cuttings when I came across one from The Journal (Newcastle upon Tyne), a north-eastern regional newspaper. What caught my eye was the headline: "Speedy Toxic Waste Eater". The story is about a new chemical process which eats toxic waste. ICI has developed it at Billingham, and it will eliminate the need to dump waste from the manufacture of perspex into the River Tees and the North sea—one year ahead of schedule, too.

The project was supported with £300,000 of grant from the EC Commission. ICI has found a successful way of dealing with this waste without causing any harm to the public in the form of emissions from incineration, so perhaps there is good news to come. Perhaps the incinerator will not go ahead as planned in Londonderry, East. The Minister, who has access to more information than I have and who is ably supported by his civil servants, may be able to give us more news on that front this morning.

2.5 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. Tony Baldry): The treatment and disposal of hazardous waste in the United Kingdom is an important subject, and the whole House must be grateful to the hon. Member for Londonderry, East (Mr. Ross) for raising it this evening. He and the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) have made some interesting points and useful contributions on the matter.

We must put this important subject in its proper context. There are not enormous amounts of hazardous waste either arising here or coming here from elsewhere to be disposed of in an uncontrolled manner. Since the introduction of the Control of Pollution Act 1974, this country has had a system of strategic planning and site licensing for waste management. The Act set controls in advance of much of Europe's, which were reflected in the Community's own waste management framework directive in 1975. More recently, we have amended the legislation in the Environmental Protection Act 1990, which again places us in the vanguard of Europe, with additional provisions for integrated pollution control for those industrial processes with the most potential for pollution, and for a duty of care for all producers and handlers of waste.

It is estimated that about 80 million tonnes of industrial waste arise each year in the United Kingdom, all of which is dealt with in this country. About 2 million tonnes of that is hazardous wastes. Under the Control of Pollution

[Mr. Tony Baldry]

(Special Wastes) Regulations 1980, movements of defined categories of difficult wastes in the United Kingdom are subject to at least three working days notification to local waste disposal authorities. This system is designed to provide local authorities with opportunities to satisfy themselves that the planned disposal will be satisfactory, but with the delays to industrial operations kept to a reasonable minimum.

The Governments' primary aim is to see significant reductions in the amounts of waste requiring disposal. We are doing all we can to encourage waste minimisation. Indeed, this is built into the statutory requirements for consideration in the issue of IPC authorisations. Under these controls, what emissions are then unavoidable have to be rendered harmless. We therefore have cleaner technology as a main aim, and we see growing recognition by industry of the value of this for its economic well-being and international competitiveness.

Next come our policies for encouraging waste recycling. This requires a comprehensive programme for the development of suitable collection systems and to ensure the creation of reliable and economically valid markets.

However, even with complete success in encouraging waste minimisation and recycling, society will still have a number of wastes to handle. It has to be appreciated that, in a complex industrialised society such as ours, some wastes are unavoidable. We want to see such wastes dealt with to the highest possible standards in ways that are consistent with industrial economics. For any hazardous wastes, that means pre-treatment where necessary.

Industrial waste incinerators of significant size have, in the past, been subject to control by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution, acting under air pollution control legislation, with plant being required to adopt the best practical means for dealing with the materials coming into the sites. But those incinerators are now regulated under integrated pollution control procedures, and HMIP authorisations will be based upon guidelines reflecting the best available technology not entailing excessive costs.

Incineration is the most appropriate disposal method for many wastes which can be rendered harmless only by breaking them down through the controlled use of heat. The methods used and the pollution control systems fitted are sophisticated and provide a safe and sound disposal option, subject to rigorous operational controls and inspection.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East has raised the specific problems of hazardous waste disposal in Northern Ireland, with specific reference to proposals for an incinerator at Maydown in Londonderry.

There are currently two Northern Ireland public sector landfills suitable for the disposal of certain special wastes —Dargan road, Belfast and Culmore, Londonderry. I understand that currently about 9,000 tonnes of those wastes are dealt with annually at those sites. They consist of asbestos, vanadium grit, acids and alkalis, pharmaceutical wastes, miscellaneous chemicals and treated sludges.

However, some wastes arise in Northern Ireland which cannot be dealt with by landfill. There are three chemical treatment plants in the Province, one of which is for in-house wastes only; so wastes required to be disposed of by high-temperature incineration have to be sent to disposal facilities outside the Province.

Approximately 1,600 tonnes of those wastes are transported from Northern Ireland each year. Until this year, some of that waste went to Finland and the remainder to facilites elsewhere in the United Kingdom. But there will be no renewal of contracts with the Finnish installation beyond this year, and all such waste will now go to United Kingdom facilities. We expect that to continue as long as necessary.

In Northern Ireland, special wastes are subject to the Pollution Control (Special Waste) Regulations (Northern Ireland) 1981, which impose the same requirements as in Britain regarding pre-notification of movement of waste to suitable licensed disposal facilities.

The hon. Gentleman has referred to studies by Du Pont (UK) Ltd regarding a possible hazardous waste incinerator. I understand that the company has now completed a feasibility study on such an installation and is considering the appointment of consultants to prepare an environmental impact analysis, including consideration of alternative technology. Those are essential steps in considering any such proposal.

As the hon. Gentleman made clear, the Under-Secretary of State for Northern Ireland, my hon. Friend, the Member for Wiltshire, North (Mr. Needham), has already announced that any formal proposal from Du Pont would be put before a public inquiry. As the hon. Member for Bridgend said, that would enable those with concerns, including the constituents of the hon. Member for Londonderry, East, to have them aired, investigated and adjudicated upon.

As the hon. Member for Londonderry, East has recognised, one of the constraints on private sector investment in high-temperature incineration in the Province must be the relatively small volume of such waste which may not be sufficient to warrant large-scale investment. A guaranteed baseload tonnage is required for most waste treatment plants to make operations viable.

For that reason, there is a need to consider application of the European Community's proximity principle to the use of facilities by neighbouring countries. That principle is designed to encourage waste to be disposed of at the nearest available facility. We should look closely at its appropriateness to the possible situation with regard to an incinerator proposal in Northern Ireland.

The hon. Member also asked about alternative technology instead of incineration. He referred specifically to a technique developed by the Massachusetts Institute of Technology for rendering wastes into harmless salts, which I understand is in its infancy. Apparently, the institute is considering building a pilot plant, but little is known about its proposals, and clearly we are a long way from that becoming a viable alternative to present-day technology.

Pyrolysis—the imposition of high temperatures upon material in the absence of oxygen—is often presented as an alternative to incineration. That technique has been considered by many interested in waste management, because it achieves considerably higher volumes of reduction than incineration, and seems to offer good prospects for even better pollution control standards.

However, it represents a number of practical operating difficulties, mainly because the process converts material rather than destroys it. That is particularly relevant when one is considering a diverse range of hazardous wastes.

Nevertheless, as I said earlier, Du Pont proposes to ask consultants to examine alternative technology in the impact analysis of the incinerator proposal.

The hon. Member for Londonderry, East asked about emissions from the chemical incinerator at the Coalite works. I dealt with that matter in an oral answer on 6 November.

I am confident that Government policies provide, and will continue to provide, an appropriate basis for meeting the high expectations that society has for the future. We want waste management to play its part in the drive for sustainable development, with a high standard of environmental stewardship in the interests of future generations. That will not be easy, and there will always be areas of difficulty—some of which were usefully debated tonight.

Of course I appreciate the concerns expressed by the hon. Member for Londonderry, East on behalf of his constituents. I am certain that we are developing the correct framework for tackling important issues, and that we will be able to accommodate developments in new technology as they become available.

Croatia

3.21 am

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): No one who contemplates the brutal war that has racked Croatia over the last few months can do so without a deep feeling of sorrow and shame: sorrow that such devastation and misery should disfigure our continent in 1991, and shame that we have been unable to do anything to halt the carnage and destruction.

It is not that the west has failed to make an attempt to do so, and I pay genuine tribute to the work done by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs and by my hon. and learned Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, who is to reply to this debate, and to the tireless efforts of Lord Carrington and, more recently, Mr. Cyrus Vance.

However, when no real progess is made, the time comes for reassessment, and it seems to me that that time is now. Like many right hon. and hon. Members in all parts of the House, I followed with a mixture of admiration and exasperation Lord Carrington's attempts to negotiate a proper ceasefire, but watched with mounting anger the callous disregard for life and property cynically displayed by the federal forces.

For me, the moment of realisation that something more must be done to identify the aggressor and to hold him to account came last week, when I was invited to open an exhibition of photographs at the building centre in Store street, London, of some of the Croatian buildings destroyed over the past few months. Some were great and glorious, some were humble and small—but together their destruction represents an awful catalogue of misery. Those photographs brought home to me the abomination of desolation that is Croatia now.

In the Croatian conflict, as in any other, there is a background of distributed bitterness. I am well aware of the atrocities that some Croatians perpetrated during the second world war, and of the tensions between Serb and Croat that go back long before that, which left a legacy of hatred and fear. No one would ever suggest that President Tudjman should be awarded a Nobel prize for the tact and sensitivity with which he asserted Croatian independence.

I know, too, that, even during these last months of conflict, acts of unjustified violence have been committed by Croats against Serbs. Only today I received a letter from Prince Tomislav of Yugoslavia listing the Orthodox churches that had been destroyed by Croats. No one can defend such actions.

If we recognise that background, however, we must also recognise the reality, and the enormity, of what has happended in Croatia—and recognise that the great majority of acts of wanton wickedness have been perpetrated by the forces of a state that has, by all normal criteria, forfeited its right to be recognised as a sovereign independent nation. Let me suggest to my hon. and learned Friend the Minister that perhaps the time has come to stop acting as an honest broker between victim and aggressor. The evidence of responsibility for the carnage and destruction is too overwhelming to be ignored.

Many hon. Members will have received, in the past few days, a report from Amnesty International giving details of some of the atrocities that have occurred in Croatia in recent months. I commend that report to all hon. Members: it is a terrible indictment of the impotence of the federal Government and their inability to control their army. It is a horrifying catalogue of crime and of utter disregard for the Geneva convention.

In September, Unesco's Director General appealed for respect for Yugoslavia's cultural heritage. He said:

"the cities of Split and Dubrovnik are on the World Heritage List and are protected under the World Heritage Convention".

He also pointed out that Yugoslavia was a party to the convention on the protection of cultural property in the event of armed conflict, signed at The Hague in 1954.

That declaration was issued on 27 September; by the end of October, a document was coming out of Croatia from the Ministry of Education and Culture. I have a translation. It says that, in that short space of time, 317 historic settlements had been affected, 241 heavily or lightly, while 76 had been destroyed or burned down; 358 individual monuments registered or filed as cultural treasures, including 26 museums, seven archives and 13 library buildings, had been damaged. We have all seen, with a sense of sickening horror, the graphic television pictures of the shelling of Dubrovnik, and we all saw the appalling scene of devastation when Vukovar fell. I could go on, but I think that I can make my points simply and graphically by quoting from the documents that I have with me.

I am sure that my hon. and learned Friend the Minister and the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) share my sense of horror and outrage. I urge my hon. Friend to ensure that those feelings are translated into a more positive western attitude. Maastricht is now over; let this be a test of the new Europe's resolve. It is an important test, for impotence will not only be a poor recommendation of Community cohesion; it could make it all the more difficult to stem the tide of bloody anarchy that could so easily engulf large tracts of Europe which we recently rejoiced to see set free.

I know that there are no easy answers, but if we do not at least attempt to act decisively, Zagreb, Dubrovnik, Vukovar and Osijek could be just the first names on a ghastly roll call resembling those unending, poignant first world war memorials that are such a feature of life all over the continent of Europe.

I hope that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will seize the opportunity provided by his next meeting with his Community colleagues—which I believe will take place very shortly—to reappraise the position, and to see whether the Governments of the Community could now decide to recognise Croatia and to tell the Yugoslavian federal Government that they can no longer be recognised as the legitimate Government of former federal territory.

Everyone says—my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has made the point several times—that Yugoslavia as we knew it is no more. Whether that is to be lamented or not, it is a fact. The federal Government do not exercise proper control. We in the west should be prepared to act in concert to impose sanctions, and to patrol the coast and the skies while a full conference to determine the relationship between the former Yugoslav territories is convened.

It is important that the rights of all minorities within all the territories should be high on the agenda at the conference. One knows of the concern of the 11·5 per cent. Serbian minority within Croatia, but that is no excuse for what has happened and continues to happen. It is a terrible indictment of 1991 to think that such events could happen today in Europe.

Any course of action such as I have suggested is fraught with difficulty, and everyone must recognise that. However, it is as nothing compared with the difficulties that we shall face if the generals, who have effectively staged a coup against civil authority, are allowed ultimate success. In August, the world rejoiced when the communist old guard failed in the attempted coup in Moscow. Too few people seem to have realised that the communist old guard has succeeded in a coup in Belgrade.

There was an interesting article in The Sunday Telegraph on 1 December by Mr. Ambrose Evans-Pritchard, in which he speaks about the devastation in Vukovar and what has been happening in Croatia. He ends the article with the words:

"The officer corps of the army is the last relic of the Tito era, divided against itelf, scared of the future, without loyal troops, without strategy, without a creed that anybody, even itself, can still believe in. It is fighting to preserve its privileges and its pensions. When it meets real resistance the army will recoil and break."

I do not know whether it will break as easily as that. Certainly it is an army that has run amok. We must recognise that and we must recognise where the aggression lies.

When he answered questions in the House on 20 November, my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary showed an understandable reluctance to move towards recognition of Croatia. He made the point that that could lead to yet greater troubles in Bosnia and in Macedonia. What would guarantee such trouble is allowing the federal army to succeed in extinguishing an entire small nation state with the brutality with which it has already destroyed so much.

I hope that a message will go out from my hon. and learned Friend the Minister when he replies for the Government. This is the first time that we have debated the subject in the House, which is a pity. I hope that a message can go out that there is a new resolve in the west and that we are determined to ensure that the killing, the destruction and the brutality stop, and that, as a new year dawns in a few days' time, it dawns with a new sense of hope for the battered, beleaguered people of Croatia.

3.34 am

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): I naturally commend the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) on his choice of subject for debate. It is a valid subject, and the hon. Gentleman is not to blame for the procedures that the House has foisted upon itself. Having spent 13 years in this place, I still find it truly remarkable that, with regard to such important issues—Croatia is receiving perhaps its first real airing in the House since the tragedy began to unfold—we are having this debate at 3.35 am. The House should not be proud of that, and I sincerely hope that this will be the last all-night Consolidated Fund debate that we will have to put up with.

What the hon. Member for Staffordshire, South said about the tragedy unfolding before us is right. It is shocking and horrible, and it requires a sense of irony almost to reflect on the fact that this is 1991—towards the end of the 20th century. However, on our continent, on the doorstep of the most civilised part of the world, we are watching human beings killing each other for no other reason than the fact that they live next door to each other.

The waste, deaths, brutality and destruction of property beggar description. All that is happening in a beautiful country which has been the holiday destination of thousands of British people over the years. Many people who have spent their holidays in that country, as I have, shake their heads in disbelief as they watch what is happening.

I spent a family holiday in Dubrovnik last summer. One of my memories of my holiday in that beautiful city in the Aegean is of attending a football match with my brother and our children. The match involved Dubrovnik and a team from Belgrade. Only 15 months later, the participants in that match, which, it must be said, was not full of passion, are now presumably heavily engaged in destroying each other simply because they come from two sides of a divide that dates back to the tragedies, miseries and horrors of the second world war, back to the first world war and into the deep recesses of history before that time.

The point at issue is that what is happening is not only a tragedy of today but a portent of tomorrow. We are witnessing in Yugoslavia what happens when the cap of communism is lifted to reveal the suppressed anger that is contained. That may happen in other countries where the same situation applies. Because we are outraged by the conflict in Yugoslavia today, we should be ready for similar things to happen elsewhere in Europe unless we ensure that we set in place institutions to prevent them.

Despite having visited the country and despite a long interest in the area, even I was not fully aware of the complexities and the depth of feeling in the various component parts of Yugoslavia until I read the quite remarkable book that Chris Cviic wrote for the Royal Institute of International Affairs only a few months ago. Despite the fact that modern history grows old within a week, I commend that book to people who want to understand what is happening in that part of the world. The replaying of historical conflict, brought to our own living room firesides by the miracles of modern technology and displaying the brutality of past years, does not reflect well on our development in Europe.

The hon. Member for Staffordshire, South commented on the differences of view about who is to blame. There are strong feelings on both sides, as my postbag bears witness. It is now becoming clear even to those of a partisan view that the culpability of the federal army, which is no longer responsive to any of the organs of the previous state, must bear a heavy responsibility for what is happening.

I do not want to detain the House or myself for long, but I pay tribute to the role of the European Community and to the monitors who have served with considerable bravery and tenacity during the conflict. Their presence has done much to inhibit some of the wilder excesses on both sides. Their courage in entering into the conflict and their presence of mind in circumstances in which they have been in enormous danger are a great tribute to the individuals themselves and to the institution that sent them.

We must pay tribute also to the United Nations, which has been revitalised over the past 12 months and has started to play its part in trying to unravel and resolve the problems in Yugoslavia. The Security Council took on board some of the challenges. Mr. Cyrus Vance, who stepped into the breach, has made herculean efforts to establish a peace so that, eventually, a peacekeeping force might move into place. Of course, the United Nations has been engaged in the exercise of sanctions against those who perpetrate excesses.

There are some who say that we should involve peacekeeping forces right away. However, we in this country know more than most that, unless there is a peace to keep, putting in peacekeeping forces simply places troops in danger. There are some who say that we should immediately recognise Croatia and Slovenia because they have passed a test in respect of self-standing and self-sustenance. Of course, despite claims about elections —I recently met President Tudjman and Mr. Peterle, the Prime Minister of Slovenia—enormous questions have to be answered.

What borders would we recognise? Would they be pre-conflict borders, the borders on the map, Yugoslav internal federal borders, or the borders that exist after the conflict and the damage that took place during the capture of towns such as Osijek and Vukovar? What would be the implications for the other republics of Yugoslavia, or what used to be Yugoslavia? What of the future of Bosnia, in particular, where there is a very complicated cocktail of ethnic mixes? The problem cannot be solved by the recognition of any number of states.

There are some, including the former Prime Minister, the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), who say, "Arm one side." She said that we should send arms to the Croatians. Nobody who is sensible or sane would say that we should export more arms to a country that is already awash with them, because it would do little more than increase the bloodshed that has already stained that country. There are those who even dare to say that we should intervene militarily and hope that some form of peace will come about as a result. With conflict going on inside our own borders, we cannot help the world in advising that course of action.

Yesterday, the EC observers in the conflict areas of Yugoslavia made it clear that they were not in favour of rapid diplomatic recognition of Croatia, which they say would wreck the prospects for negotiating a settlement of the war and increase the chance of hostilities spreading to other parts of the collapsed federation. We would be wise to listen to those on the spot who have experience, because they are close to what is going on. The spokeswoman for the mission said:

"Recognition not tied in to the negotiating process is not a sensible thing right now."

Rinelde Steeghs said that that move

"would so infuriate Serbia and the Yugoslav army as to spell an end to the EC peace conference chaired by Lord Carrington."

This House and the wider world should listen to that view.

In conclusion, I make this plea to countries such as Germany—a country for which I have the highest regard: they should be cautious about promising recognition for Croatia and Slovenia by any precise date, and about breaking ranks within the European Community. A decision on the recognition of any of the republics may be on the agenda, but that decision should be made collectively and advisedly. I hope that Germany, which has stood firmly in favour of a common foreign and security policy in the intergovernmental conferences that have just concluded and in the discussions on this week's Maastricht treaty, will listen to its own exhortations and ensure that, whenever the decision is taken on recognition, it is made collectively, not unilaterally.

This is a horrifying conflict on our own doorstep. In many ways, it is a sad illustration of how little we have learnt from the past, despite the long history of our continent. We must draw careful lessons from it—about the necessity for collective action and for creating new institutions in Europe to deal with the new conflicts that may spring up in our continent. It is a sad warning, and we would be wise to recognise it as such.

3.47 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): The hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) has expressed his distaste for these early-morning debates. I share that view. We are discussing a matter of considerable importance—it is difficult to think of a matter of greater importance at the moment in central Europe—yet my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South (Mr. Cormack) has been obliged to raise it at an hour that is inappropriate to a matter of such gravity. My hon. Friend deserves our congratulations and thanks for having raised it, but the systems and procedures of the House should not have obliged him to do so at this time—or obliged us to be here at 3.47 am to deal with a matter of such moment. Like the hon. Member for Hamilton, I wish that we would put an end to such proceedings. They do the House no good whatsoever.

My hon. Friend has spoken with a concision and lucidity that does him credit. I am bound to say that I am not in total agreement with what he has said, but nobody could have put his points more clearly or concisely. I for one am extremely grateful to him. In his preliminary remarks, he said that he approached this issue with a sense of both sorrow and shame. I entirely agree with him about a sense of sorrow—this is indeed a tragedy—but I do not agree with his sense of shame. I am a great one for pinning blame where it can properly be pinned, and I do not believe in collective guilt. The fault lies with those who are guilty of the violence. It is not our fault that we cannot persuade them to stop. We should not be ashamed of our inability to persuade them to stop, for the fault is theirs and we have tried hard.

My hon. Friend spoke about where the blame lies between the combatant parties. I agree with his analysis. He correctly said that the Croatians and those who say that they are fighting on the Croatian side have been guilty of various acts of atrocity and provocation. Both those statements are correct. On occasion, the Croatians have been guilty of breaches of the ceasefire. But having said that, if we are to express a view about where the fault primarily lies, I share the view of my hon. Friend that it is with the JNA and Serbian forces.

None the less, there is fault on both sides. Perhaps it is right to say in parenthesis that genuine concern about their future is felt by Serbs in Croatia. President Tudjman was not sufficiently sensitive to those fears at an early enough stage. Certainly he did not address them in a properly positive way.

My hon. Friend began the substantive part of his speech by calling for more positive action on the part of the European Community and, indeed, others. It is right that I should remind the House of some of the positive steps that the European Community has taken. It has deployed the monitors. The hon. Member for Hamilton spoke of the courage and determination shown by the monitors now operating within what was Yugoslavia. I agree with him. The monitors have been courageous and determined, and have made a considerable contribution to the maintenance of peace in some areas within Yugoslavia.

Secondly, as my hon. Friend will have in mind, we took several measures in November designed to put express pressure on those who are in breach of the ceasefire and those who are refraining from making an effective ceasefire. Thirdly, we have brought into existence the peace conference under the chairmanship of Lord Carrington. That is a positive contribution to making peace in Yugoslavia. I shall make further reference to it shortly. Therefore, several measures have been taken which create the circumstances in which the participants to the fighting could enter into an accord or settlement if they chose to do so.

The burden of my hon. Friend's speech was his call for the recognition of the two republics of Slovenia and Croatia. That is clearly a serious case, which needs the most serious consideration. I come to a different conclusion from my hon. Friend, but none the less I recognise that it is a case which requires serious consideration. The traditional criteria that we adopt for the recognition of states probably apply to Slovenia. They do not apply in the case Croatia in the same way, but I accept—my hon. Friend would probably make this point—that one of the reasons why the criteria do not apply to Croatia is that Croatian territory has been invaded by the JNA and Serbian irregulars.

Rather than argue whether the traditional criteria apply, I would like to take a slightly broader perspective on the issue. My right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary has made it plain in the House and elsewhere that we accept the principle of recognition of the republics of Yugoslavia which wish it.

The essential problem is that of timing and pace, and I agree with what the hon. Member for Hamilton said about the desirability of a collective approach. I hope that the EC can remain united on the issue and move together. It is desirable, if possible, that our policies should be entirely harmonious, not only between ourselves but with our friends and allies who have a direct interest in the matter.

The first question that my hon. Friend the Member for Staffordshire, South must ask himself—and that I would ask of him—is whether there is any reason to think that recognition would stop the fighting. That is the key question. Is there anything about the quality of the act of recognition that would stop the fighting? In the end, one can only give one's own opinion. I do not believe that recognition per se would stop the fighting. Indeed, the act of recognition would be likely to make fighting in Yugoslavia generally more widespread and intense, so the argument fails on the key point whether it is likely to diminish the fighting.

I also believe that it would be likely to put an end to the peace conference. It is difficult to envisage the peace conference continuing if one or two of the parties have already had their independence recognised, so it is likely to diminish the chance of a settlement being negotiated within the peace conference.

Next, I believe that it is likely to trigger other unilateral declarations of independance in Yugoslavia, and in that context I am particularly concerned about Bosnia, which the hon. Member for Hamilton described as an unholy cocktail. He is right. There are at least three major ethnic or religious groupings—the Croats, the Serbs and the Muslims. If Croatia were recognised as an independent republic, inevitably the president of Bosnia would have to declare independence, and that fact would be likely to trigger fighting between the ethnic and religious groupings in Bosnia. For that reason also, the fighting would be extended rather than confined by the act of recognition.

I believe that the act of recognition would be premature and would deprive us of the leverage we need over the republics in Yugoslavia on such important questions as human, minority and legal and civil rights. Those important questions must be addressed at considerable length, because there is hardly a republic in Yugoslavia which does not have substantial ethnic minorities whose civil, legal and political rights must be addressed. In an ideal world, the act of recognition would follow accord on all the important questions that have been raised in this debate—notably questions of ethnic, civil and political rights.

To summarise my view, although I recognise the force of my hon. Friend's remarks, I believe that the act of recognition is premature and would be damaging in its consequences. We must press on with the policy that we have in place, which is to urge an effective ceasefire on the combatants to be ready to support a United Nations deployment of peacekeeping forces when the circumstances are appropriate—I agree with the hon. Member for Hamilton about the vital importance of ensuring that a ceasefire is in existance before the deployment of a peacekeeping force—and we must urge on all the parties the need to negotiate a settlement within the context of the peace conference, now under the chairmanship of Lord Carrington.

Western Sahara

4 am

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): The subject that I wish to raise is that of the future of Western Sahara, which at the moment, I believe, hangs very much in the balance. As the United Nations plan to try to resolve the long-standing problem there is a danger of running into very serious problems indeed. I obviously welcome the opportunity to raise the matter in the House and to record some facts about the history of and background to the impasse with which the Sahrawi people are faced.

It is a very large area of land: 110,000 sq miles, roughly equivalent to the area of the United Kingdom. It is very sparsely populated, with a population of rather less than a quarter of a million.

The problems for the Sahrawi people have been colonial oppression over many centuries and the fact that the country is rich in some minerals, particularly phosphates, and fish in the sea off its shores. We are talking of the last colony in Africa. Western Sahara became a colony in 1884 under Spain, because the Spanish were very keen to be included in the 1885 Congress of Berlin and by their occupation of Western Sahara they were able to achieve that. Their occupation was particularly oppressive and there were many rebellions against Spanish rule.

In the fullness of time the winds of change swept through Africa and independence was achieved for the colonies that had made up most of the continent. The mass colonisation of Africa took place mostly in the 19th century, and independence was achieved in virtually all cases in the 20th century. Morocco achieved its independence from France in 1956. Mauritania, which is germane to the area we are discussing, achieved its independence in 1961, and Algeria achieved its independence in 1962. However, during 1959, as a side-show to the war in Algeria, France gave considerable help to Spain in putting down rebellions of the Sahrawi people demanding their own independence. That conflict is well remembered.

In all this, the problems of Western Sahara as a colony were rather forgotten. The United Nations committee on decolonisation recognised in 1966 the case for decolonisation and, indeed, a United Nations delegation visited in 1975 to try to promote a settlement. In 1975 Kurt Waldheim, who was Secretary-General of the United Nations at that time, called for a process of restraint and no disruption of decolonisation. Finally, in 1976, following the death of Franco, Spain gave up all pretence of control of Western Sahara, having some years previously withdrawn its troops to the coastal areas. From that day on, 27 February 1976 has been recognised by the Sahrawi people as their day of independence.

Tragically, here we are in 1991 and that independence is not yet a complete reality because the vast majority of the area of Western Sahara is under the occupation of the Moroccan armed forces. In 1975, at the time when Spain gave up its claim to Western Sahara, King Hassan of Morocco personally led the "green march" into the Western Sahara area to establish, in effect, a new colony for Morocco, and the building of the sand wall which surrounds the area where the Sahrawi people were attempting to live. He created a military enclave, which he then attempted to settle in order that independence could be denied and this could be seen as part of greater Morocco.

That whole process since 1975 has led to a very bloody conflict. Many lives have been lost; many human rights abuses have occurred in Morocco as a result of the dynamic of the war that has been going on within Western Sahara.

The leaders of Western Sahara formed a government in exile based in Tindouf, in Algeria, and throughout the war there have been huge numbers of casualties. Human rights abuses have resulted in Morocco. In August this year Amnesty International produced an important statement in which it said that "it feared that hundreds of western Saharan civilians who 'disappeared' up to 15 years ago are still held in secret detention in Morocco or have died."

Some people had been released. The statement said:

"over 300 'disappeared' Sahrawis have been released after a royal amnesty in June, but hundreds more remain unaccounted for. The Moroccan Government has in the past persistently denied knowledge not only of those still missing but also of those recently set free."

Amnesty said:

"Many of the released Sahrawis suffer severe physical or mental problems after having spent up to a decade and a half in secret captivity. . . . Some are paralysed or blind due to harsh prison conditions, others left their cells insane."

The report continued:

"At least 43 of their fellow inmates have died in custody since 1975, when Morocco first took control of the former colony of Spanish Sahara and began wholesale arrests of people for known or suspected links with the Polisario Front. . . . This year's royal amnesty is the first solid confirmation of the mass 'disappearances'."

Amnesty has produced a comprehensive report which I am sure the Minister has seen and which his officials will have examined.

The battle for independence of Western Sahara is twofold, like all battles for independence. On the one side there is the physical fighting and the casualties that have been incurred. It has always been a one-sided battle in the sense that on one side there is great determination by the Western Saharan people, led by the Polisario, and on the other side there are sophisticated weapons and the conscript army of Morocco.

One interesting point is the degree of international recognition of the Government in exile which has been recognised by 74 members of the United Nations. Crucially, in 1982 the Organisation of African Unity granted recognition to Western Sahara. I say "crucially" because, as the major political organisation in Africa, the OAU is important and it is always extremely reluctant —I underline that—to do anything that could be seen to upset the national borders of individual member states. In Africa the borders are all drawn by colonial powers and the possibility of change is considerable once it is prepared to go down that road. Interestingly, it is the only case that I know of where the OAU has recognised a right of independence from a different country. In other words, it supports the view taken by the rest of the world that the occupation of Western Sahara by Morocco is not only illegal but an act of colonisation.

Agreements were reached with the United Nations, which has taken a consistent interest in the issue, that the case should be resolved peacefully. Obviously everyone wants that, although the recent actions of the Moroccan Government undermine their earlier declarations. In 1988, under resolution 621, the Security Council supported Perez de Cuellar's plan which would have led to the referendum. In 1991 Security Council resolution 690 was supported and later endorsed by the General Assembly. Under that resolution Morocco was to reduce its forces to 65,000 immediately and $200 million was to be voted to finance the referendum; there was to be an exchange of prisoners, and the roll for the referendum was to be based on the Spanish census of 1974. The referendum was to be held in January 1992.

Since then, Morocco has done a great deal to undermine the whole process. Military activity has increased. Morocco has increased the number of troops who are active in the western Sahara. Very recently it has tried to add 120,000 names to the electoral roll. The numbers being added would affect the result greatly, because the people are being bussed in, given names and told to register as Sahrawis. That would clearly upset the referendum process.

In addition, 40,000 settlers have been brought into Western Sahara by the new green march, once again led by King Hussan, and a state of siege exists in the area. His utterly cynical manoeuvres in taking people from the very poorest parts of Morocco, putting them on buses and trucks and promising them a home, a job and a bit of land if they go there, are a desperate attempt to hang on to a colony.

Many people believed that 20 years of war and Morocco's stubborn refusal to accept an international solution to the conflict were over. The "Peace Special" of the "Western Sahara Newsletter" of May-June 1991 uses those very words. It says that the Sahrawi people are now on the verge of the victory and independence that the Polisario has struggled for 18 years to achieve. Obviously, one hopes that that is the case, but serious obstacles remain to be overcome.

The timetable for a referendum began on 17 May last year and shows where the process has gone wrong. Stage 1 was from June to September, when Morocco and the Polisario were to agree on and implement a comprehensive ceasefire. Officials of MINURSO's Identification Commision were to arrive in Western Sahara and the commission was to update the Spanish census of 1974, which would form the basis of the referendum voting list. A preliminary list would then be presented by October.

Stage 2 was from October to November 1991, when the MINURSO military and civilian staff were to arrive in Western Sahara and supervise the withdrawal of half the Moroccan armed forces currently occupying Western Sahara; the remaining 65,000 were to be restricted to designated areas. Armed Polisario units were to meet at established bases in pre-arranged locations. Alongside several hundred civilian personnel, MINURSO was to consist of 1,700 UN troops, rather like the system used for the development of the ceasefire in Zimbabwe in 1981.

Stage 3 was to be carried out in the six weeks from November to December 1991—the present period—when the Sahrawi refugees were supposed to return to their homeland. The 165,000 refugees who fled the Moroccan invasion of 1975 were to be transported from their camps in Tindouf to safe locations in Western Sahara, again under UN supervision with the provision of transport, shelter and food. Voting stations were to be constructed.

Stage 4, of which we should now be in the middle, from December 1991 to January 1992, was to consist of three weeks of campaigning envisaged under the rules. Stage 5 was to be the referendum, due to take place in a month's time, with voting over seven days. The outcome of that referendum was to decide the future of Western Sahara.

It was hoped that that would be the end of a particularly brutal chapter in Africa's history and that peace could have been achieved at that time, but Morocco's more recent actions suggest that that is now extremely unlikely. There have been extremely disturbing reports which the Foreign Office has doubtless seen. In The Independent of 13 November 1991, one such report expressed concern about how some UN officials had been working against the interests of the Polisario. There was a serious allegation that they were not working even-handedly with regard to the protagonists in the conflict.

In November 1991, King Hussan made a speech that hardly belonged to a man who had accepted that the United Nations had a serious role to play in the matter and that the conflict was about to come to an end, announcing that a foreign flag would never fly over Western Sahara. He then commemorated the 16th anniversary of the 1975 green march by promoting a new green march.

The peace plan is being sabotaged—it is as simple as that. This is not the first time that the Western Sahara issue has been raised in the House. More than 100 hon. Members have signed an early-day motion supporting the principles of the UN peace plan and saying that they want the referendum to go ahead. All that is now at risk. Morocco is desperate to keep its colony, despite all the agreements that it has made on many occasions.

We want the British Government to use all their influence with the United Nations to insist that Morocco, which is shortly to become a member of the Security Council, keeps to all the agreements made. We must ensure that prisoners of war are exchanged, there are no more ceasefire violations, and the electoral roll for the referendum is accepted on the basis of the 1974 census so that the voting can go ahead as it should do in a month's time. That should allow those people who have existed in the past 18 years in refugee camps in Algeria to return home, elect their own Government, live in their own country and decide their own future democratically. They should not be denied that opportunity by the presence of the Moroccan army or Morocco's subterfuge in attempting to undermine the process undertaken by the United Nations.

I strongly urge the British Government to use their influence to support the United Nations process and allow peace finally to return to the last colony in Africa so that we can say once and for all that the process of the colonisation of Africa—in terms of the 1885 Congress of Berlin—is over, the last colony is consigned to history and the people are granted peace.

4.16 am

Mr. George Robertson (Hamilton): With the leave of the House, may I commend my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) on his choice of subject for the debate, which is serious and rightly inspires strong feelings among hon. Members and the population in general.

The past few years have seen remarkable changes in the world: many intractable problems finally seem capable of solution. There has been much movement in regional conflicts throughout the world and the United Nations has been given a new lease of life—there was co-operation against an aggressor in the Gulf, remarkable success was achieved in Namibia and progress has been achieved in Cambodia. Now we are begining to see the chance of some success over one of Africa's most intractable problems and the opportunity to bring peace to Western Sahara.

There are also signs that the countries of the Maghreb, which for so long were divided on the future of the Western Sahara, have decided to co-operate to try to find a solution. They were encouraged in that endeavour by the European Community. The Labour party has taken a consistent line on the Western Sahara: that there should be no imposed solution and the decision on the future of that region should be made by the people themselves. It was always our strong belief that a referendum would allow the people of that district to make their own free choice only if it were conducted under the auspices of the United Nations. Therefore, we were delighted when this summer, following the United Nations Security Council's unanimous endorsement of the plan, it seemed that we were on course for such a referendum in January 1992.

However, since then we and many others have been highly disquieted by the number of allegations made about breaches in the agreed timetable and the preparatory conditions for the referendum. As my hon. Friend the Member for Islington, North said, serious allegations were made in The Independent on 13 November and further allegations about breaches have been made by other organisations and people on the spot. The allegations are all the more serious because they cast doubt not only on the process that is now under way, but on the very credibility of the United Nations presence in Western Sahara.

The anxiety was reflected in an early-day motion tabled on 5 December by the chairman of the parliamentary Labour party's foreign affairs committee, my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, West (Mr. Ross). That early-day motion, on which my hon. Friend deserves congratulations, has already attracted 59 signatures.

Our aim in relation to Western Sahara is to be as constructive as possible. Our county's influence should be used to ensure that the United Nations status and objectives there are met in full. Therefore, I should like to ask the Minister a number of questions, if he is given the leave of the House to speak.

Do the Government believe that there is a realistic prospect of the timetable set by the Security Council for a referendum in January being met? It is an important question and I am sure that the House and the wider world would like to hear the Government's estimation. If the Government do not believe in such a prospect, what conclusion can be drawn? Why is the timetable in question? Is there a lack of resources for the process, a lack of co-operation by the Moroccan Government or by the UN agency? We have heard no allegations about foot-dragging or obstruction by the Polisario who appear to have complied to the letter with the obligations that they took on. Sadly, in contrast, there have been a number of allegations directed at Morocco—the role of the military in situ, the denial of access to observers and repeated allegations of the attempted flooding of electoral rolls by large numbers of Moroccans who have moved —or been moved—into the area.

What is the extent of the Government's support for the referendum process? We know that financial assistance has been given, but perhaps the Minister will illuminate us as to how much. What is the extent of the Government's commitment and how does the scale of our assistance compare with that of our European Community partners?

In the light of the slippage of the timetable due to alleged non-compliance, is not it time for the Government to take a lead in returning the matter to the Security Council for a reorientation and redefinition of the existing mandate if that were judged to be appropriate?

Finally, there have been repeated allegations of intimidation of electors. I put it no more strongly than that because I and my colleagues are not in a position to do other than repeat those strong allegations of intimidation of electors in the referendum process. The Minister will, of course, be aware that in previous elections hon. Members who have gone to such areas have played a valuable role. With their knowledge, they have been able to assist. Recently, hon. Members went to Bangladesh and Zambia and performed a major task there. Does the Foreign Office think that it would be right for them to do the same in this case?

We are conscious of the success that the United Nations has had in setting up the timetable. We look forward to the people of the Western Sahara being able to make a free and fair decision on their future. We look forward, too, to the United Nations having its reputation reinvigorated by another success in another regional conflict, and we must hope, perhaps beyond hope, that some of the hiccups in the timetable will be relieved and that the people of this area will soon be able to make an historic choice in a free and fair fashion.

4.25 am

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Does the Minister have the leave of the House to speak again?

Hon. Members: Aye.

Mr. Hogg: I agree with the hon. Member for Hamilton (Mr. Robertson) that this is an important debate. The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) is to be congratulated on having selected this matter for discussion although, as I have already said, I do not believe that the Consolidated Fund is an appropriate means of conducting important debates of this kind.

The hon. Member for Islington, North has set out in some detail the historical background to the problem, and I broadly agree with his recital of the facts of the case.

The conflict over Western Sahara has lasted a long time —far too long—and a solution is clearly overdue. As a permanent member of the Security Council, we warmly enclose the plan drawn up by the United Nations Secretary-General and endorsed by the Security Council. The plan sets out a timetable for a referendum for the self-determination for the people of Western Sahara and provides for the establishment of a mission for a referendum in Western Sahara to achieve this end. That mission is being organised by the United Nations.

The United Kingdom has contributed financially to the mission and we have provided about 15 military observers. I am afraid that I do not have to hand the extent of our contribution, or how it compares with that of other countries, but I will respond to the hon. Member for Hamilton on those points in writing.

The ceasefire came into effect on 6 September, as scheduled in the plan, and so far as we are aware it is still holding.

Mr. Corbyn: If the referendum process has to be extended, do I take it from the Minister's remarks that the British Government would be prepared to support a UN proposal for increased funding to enable the monitoring to continue? Without the monitoring and the UN presence, the referendum will not take place.

Mr. Hogg: We are anxious that it should go ahead, but this is neither the time nor the place for me to give a positive and binding commitment of the sort that the hon. Gentleman seeks. If the Secretary-General comes up with more proposals, we shall give them serious thought.

We have been neutral throughout this dispute. We do not recognise the Polisario or the Sahrawi Arab Democratic Republic. Nor do we accept Moroccan claims to the territory. We have consistently reaffirmed our belief in the principle of self-determination, and that has governed our policies on this matter in the UN and elsewhere.

It is inevitable that problems will arise over efforts to resolve such a long and difficult dispute, and the hon. Member for Islington, North has identified a number of the problems that are said to have occurred.

It is important to keep in mind that the development of the plan and its implementation are essentially matters for the United Nations Secretary-General. Therefore, questions on the deployment of the mission, the drawing up of the electoral rolls or the arrangements for the referendum are essentially matters for the Secretary-General, reporting where necessary to the Security Council.

The hon. Member for Islington, North made a point regarding the probity of the United Nations staff. He quoted an article in The Independent. The Secretary-General has denied the truth of those allegations, so I cannot take the matter further. I think that they were the allegations concerning computer diskettes.

If the Secretary-General decides to come forward with further proposals to the Security Council—the hon. Gentleman suggested that that was something that he might wish to do with regard to delaying the referendum —we shall consider them with our partners. The Secretary-General has not said that the referendum will be delayed, but if the date does slip we shall press for it to be held as soon as possible, subject to the important qualification that the conditions for the referendum should be right.

It is important that the parties to the dispute co-operate fully with the Secretary-General in the implementation of the settlement plan. I hope that the hon. Gentleman's anxieties about the Moroccans' conduct is misplaced. If efforts are made to distort the result of the referendum, it will create conditions which may prevent a long-lasting settlement being effective. I listened with concern to what the hon. Gentleman said. I hope that what he said is wrong and that his anxieties are misplaced. These are grave matters and if the results are being distorted, that is bad news for everyone.

The exact criteria for inclusion in the electoral roll which were mentioned by the hon. Gentleman are matters for the United Nations identification commission. I understand that that issue is still under discussion. If the Secretary-General comes back to the Security Council with recommendations on that point, we shall consider them.

In the end, however, we have to recognise that this is a long-standing dispute. The only game in town is that put forward by the Secretary-General, who has a particularly difficult task. We have every confidence in his impartiality. He has our support. We shall do whatever we reasonably can to help him and we, like the hon. Gentleman, hope that the dispute can be resolved.

Mr. Corbyn: In view of the concern about the behaviour of Morocco and its armed forces, has there been any direct contact between the British Government and Morocco on that? I recognise what the Minister said about neutrality in the dispute, but neutrality would not prevent the British Government from protesting, if that was appropriate, to either side in the dispute before the referendum was held.

Mr. Hogg: I do not know the answer to that question. I do not know whether specific representations have been made to the Secretary-General. I shall look into that point and write to the hon. Gentleman. I will go further and have the allegations investigated. If it seems appropriate to make representations to the Secretary-General—or, for that matter, to anyone else—and we have not done so, we will do so.

Itinerants (Hampshire)

4.33 am

Sir David Mitchell (Hampshire, North-West): I am grateful to Mr. Speaker for selecting for debate a subject that is of considerable importance to my constituents, and to my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department for remaining at this hour to hear my remarks and to respond.

The problems that I want to mention arise from people who are variously described as itinerants, travellers, new age gipsies, hippies, and by a few other colourful descriptions not covered by parliamentary language.

The problems fall into three categories. The first is those involving small numbers of such people, usually with caravans, who take up residence on private land or in green lanes that are public rights of way. The second is those attaching to large numbers of such people with vehicles, when they descend on parts of Hampshire—particularly in the run-up to the solstice at Stonehenge, which they are now prevented from approaching. Thirdly, there is the problem caused by large numbers of youngsters who want a noisy musical festival-cum-open-air party, and who attach themselves to the larger numbers of itinerants whom I have already described.

In the first case, four, eight, or perhaps 10 caravans arrive and settle. They create apprehension and unease, and cause a certain amount of fright—particularly among elderly people living in the neighbourhood, who become reluctant to leave their houses. Their arrival is accompanied by an increased incidence of break-ins and thefts. Although one cannot prove who is responsible, one has fairly good suspicion. In many cases, the settlers have no sanitary arrangements, so that the garden fence becomes absolutely revolting, and the loo paper blowing in the breeze is not at all an attractive feature.

Responses to my correspondence suggest that neighbouring householders and the landowner concerned should rely on the normal laws of trespass, but these require the landowner to seek from the county court an order for possession. If I have misunderstood, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will correct me. The landowner can also apply for damages and costs. However, that is a slow procedure. Can my hon. Friend say how long it takes to get an action into a county court in those circumstances?

That is also an expensive remedy, and it is laughable to assume that any damages that may be awarded will ever be received by the hapless landowner, because at some stage the itinerant will either claim that he does not have the money or will disappear.

However, there is said to be a quick, effective route that costs the landowner nothing. I shall be grateful if my hon. Friend the Minister will confirm that if Hampshire county council fulfils the duty laid on it 23 years ago in the Caravan Sites Act 1968—which became operative in 1970—to provide an adequate number of permanent gipsy sites, it can apply to be designated. I understand that once the county council has done both, it becomes an offence for a gipsy to park on unoccupied land, or for a gipsy or itinerant to park on occupied land without the consent of the landowner.

In those circumstances, I further understand that the local council—not the landowner—can apply to a magistrates court for an order requiring the caravan or caravans and their occupants to be moved. Thus, there is minimal delay, and no costs fall on the landowner.

I am not suggesting that Hampshire county council has been slothful, for in the past 21 years it has provided five camp sites for 20 caravans, and a sixth is under construction. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister will sympathise with the county council, recognising that it is not popular to select a site for a gipsy encampment, which inevitably arouses considerable protest from anyone who lives close by. May I ask my hon. Friend the Minister how many more sites in Hampshire need to be provided to enable it to be eligible for designation, and how long the designation procedures take? If he has not the information to hand, perhaps he will write to me. So much for the small numbers who descend on certain parts of the constituency and stay there, becoming a confounded nuisance.

Much more worrying is the annual invasion of Hampshire, before the summer solstice ceremony at Stonehenge. In the past year, that invasion has been spearheaded by some 200 travellers with caravans, dogs and so forth. They settled on private land—National Trust land, as it happened—at Stockbridge Down. Section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986 was brought into operation.

I congratulate the Government on finding such an effective way of dealing with this aspect of the problem —a large number of itinerants on private property. It worked like a dream. The Act gives discretion to the senior police officer present to direct trespassers to leave, provided that the landowner has taken reasonable steps to ask them to do so, and provided that 12 or more caravans have been brought on to the land. A trespasser who fails to leave, or returns within three months, commits an offence and may be arrested without a warrant.

That worked perfectly well, but now we come to the rub: where do those people move to? Last year, they moved from the private land at Stockbridge Down to Longstock, where they settled on a green lane—a track, or, as it is technically known, a boat: a bridle path open to all traffic. Here the law becomes a toothless tiger. It was designed to deal with obstruction on the highway, and it is worded in such a way that a resident can park his car—not unreasonably—in the road outside his house if there is no parking restriction in the area.

The inadequacy of the present law will be illustrated if I explain what has happened, and is liable to happen again. The "boat" at Longstock has public rights of way, but, as a rough track, it crosses farm land. There is no exact boundary where the farmland can be said to end and the track to begin. It is as if there were no Opposition Benches in the Chamber to define where one side of the House ends and the other begins.

The problem is that the police do not know precisely whether the travellers are on a public right of way, or on private land. Hampshire contains some 5,000 km of such green lanes. They are not fenced; there is no exact definition of where the sides start. So what do the police do? They go up to a group of people and say, "I require you to move by reason of the powers given by section 137 of the Highways Act 1980, because you are causing an obstruction."

The chap says, "I'm not on the green lane. I'm on private property." What does the policeman then do? Does he say, "In that case I will not charge you under that offence, but I will find another offence for you and claim that, under section 39 of the Public Order Act, you are required to move"? The hapless policeman does not know which piece of legislation to use because he does not know which piece of land the chap is on. That is the rub of the matter.

One law applies to one piece of land and another law applies to another. Section 39 of the Public Order Act works like a dream when the offence is committed on private land. It does not work on other land. Notice has to be given. If notice is given to travellers that they are on private land, they will go on to public land. If they are told to go from there and they go on to private land, they must still be given notice first. For those reasons, nothing effective can be done.

I go further. If people move back on to the highway and section 137 is applied, a prosecution may be undertaken, which takes three or four weeks. In the meantime, where is the caravan going to be? Who will look after the wife, the dog and the goat while the man is waiting for his prosecution? For those reasons, it is clear that the existing law, although perfect on paper, does not work in practice.

This year, 200 itinerants set up a stage for a pop concert to which about 4,500 people came. It rained and the whole place was a boggy mess. Thank goodness it rained. If it had been glorious sunny weather, there probably would have been double the number there. I ask the Minister to consider what it is like when 8,000 or 10,000 people assemble on a site where there are no sanitary arrangements. The damage to crops was estimated to be £5,000. The neighbourhood was terrorised, not by specific acts of terrorism, but by the sheer number, which was frightening for those who lived nearby. The pop festival created the sort of noise which is heard over and disturbs a far larger area.

I ask my hon. Friend to consider the future of the festival. Year by year, the numbers descending on Hampshire before the solstice have been growing. Last year's wet weather saved the area from the numbers being much bigger. What will the numbers be like next year, especially if it is sunny? Shall we be able to do nothing more effective in seeking to move people on than we did this summer?

Let us be frank. Those people will not disappear. If 8,000 or 10,000 people assemble in one spot, the police force cannot do anything effective. The time has come for my hon. Friend and some of his colleagues to think seriously about identifying suitable places where such pop festivals can be held with the minimum of disturbance. Such a site should be discreet and away from residential areas.

I have in mind the idea that, now that the Army is contracting, it will not need so much land. It may be possible for a site on what is now military land to be made available for such activity which would enable many young people to enjoy themselves harmlessly without disturbing local people.

Driving away from the camp down Stockbridge high street last year, I stopped and gave a lift to one of the people leaving the party. I discovered that he was returning to London and would like a lift. I gave him a lift most of the way to the station at Basingstoke. I asked him what he was doing and why he was there. He was frank and honest and why should he not be? He was a young Australian and had been earning money in Cornwall lifting bulbs and had heard that there was to be a huge open-air party and thought that it would be fun to join it. Thousands of young people like him thought the same. That was fine for them, but we should spare a thought for the people who live in the area.

The problem that I have described will not go away and nor will I. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister who is to reply to the debate will consider seriously what can be done to prevent the situation from recurring. In a constructive sense, I suggest that he might like to call a meeting of officials from the Home Office, the Department of Transport and the Department of the Environment, together with the local Members of Parliament who are affected in Hampshire, and have a joint discussion to explore the most effective way forward as quickly as possible.

4.50 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Peter Lloyd): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West (Sir D. Mitchell) on his good fortune in securing this debate, although my congratulations would have been even more enthusiastic if he could have secured an earlier slot.

Like my hon. Friend, I am a Hampshire Member and I understand why he is determined to seize the opportunity, even at 4.51 am, to raise a subject that causes so much distress to Hampshire residents, namely, the incursions of hippies and travelling folk in small groups and occasionally in huge convoys into quiet communities where, as my hon. Friend graphically described, they camp on public and private land and create noise and fear. They often cause damage and usually leave an unpleasant detritus in their wake when they finally move on.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hampshire, North-West asked me several questions. He queried the speed of civil law which is obviously the first route for a member of the public who finds his land has been trespassed upon in that way. As I understand it, civil law orders are usually made and executed on those matters within three to seven days. I was interested to learn that my hon. Friend had reports suggesting that the period was considerably longer than that. As I understand it, the courts are prepared to deal with pressing matters through an accelerated procedure and it should not take much more than a week before the court order is handed down.

My hon. Friend also referred to designation under the Caravan Sites Act 1968. He was right to do that because it provides local authorities with a key power to secure the speedy removal of traveller encampments from public and private land. From some of my hon. Friend's remarks, he seemed to believe that there was a great distinction in the law between public and private land. There is not. The only place where there is a real distinction is between highway land and other land.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will designate an area when the county council has provided sufficient official camp sites to accommodate travelling folk normally resorting to the area. Once that is done, a district council may get a speedy court order which the police must execute to remove travellers from any land where they have established an unauthorised encampment.

The Caravan Sites Act 1968 imposed a duty on county councils to provide suitable camp sites for travellers, area by area. Designation is very properly available only for counties that have fulfilled that duty. It does not have to be fulfilled for the totality of the county, which may have been my hon. Friend's impression. The county may be designated area by area, according to the availability of camp sites in those areas. Certainly, it would be wrong to enable an authority to enjoy the convenience of speedy removal under the criminal law when it has not yet provided the minimum of camping sites necessary for regular travellers.

My hon. Friend mentioned Wiltshire and the advantages that it seems to enjoy in such matters. It does so because it provides enough sites to have enabled the whole county to be designated.

Hampshire is making progress, and a site at Peak Copse, at Dummer, which is close to my hon. Friend's constituency, if not exactly in it, is nearing completion. The exact prospects and timetable for designation are matters for my hon. Friend to take up directly with the county and the Department of the Environment. However, I will ensure that a copy of the Official Report reaches him.

My hon. Friend also asked whether I would assemble a meeting of Hampshire Members to discuss those matters. I will certainly be willing to do so if that would be useful to my hon. Friend and our Hampshire colleagues. However, it would be sensible to make contact with the Department of the Environment and the county council first, so that the all-important question of the possibilities of designation and when it might come about can be examined beforehand, as it belongs not to my Department but to the Department of the Environment.

As my hon. Friend has said, section 39 of the Public Order Act 1986 gives the police descretionary powers to deal with aggravated trespass. I was glad to hear that he has found it of great efficacy in his part of Hampshire. That section of the 1986 Act is not designed as a substitute for the fast criminal law powers provided by designation under the Caravan Sites Act 1968. However, as my hon. Friend has found, it enables the police to respond to landowners, public or private, who complain that two or more trespassers are being abusive or insulting to the occupier, are causing damage to the property, or have brought 12 or more vehicles on to the land, and that the occupier has asked them to leave and they have not done so.

If the police judge it right to use that power, there will be a number of factors that they will want to consider—for example, the presence of children, pregnant women, and people who are ill. An offence is committed if the travellers do not comply or return within three months.

My hon. Friend said that a shortcoming of the law is that the police are required to give reasonable notice, as though that means that there must be a delay of an unspecified period before the power is enforceable. That is not the case. The police must make a judgment, and they must do what is reasonable. There may be certain circumstances, such as the presence of somebody who is ill, or children, which may lead them to give longer notice than they would normally give. Their power, if they judge it proper to use it, is immediately available to them.

In respect of encampments on highways, about which my hon. Friend has expressed worries, there is plenty of opportunity for action to be taken—my hon. Friend suggested that there was too much. For example, there is summary prosecution under section 137 of the Highways

[Mr. Peter Lloyd]

Act 1980, the county council can sue under section 130 of the 1980 Act, there is indictment for nuisance at common law, and damages and injunction under common law.

I do not believe that that choice confuses the police. They are well used to applying a variety of aspects of the law according to the situation. That is their job. In respect of highways, they have several choices which are appropriate to the number of people, what they are doing and the particular occasion. I accept that, at times, there may be some doubt about where highway land ends and private or public land begins, but it is not beyond the wit of competent police officers, together with county and district councils, to determine that boundary in most cases.

There should not be any confusion about greenways. "Greenway" is not a specific legal term; it is provided to cover rights of way, of which there are many in Hampshire. If the areas are highways, the county will know and if they are not, which is often the case, the benefits of designation or section 39 apply to them as to any other public or private land. There should be few problems of the kind that my hon. Friend understands to exist. If he believes that they do exist, I should be interested to hear about the circumstance of the particular examples so that I can follow them up because I am genuinely puzzled by what he is saying.

Sir David Mitchell: Perhaps my hon. Friend can imagine a field that rises over a quarter of a mile. Where the bottoms of two fields come together, there is a rutted track along which tractors pass. Some parts get boggy in the winter, so the tractors go up on one side, but because it is a bit drier further on, the tractors may then go up the other side. In such a case, my hon. Friend could not say that the central bit was the public right of way. He could not say that a man on the one side was standing on a public right of way, and that a man on the other side was standing on private land. That is the difficulty.

Mr. Lloyd: There is no difficulty. My hon. Friend seems to be confusing a right of way with a highway. A right of way goes over private land. The sort of track that my hon. Friend is describing will almost invariably be on public or private land, but it will not be a highway. Highways are well known to the county council. Any competent authority will know where its public highways are. If the areas are not public highways, they must be public or private land which has a right of way over it. As I have said, section 39 or designation, if designation has been secured, will apply, but not the provisions that apply to the public highway.

Sir David Mitchell: This is a very important point. Under the reclassification that is being carried out by the county councils, many of the green lanes are now being declared boats—or open to all traffic and four-wheeled vehicles. If my hon. Friend is saying that a boat is classed as land upon which section 39 can be applied, there is no problem, but if a different section of the law has to be applied because we are talking about a highway, there is a problem.

Mr. Lloyd: I shall come back to my hon. Friend on this question because the highway and what constitutes a highway is less a matter for the Home Office than for the Department of Transport. However, if the county is specifying particular greenways as highways, the county will know that. If the county has just specified something, the designation of that particular right of way should be no surprise to the police. That which is a highway should be well known to the county council and should be easily ascertainable to the police. If the area is not a highway, it is public or private land to which the law applies, even though it is a right of way, just as it does to any other public or private land.

My hon. Friend's third point related to large bodies of travellers and to the music festivals that have occasionally been a great problem. Large groups cause much greater problems than smaller numbers. A large body of hippies and new age travellers can converge on an area, but I do not believe that the law is insufficient to deal with that problem. The whole range of the civil and criminal law is available and covers all eventualities. The problem is for the police to be able to concentrate sufficient forces to deal with the group. That is an expensive exercise and means that, for a time, other areas will be underpoliced. Even if the police have mustered their strength, they must judge whether powerful and immediate intervention will exacerbate matters and create greater possibilities of violence and nuisance for local people than more restrained tactics. Those are questions not so much of the law and its adequacy as of police deployment and strategy, which are for the chief constable to determine.

My hon. Friend referred particularly to parties with music and thousands in attendance. I am aware that they can create havoc. That is why the law was strengthened last year by the Entertainments (Increased Penalties) Act 1990. The Act provides that if such a party is held, for which a charge for attendance is made, without a licence or in breach of a licence from the appropriate local authority, the organisers are liable to a fine of up to £20,000, the confiscation of profits and related equipment and six months gaol. It is an effective deterrent waiting to be used.

My hon. Friend mentioned Wiltshire rather wistfully as a county that seemed to be advantaged in dealing with the problems that he described. I explained that it was enjoying the benefits of its foresight in having itself designated. But it has also benefited from section 13 of the Public Order Act 1986, which is available to a chief officer of police. It enables him, if he believes it necessary to prevent serious public disorder, and with the agreement of the local authority and the Home Secretary, to ban a public procession such as those which have taken place at Stonehenge.

However, it is clear that whatever problems the new age travellers and hippies bring to Hampshire—sometimes on their way to Stonehenge—the problems are not the result of anything so formal as a procession. So the powers that have been rightly available in the immediate vicinity of Stonehenge have not applied to the difficulties in Hampshire so far.

I hope that what I have said helps to clarify the law in this vexed and vexing area, although the problems are much less vexing if the area is designated. The matter that my hon. Friend has raised is a real problem of not only law but wise and effective policing.

Sir David Mitchell: Will my hon. Friend arrange a meeting of senior officials of the Departments involved —the Home Office, the Department of Transport and the Department of the Environment—together with the county council and the Members of Parliament whose constituencies are affected?

Mr. Lloyd: I said earlier that I would ensure that my ministerial colleagues at the Department of the Environment read these exchanges. A crucial matter in the whole problem lies within their responsibility. I shall certainly discuss with them the usefulness of a meeting. I cannot commit my colleagues now to such a meeting, but I hope to be of assistance to my hon. Friend and I am grateful to him for raising this important matter.

European Funds

5.7 am

Mr. Derek Enright (Hemsworth): May I first thank Mr. Speaker for choosing my name in the ballot so that I may raise the apparently intractable problem of RECHAR and other European funds.

I begin by filling in a little of the background. The Hemsworth constituency is made up of a series of pit villages. The problem is that there is only one pit left in the constituency. When the communities lost their pits they lost their principal employment. It is no use telling the people to get on their coal tubs and go down the road. Many of them already have gone down the road. They have come down from Scotland and the north-east. Indeed, some of those who are now pensioners came from eastern Europe at the end of the war. But now there is no more road for them to travel. They have reached the absolute end of the line. It is a cul-de-sac. So they are left with a scarred environment, pit heaps rising to the sky and coal dust that has become engrained everywhere.

During the winter, when I worked in Featherstone, I could look out on the beauty of Featherstone Alps. But it was not the beauty of the Alps of Switzerland and the air was not so pure, and once one had taken a ski run, it was coal slurry and sludge beneath one's feet.

Terrible problems of the environment have been left with the departure of the coal. But they are villages with a proud history. Their solidarity has brought its own culture and customs, and I invite the Minister to visit Kinsley and view the historic photographs of the Kinsley evictions at the beginning of the century, when the private coal owners were in collision with the miners. The result was disaster for the miners' families. Children were cast out into the streets and wives were abandoned.

Matters such as that are still strong in the folk memory, as are the stories of the Featherstone riots at the end of the last century, when the military were turned on striking miners, some of whom were shot dead. In a way, that is being repeated in 1991, for there is a feeling of hopelessness as the mainstay of people's employment disappears. But on this occasion the feeling of hopelessness was accompanied by a glimmer of light. It came from the European Community, which recognised the difficulties faced by coal areas. Working with areas in Spain, France, Germany and the United Kingdom, the EC set about a programme to replace the missing jobs. It was a fitting programme for what was originally the European Coal and Steel Community.

That programme was not a solution imposed from above. It had nothing to do with what the other day were claimed to be terrible Brussels bureaucrats imposing their will on Britain. It was a co-operative effort, the local scheme having been suggested by Wakefield metropolitan district council. That suggested scheme was sensitive to the needs of the area. It had been carefully examined by the European Commission in accordance with the rules of the Council of Ministers to ensure that it accorded with EC criteria. All of that gave the area a glimmer of hope.

Wakefield metropolitan district council has lost 14,000 mining jobs in the last nine years. For a council with a relatively small population, that has been a large loss. Due to improved productivity, the one remaining pit in my constituency, Frickley, has suffered a job reduction of from 3,000 to 900, severely affecting three or four small villages. The programme that is being attempted, and hoped for by the locality, involves an EC grant of over £10 million. That sum, which might start to put things right, would go on environmental improvements. Unfortunately, the programme is being blocked.

The environmental improvements are specifically the reuse of land and buildings at six former collieries. One cannot get more specific than taking collieries that are no longer in use and attempting to bring them back into use and, over and above that, trying to take the scars away from the area. Putting these plans into action would, it is estimated by the district council, create 600 new jobs. It is not a great Toyota factory; that is not what we are asking for. We are asking for a series of small and medium-sized firms which can flourish. In this programme there will be spoil-heap reclamation and reconversion of the buildings that I have just mentioned. They will be cleared up and the whole outlook of the area will be improved. I should mention in particular the problem of subsidence from which we suffer in west Yorkshire generally. Where a pit has gone out of operation there are very specific and particular problems of subsidence which make it difficult for private operators on their own to start reconverting.

At the same time, under the environmental improvement programme there will be a cleaning up of the village and town centres. In particular I would draw to the Minister's attention the fact that housing estates in that area—not estates built by wicked Labour councils post-1945, but estates which go back to before the war—are in a terrible condition. They are not attractive places in which to live and it is very difficult sometimes to keep tenants in them. So the use of moneys there is very important indeed.

Secondly, we need the renovation of the social and economic infrastructure. Again, that is one of the proper headings that the Minister knows that these communities have put in. In this context, I should like to mention particularly the specific way in which pit villages are built. They tend to be ribbon development and therefore to be isolated to east and west or north and south, depending on which way the roads run. In Hemsworth in particular there is a tremendous problem of road links. We need new road links to bring us into the M62, the M1 and the A1. That is very important.

Over and above that, however, all the other infrastructure—sewerage, and so on—has been neglected for a long time. That, too, means that it is not an attractive proposition for even small and medium-sized firms.

Then we come to the construction of new, advance factory units and workshop premises—nothing very grand, again; we are not seeking a silicon valley or anything of that order, just small business which we can assist and maintain. Great emphasis has been placed in this programme on the creation or development of small and medium-sized enterprises. The sort of target that has been set is very reasonable—to create another 500 jobs.

The measures which are appropriate under that programme include better access to risk capital, the provision of common services—these are seedling firms setting up—assistance with market research, business networks, innovation in industry and, in particular, the establishment of small and medium-sized enterprises which can look to the new technologies.

The Minister should recognise that it is important in terms of planning the schemes that the district council has taken full account of the Government's central schemes. It is proposing to complement them, not to replace them, and to ensure that they fit together properly as a jigsaw.

A small element is the promotion of tourism. I am not suggesting that the Minister should respond to an advert of the sort that reads, "Come to sunny Fitzwilliam." He might be disappointed in sunny Fitzwilliam. More appropriate, perhaps, would be the Hemsworth water park. A huge area of derelict land was refurbished and turned into a splendid water park. It is an attractive facility for the region during the summer. It is not a national asset, but in many ways it is a sub-regional asset.

The parish council was strongly criticised when it decided to go ahead with the water park, but those who had lived for so long with muck on their doorsteps considered that it was a major achievement to get rid of it by creating a water park. Those who took the decision to go ahead with the water park were re-elected. That is the operation of local government at the lowest tier.

I recommend the Minister to give proper consideration to subsidiarity. We are always talking about it in Brussels, so let us give it proper consideration in the context of local government.

I have given the Minister the flavour. He has been good enough to stay up late, so I shall not go into further detail unless he has specific questions to ask.

I am sure that the Minister is familiar with the word "additionality" and has heard it used before, but hearing is not good enough. We want action. Everything that I have read on the topic includes a statement from the Government to this effect: "We have given additionality. We have included it in our general grants all over the place. Our local government financing is so complicated that we cannot show where additionality is." At the same time, non-Government organisations working in the third world can show additionality. Germany can show additionality, and it has demonstrated it clearly. Spain and France can show additionality, but the United Kingdom Government cannot. I know that additionality constituted a problem for all member Governments up to three or four years ago, and it was then that the Commission decided that it would tighten the rules. It decided that it would do something that the Government are always urging, which is to abide by the rules. It is not some nasty Jacques the lad who is telling member states to take that course. It is our beloved Bruce Millan, a former Member of this place, who is suggesting that the rules should be obeyed. Anyone who knows Bruce Millan—I am sure that this is the view of him in Scotland—will accept that he is a thorough administrator and that he abides by the rules. He looks to the book to get things done.

Bruce Millan gave the Government plenty of time to get their books in order, but they have not done so. So-called extra money has floated out from the Department of the Environment, but it has not gone to the coal areas, for which it was meant. On the contrary, I suggest that if extra money has left the Department, it has gone to Westminster and Wandsworth, areas in which people have not seen a pit, let alone worked down one. The money is being used to mask their poll tax. I can think of no other explanation. If Germany, Spain and France can show additionality, so can we, and so should we. We should be seeking to abide by the rules of the game.

As the Government seem unconcerned that money that has been properly allocated and bid for has not been received, I can only conclude that they are waging a vendetta against the miners. Will the Minister assure me that that is not so? I feel certain that, were Hemsworth a marginal constituency—God forbid—we would receive the money and it would clearly be regarded as going towards the Conservative party. One has noticed that happening in Sherwood, where the robbers seem to do well by the Government.

It is interesting, but it is appalling that, unless the Government act rapidly, the money will be lost to the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom was originally awarded the biggest slice of money under RECHAR, but we shall now lose it to Germany, which has the schemes and additional moneys ready and waiting. In the same way, Germany will take the European central bank now that the Prime Minister has decided at Maastricht that we shall no longer be part of EMU. One of the reasons why the Germans are ready and efficient is that their government is less centralised and more regionalised. The next time we debate this subject, we should also debate devolution, because action should be taken at the grass roots, not at governmental, level.

My final plea to the Minister is to show that he believes in the mining areas. The Government have done them enough harm in closing down their pits, but, now that they are closed down, the Government should ensure that we get the money straight away.

5.27 am

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): I applaud the actions of my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) in introducing this debate and I am happy to endorse his comments and agree with the arguments that he put forward. I know that he feels strongly about the matter and that he held meetings on it prior to being elected to the House. It was one of the important issues that he raised during his election campaign. He was right to raise it and, throughout that campaign, his constituents expressed great concern on the matter. They are aware of the issues involved, yet it is clear that they blame the Government rather than the European Commission for holding up the money. They applaud Commissioner Bruce Millan's actions in trying to put pressure on the Government to ensure that, when the money is released, it is properly used to the additional and direct benefit of the areas concerned.

The proper use of European funding is a long-standing interest of my hon. Friend. It is important because RECHAR and this specific scheme are the tip of a large iceberg, and the problem will get bigger rather than smaller if the Government do not act to resolve the problem at this stage.

I shall be brief because my hon. Friend has put forward all the arguments and the hour is very late. The Minister will have an opportunity to give his views and I should like to think that I am giving him an opportunity to tell us that the matter will be sorted out very shortly. However, I have a feeling that he has a job to find a common view even among his governmental colleagues because different Departments seem to hold a variety of views.

We have certainly gained the impression that the Department of the Environment is more flexible and more in line with the Commission's views than is the Department of Trade and Industry. There also seem to be differences of view between the Treasury and the Secretaries of State for Scotland and for Wales. The Department of Energy is also involved in the issue. Perhaps the Minister will give us some details on the different views held in government.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth was right: additionality is a vexed issue. Both he and I, as former Members of the European Parliament trying to obtain funds for use in our European constituencies, remember the discussions that we had on the subject over many years. We believe that RECHAR is being used as a test case to try to ensure that the problem of additionality can be solved. A Labour Government would discuss with the Commission ways of ensuring that European funding was much more transparent and that additionality could be demonstrably proved, which it is not now. That is the problem when we try to evaluate the Government's claims on the issue. Given the way that the Government account for their actions at present, there is no way of showing whether additionality exists. The Government's claim that they spend more in the regions than they would otherwise do because they know that they can retrieve moneys from Europe is difficult to prove one way or the other.

We have grave suspicions about the Government's claim, as, during their period of office, spending on regional assistance has fallen dramatically, while European structural funds have dramatically increased. That seems to be a paradox, which greatly fuels our suspicion that additionality is not being respected.

I pay tribute to the work done by the Coalfield Communities Campaign. It has produced an excellent booklet that describes the problems of additionality and how the Government prevent the money from being used as additional funds in the various districts. It describes how each local authority is "given a 'basic credit approval'. This determines how much it may borrow to pay for capital projects. An authority may also spend a proportion of its receipts from the sale of assets such as land and property. Together, these set a ceiling on each authority's capital spending which the government will not allow it to breach, no matter how much money is coming from Brussels."

My hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth rightly referred to the various schemes in his district that would be able to proceed if the problem of RECHAR and additionality were solved. I know that in other regions of the country, including mine, similar schemes are ready to be implemented if that problem is solved. In my district the problem involves the RECHAR programme in the Tyne and Wear and south-east Northumberland region. The schemes being proposed there are similar to the ones that my hon. Friend outlined in his district.

Those problems represent the tip of the iceberg. Local authorities—I think that 75 of them are involved in the RECHAR programme—are determined to get the matter sorted out. Given the guidelines under which they are forced to operate, it has been difficult for them to use not just RECHAR but other European funding in recent years. Having dealt with local authorities over the issue of European funding for a long period, my impression is that they are more disillusioned now than at any other time. They are finding it more and more difficult, particularly with the Government's spending cuts, which have been forced on them, to fit European schemes into their existing guidelines. As the money does not arrive in the form of extra benefit, the process is acting as a massive disincentive, not an incentive, for them to carry out important economic development programmes in their districts.

I hope that the Minister will take this opportunity to say that the matter will be sorted out quickly. Perhaps he can also say when the next negotiations with the European Commission will take place. I hope that he will not take refuge in the expression that I have heard many Government spokespeople use: "This is our money coming back and we can do what we like with it." This money is not a budget rebate. If it were, the Minister would be right to argue in that way. It is not a budget rebate such as that agreed in the 1980s, so it is not central Government money with which the Treasury can do what it likes.

RECHAR money is allocated to a specific scheme to help coalfield areas. As my hon. Friend the Member for Hemsworth said, the scheme was designed to help Britain. It was not designed to be British money coming back; it was a way to offset some of the negative aspects of EC budgeting. It was designed to go to specific areas, not into the central coffers. That is an important point and it is a reason why RECHAR money should be treated in the special way suggested by Commissioner Bruce Millan. I hope that the Minister will tell us that the Government are prepared to accept the Commission's point of view and to work with the Commission and our hard-pressed local authorities to make the best possible use of this important source of money.

5.36 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Industry and Consumer Affairs (Mr Edward Leigh): I congratulate the hon. Member for Hemsworth (Mr. Enright) on obtaining this debate on the Consolidated Fund so early in his parliamentary career. The knowledge with which he spoke about his constituency is a tribute to the dedication that he clearly brings to his job as a constituency Member of Parliament. I listened to him with great care.

I shall outline the nature of structural funds and then deal with the problem of additionality. The structural funds are established under the European Economic Community treaty with the general objective of strengthening economic and social cohesion in the Community and redressing the principal regional imbalances. They currently operate on a five-year cycle and the present cycle is due to finish at the end of 1993. The European Regional Development Fund was agreed in principle in 1972 by the European Council in order to reduce the Community's excessive concentration on agricultural policy and expenditure and to provide a more equitable balance in the United Kingdom's net contribution to the Community's budget.

The structural funds are intended to help improve economic and social cohesion within the Community, but the treaty makes it clear that the pursuit of sound economic policies by member states is the prinicipal means by which greater cohesion within the Community can be achieved. The task of the structural funds cannot be more than to provide a considerable but secondary means of support.

During the present cycle—from 1987-93—there is to be a doubling of the structural funds in real terms. That represents an investment by the Community in the economies of the main recipient states comparable with the aid provided under the Marshall plan for post-war reconstruction. As the second largest net contributor to the Community budget, the United Kingdom is entitled to ask whether the funds are being put to good use. In 1991, they will amount to about £10,000 million throughout the Community but mainly in the least-developed regions known as the objective 1 regions. Within the United Kingdom, Northern Ireland is designated as such a region.

United Kingdom receipts from the funds, as a proportion of the total, amount to about 9 per cent., or £900 million. This compares with the United Kingdom's gross contribution of about double that. Two thirds of the difference is refunded through the Fountainbleau abatement, which means that this year about £300 million of taxpayers' money is being transferred by the funds from the United Kingdom to other member states.

I think that it is very important to keep this fact in mind. The hon. Member for Gateshead, East (Ms. Quin) foresaw that I might mention it; I must, as it is central to the debate. It is tempting to think of the funds as some kind of free gift from a European benefactor, but they are not that—they are what is given back to us out of our large contribution.

The amount of our receipts is a matter for negotiation. The Government try to maximise the benefit that the United Kingdom will receive, but we have to recognise that many other member states are less well off than we are and they tend to get relatively more out of the fund. I make that point because it is necessary to keep a sense of perspective when approaching the difficulties surrounding RECHAR funds.

As with other member states, the Government are paid the funds by the Commission. The Government then pass them on to their final recipients. They are paid as contributions alongside national expenditures on such purposes as economic infrastructure, vocational training, industrial and tourism development, environmental works, and all manner of other things, according to detailed programmes and consistent with framework documents which are drawn up and agreed between the Commission and the Government.

The Government take a strict view about the need to control expenditure. That applies as much to expenditure financed by money from Europe as to money coming directly out of the taxpayer's pocket. Indeed, as I have already said, the money from Europe is actually our taxpayers' money in any case.

So, for these general reasons of economic policy, much importance is attached to the need to keep a close watch on where the structural funds money is going.

However, there is no question, as I have heard it said and as I have read in the press, of the money not going to the purposes for which it is intended. It is clear—the Commission has not claimed otherwise—that the funds do end up where they are supposed to be, in the case of RECHAR, in the mining areas. The issue is much more complex than that, and I suspect that many more people like to talk about it than actually understand it. I do not level that criticism at the hon. Gentleman, who brings great knowledge to these matters.

The basic question that Mr. Millan has raised is whether the present system in the United Kingdom taken as a whole satisfactorily transmits the effective value of Community structural funds to the eligible regions. I have already mentioned that over the period 1987 to 1993 the total amount of structural funds is being doubled. I apologise now for having to spend a while on a legal document. I hope that it will be clear to the hon. Gentleman.

Article 9 of the relevant Council regulation 4253/88 states:

"In establishing and implementing the Community Support Frameworks, the Commission and the member states shall ensure that the increase in the appropriations for the funds provided for in article 12(2) of Regulation (EEC) 2052/88 has a genuine additional economic impact in the regions concerned"—

I underline "concerned"—

"and results in at least an equivalent increase in the total volume of official or similar (community and national) structural aid in the member state concerned, taking into account the macro-economic circumstances in which the funding takes place."

That is the only place where any Community legislation currently in force mentions explicitly the requirement for additionality about which the hon. Gentleman has spoken.

The United Kingdom accepted that article when the regulation was adopted and we are bound by it. However, the Commission accepts that the doubling of funds will not benefit the United Kingdom. Receipts by the United Kingdom from the fund are expected to be lower in the current period than they were before. The evidence available to me suggests that we are the only member state in that position. The reason is that the main benefits of the increase have been concentrated on the less-developed southern member states. In those circumstances, article 9 has no practical impact in the United Kingdom. That is the legal point. Our legal position is clear. There is no doubt about it.

However, even though we believe that we are under no legal obligation to do so—by going through the article in detail I shall have convinced the House of our strong legal position—we have made provision for additional public spending to take account of the expected receipt of the funds.

In the case of RECHAR we had enough advance promises of the amounts of money which were likely to be involved to make provision for the grants to be used once they came through, and we did precisely that.

Mr. Enright: Will the Minister therefore identify the amount of money that was given to Wakefield metropolitan district council which was the additional money that he anticipated? That is a relatively simple request.

Mr. Leigh: It is not a relatively simple request, as the hon. Gentleman well knows. That is a question which he should address to an Under-Secretary of State for the Environment. If the hon. Gentleman were to do so, I am sure that the Under-Secretary of State would make it clear that additional funds have been given to local authorities in England to cover the amounts expected from RECHAR.

Mr. Enright: But that was put into the global figure, which is precisely my point and which militates against the legal argument that the Minister cited earlier.

Mr. Leigh: No, because the way in which the funding arrangements for local authorities are worked out for the hon. Gentleman's borough council, as for others, takes account of the borough council's circumstances. For example, it takes account of the amount of derelict land to which the hon. Gentleman movingly referred. So it is not simply that there is a global amount which is distributed equally throughout the United Kingdom.

Mr. Enright: There is a specific case here for the Minister to answer. With RECHAR, the derelict land is specified—it is related to coal—whereas the grants from the Department of the Environment in regard to derelict land make no such distinction. The result is that, for example, Manchester, which is not well known as being an ex-coalfield, gets more money for its derelict land than parts of west Yorkshire which are quite well known as being ex-coalfields.

Mr. Leigh: Although the point about derelict land was one that the hon. Gentleman made in his speech, and that is why I addressed myself to it in answer to the last question, it is a poor example for the hon. Gentleman to adduce in support of his case, because that is subject to 100 per cent grant from the Government. One of the arguments made by local authorities is that they are unable to match those funds when they are received. The hon. Gentleman cited derelict land, but that is not a good example.

I will try to explain the difficult and elusive concept of additionality, which understandably confuses many right hon. and hon Members and those outside the House, and gives rise to many problems. In essence, it is like saying that something would not have happened in other circumstances, and it is therefore impossible to prove from a logical point of view.

Another way of expressing it is to say that money from the structural funds should be used only to finance projects that local or national authorities would not have supported otherwise—presumably because they had higher priorities.

The paradox is that it is necessary to argue that a project is important enough to warrant support from the structural funds, but that it is not so important that it would have been undertaken without them. I hope that I have made myself clear to the hon. Member for Hemsworth. Additionality is a complex paradox, and it is important that the House understands it.

Another way of expressing the concept—which I have written out for myself—is that additionality means that one has done something additional to that which one would have done had one not received any money from the structural funds. It is impossible to say what one would have done if one had not received the money from the structural funds.—[Laughter.] I am glad that I appear to have enlivened the House at this late hour.

Mr. Enright: Will the Minister clarify that explanation by putting it in Latin?

Mr. Leigh: I could certainly do so. That would be a mere bagatelle—but I would be ruled out of order.

I am not saying that we do not take the problem very seriously. The apparent paradox that I described is why we are especially careful to ensure that all projects approved for grants from the funds offer good value for money and meet the other general criteria that ensure that the taxpayer's money is put to appropriate use.

[Mr. Leigh]

That condition, coupled with the global increase in public spending to take account of receipts from the structural funds, offers the best guarantee that additionality is respected, while ensuring that only worthy projects are supported.

I have said in Department of Trade and Industry questions that it is our money, and we want it. Commissioner Millan has been quoted as saying that that was a foolish and unhelpful statement. I make no apology to him or to anybody else for calling a spade a spade. It is our money, we contributed to the Community budget, we qualify for the RECHAR grants, and Commissioner Millan is withholding them on grounds that we believe to be spurious and unjustified.

I have received many letters from potential recipients of RECHAR money stressing how much difficulty has been caused by the Commission's refusal to release it.

Ms. Quin: If the Minister's explanation is correct, can he explain why practically all local authorities support Commissioner Millan's case, not his?

Mr. Leigh: Labour-controlled authorities—and they are those mainly concerned—have criticised the Government, but that is not entirely surprising. I am not sorry that Labour has chosen to make a political issue out of the matter, for that does not do it any good. We are not blocking the money. We give more to the structural funds than we receive and we want the grants to go to the regions concerned. The constituency of the hon. Member for Hemsworth would benefit from RECHAR money, and I had hoped that he and the hon. Member for Gateshead, East would use this opportunity to encourage Commissioner Millan to release it. I am sorry that neither of them has done so.

Mr. Enright: The Minister said that the legal arguments are crystal clear. If that is so, why did Commissioner Millan not accept them? He is a very reasonable man—even when he disagrees with me.

Mr. Leigh: I do not know why the Commissioner has not accepted our case. We have taken legal advice; our position is absolutely clear, and we are entitled to take that position. I do not know why Mr. Millan is taking his present attitude. I do not speak for him. He is a former colleague of Opposition Members, and I suggest that they ask him.

Schemes and projects are ready to go once the money has been released, but until that happens they cannot proceed. I do not know what better evidence of additionality Mr. Millan could have. I have been made aware of some concern among local authorities that are potential recipients of RECHAR grants that they may not be in a position to spend the money when it becomes available, because they have already reached their spending limits. That point was made by both the hon. Member for Hemsworth and the hon. Member for Gateshead, East. I am unable to comment in detail on such cases, but if any hon. Member knows of particular problems in particular areas, I am sure that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment would be pleased to make inquiries.

This is really a political dispute. Of course, some local authorities complain about Government-imposed limits on their ability to spend. They always have, so it would be surprising if they were to keep quiet in the present dispute. These authorities are encouraging Mr. Millan to stand firm against the Government, because they see it as a way of attacking the Government's general policies on local government finance.

Their position is in reality a false one. They are free to finance spending by a number of means, and within the limits of the law have considerable freedom to spend their resources as they decide. The hon. Member for Hemsworth mentioned a land reclamation project that one of his local councils had undertaken. It is for the local authorities themselves to decide on their priorities. That is the principle of subsidiarity to which the hon. Gentleman rightly referred. The Government have made additional spending power available in expectation of receiving structural funds money. There is no exact correspondence between this, in the form of credit approvals, and actual grants, because local authorities can finance their aided expenditure by a number of means, of which borrowing against credit approvals is only one. Moreover, basic credit approvals are not hypothecated to individual projects or even particular areas of expenditure. Why? I do not believe that local authorities would welcome being tied down by the Government. That is an important point: it goes straight to the heart of subsidiarity, in which the hon. Gentleman is clearly a great believer.

Another action that the Government have taken is the introduction of "top-slicing" credit approvals in England. This "fine-tunes" the allocation system towards European regional development fund authorities, and was intended to tackle a particular problem which might arise in particular areas where there might be genuine difficulties in utilising ERDF grant because of insufficient spending power. In taking that step, the Government demonstrated a willingness to act and take a positive approach to improving transparency.

I am sorry that, despite the initiative that we have taken to be flexible and to introduce top-slicing—which, I note, is never mentioned by Opposition Members—Mr. Millan has not seen fit to release the money. Despite our efforts to accommodate the Commission's objections and take positive action where needed, he is sticking to his call for changes that would, in reality, involve a considerable change in the approach to central and local government financial control arrangements. That is really a case of the tail wagging the dog, and we are not convinced that such a change is necessary or desirable.

Even more remarkable is the fact that we are not alone in having failed to convince the Commission over additionality, yet the United Kingdom is the only member state to have been singled out for this treatment by Mr. Millan. In the Commission's own very recent document entitled "Annual report on the implementation of the reform of the structural fund", it is stated that acceptable evidence—acceptable to the Commission, that is—of additionality has so far been received only from the Republic of Ireland, Portugal, Greece, Germany and Belgium. To be fair to Spain, it has submitted evidence as well, but the Commission says that it is having difficulty in interpreting it. I will spell it out. The hon. Gentleman did not appear to have his facts entirely right in his speech. In addition to Spain and the United Kingdom, the Commissioner still wanted to be convinced of additionality by Denmark, by France, by Italy, by Luxembourg and by the Netherlands.

Mr. Enright: I mentioned only three countries. The Minister will discover that what the Commissioner said was that France was making substantial efforts to move towards additionality. There were and always have been difficulties.

Mr. Leigh: We are making substantial efforts. The hon. Gentleman seems to accept that we are not alone. Why is it that, having made substantial efforts and despite the fact that we are not alone, we are being picked on? The answer is not clear to me. The hon. Gentleman should address that question to Commissioner Millan.

I have explained the position. We sincerely want RECHAR money to be released by the Commission so that it can be put to good use in constituencies such as Hemsworth. Mr. Millan has had his day in court. We have bent over backwards to try to accommodate his unreasonable views, but one can bend only so far. It is a about time that Mr. Millan showed some flexibility. We have shown flexibility. I hope that he can still be persuaded that it takes two to agree. I urge hon. Members who may have influence with him to try to bring him round.

Shops Act 1950

Mr. Ray Powell (Ogmore): A very good morning to you, Madam Deputy Speaker. I wish that I looked as bright as you look.

This important and contentious debate deals with the emotive subject of the operation of the Shops Act 1950. I know that the Minister is well informed about the Act and about our debates on the Act over the years, especially since 1986. There have been no fewer than nine attempts to amend the Shops Act 1950 since the great debate in 1986. There have been ten-minute Bills, and I presented a Bill myself. Some of the Bills have had little support and have been defeated on their introduction. Sometimes Ministers have taken a blatantly arrogant attitude in attempts to amend the anomalous Act.

The most recent Government attempt to introduce legislation on the subject—the Shops Bill—was rejected on Second Reading, having successfully started its progress in the Lords where it had a protracted and controversial passage. On 14 April 1986, as I remember only too well, I had the great pleasure of announcing the result for the Opposition as the Teller in the defeat of a Bill that the Government led by the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) earnestly wanted to be introduced. The Government were defeated by just 14 votes, despite their built-in majority of 170. I well recall the result. It was 282 in the Aye Lobby and 296 in the No Lobby. Standing by my side was my right hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes)—I should say hon. Friend, but he deserves to be a right hon. Gentleman because of his activities in the House. He stood beside me as the result of the Division was announced. He was as exalted as I was that we had defeated the Government despite their majority. The result was undoubtedly due to the enormous efforts of a great colleague and friend of mine who was at the time deputy general secretary of the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers which sponsors me.

If I could find the quote from Hansard from my right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition, I would refer to it because it is relevant, but, as I cannot find it, I will not quote my right hon. Friend. However, the Minister would find it worth while to read what my right hon. Friend said. He asked the Leader of the House whether the Government intended to proceed further with the Bill. The reply was that the Government had no intention of introducing any such legislation on that very emotive subject.

I recommend that the Minister reads the penultimate paragraph of the speech of my right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester, Gorton (Mr. Kaufman) of 14 April 1986 in which he called for a conference of all interested parties. He said that the representatives should not be called to the Minister's office for consultations; instead, there should be a collective conference and the Government should use their tempering powers to accommodate and reconcile clashing and conflicting convictions. [Interruption.] If the Minister is not listening, I will not refer to this point, but I believe that it is important and the Government should bear it in mind. If the Minister had acted on the advice of my right hon. Friend the Member for Gorton, and had implemented that recommendation and request, we might not be in the position that we are in today.

[Mr. Ray Powell]

Today large retailers and small shops are clamouring blatantly to flout the law. The Prime Minister has claimed that the law is bizarre and he has allowed the position to become worse by making no positive attempt to rectify the position after the statement by the Attorney-General of 27 November. The present position is bizarre when the large retailers open on Sunday, using the recession as their excuse and claiming that it has caused sales to be at their lowest levels. They are offering 20 per cent. off all goods to boost their Christmas turnover. However, the traditional January sales will be a universal flop when people cannot afford to buy for Christmas despite 20 per cent. off and Sunday opening which will mean further costs for the retailers and eventually the shoppers.

The Minister's statement to the House following the Attorney-General's response to a private notice question clearly shows that, having burnt their fingers once, the Government have no real intention of trying to solve the problem. On 27 November, the Minister stated that the Government would "consider measures which fall short of total deregulation of the Sunday trading laws".—[Official Report, 27 November 1991; Vol. 199, c. 919.]

That was a great step forward compared with what was said in 1986, but it took five years of constant lobbying by Keep Sunday Special, by USDAW and by several other organisations before that conclusion was finally reached.

Therefore, I look forward to the Minister's support on 22 January, when I shall propose my Bill further to attempt to change the Shops Act 1950, especially as the Act leaves unprotected shop workers who are called to work illegally in shops that should be closed on Sundays during the run-up to Christmas.

The last paragraph of the Minister's statement referred to Community law and awaiting the interpretation of the legal position. I have received many letters expressing deep concern about Sunday trading and law breaking, and the Government's attempt to blame Europe for the mess that they are in because of their inactivity. The evidence presented to me suggests otherwise. I ask the Minister to answer my question of 27 November, reported in column 923 of Hansard. If one of my constituents or anyone else takes a packet of biscuits and forgets to pay for it in a store that is illegally trading on Sunday, will that person expect to be prosecuted?

I now wish to refer to Sunday trading and European law. A lengthy document on that matter states:

"The Attorney's Statement on 27th November confirmed that a reference to the European Court of Justice does not suspend UK law. (Hansard Col. 913, 27th November 1991). Therefore the contrary proposition put forward by the law-breaking retailers is seen for what it is—deliberate and planned flouting of the criminal law for profit.

The European Court at any time has hundreds of references from the 12 Member States. It is an absurdity to argue that a mere reference 'neutralizes' the laws of a country pending the Court's decision. If that were reality, there would be legal chaos across Europe.

There have been three cases already brought to the European Court to test whether Sunday laws are contrary to the treaty of Rome. These came from France, Belgium and Britain. In all three cases the court ruled that countries are entitled to make their own Sunday laws and none is in conflict with the Treaty of Rome.

Eleven out of twelve countries in the EC have laws which restrain Sunday Trading or Sunday employment to a greater or lesser extent. Clearly there is a conscensus in the EC that to restrain Sunday trading is in the interests of the working population and has wider social benefits for family life.

Against this background for law-breaking retailers to appeal to Europe as a defence for their actions is totally indefensible.

The reason why the Shops Act is currently unenforceable is due to another decision by the Court of Appeal which requires local authorities to give a cross-undertaking for lost profits when seeking injunctions to uphold the Act."

Regrettably, the Attorney-General has refused to provide the local authorities with the necessary support to make enforcement feasible under those conditions. That is especially embarrassing for a Conservative Government who seek shortly to offer themselves to the electorate as the party of law and order.

To demonstrate even more clearly that the Government have made a highly electorally damaging decision, one of the 10 million leaflets that have been produced by Marks and Spencer, which is one of several household names that has decided to put truth and integrity before profit, states: "it continues to be our firm belief that it is not in the interests of our customers, our staff or our shareholders, for us to compromise our integrity by breaking the law."

There is still time for Parliament to rectify matters, and I should like to suggest several ways in which the Minister could act. She should urge the Attorney-General to take up the matter again. He has the power to seek a nationwide injunction against the multiple retailers. It would require only one court appearance per national chain and, in all probability, the matter could be joined. That appears to be the most sensible mechanism for enforcing the Shops Act. The Attorney-General also has residual powers in the Criminal Law Act 1977, relating to conspiracy to undermine the public law. There is also a common law offence of incitement to breach the criminal law.

At present, local authorities that enforce the law risk huge costs if the European Court decision goes against them, while public limited companies that break the law face no risks if the court decides, as expected, for the validity of the Shops Act. That is obviously unfair.

However, section 71(4) of the Criminal Justice Act 1988 empowers a magistrates court to make a confiscation order against an offender if it is satisfied that he has benefited from the offence. A person benefits from an offence if he obtains property as a result of or in connection with its commission. His benefit is the value of the property so obtained. The powers are limited to the offences that are specified under schedule 4 and do not at present include offences under section 47 of the Shops Act. However, other offences may be added by statutory instrument. Thus, all that is required is for the Home Secretary to make the appropriate order. Is he willing to do so? If not, why not?

I should like to the Minister to request the Government to apply a series of moral sanctions. Law breakers should be denied public recognition whenever possible, such as the Queen's awards, development grants and local authority assistance. Official bodies should eschew anything other than formal involvement with law breakers. Executives involved in illegality should be denied public office, positions of influence and invitations to public functions. Those already honoured should be told that they are placing their honour in jeopardy.

Despite all the hype in the popular press and the media, the Tesco-led assault on the law has had nothing like the commercial success that has been claimed for it. Local press opinion polls and surveys throughout the country have come out strongly against a Sunday trade free-for-all. Evidence of unacceptable pressure and duress on shop staff, supervisors and managers is steadily increasing. The only day that many families will have been able to share together since 1 December will be Christmas day. Does that help to stem the breakdown of family life and relationships?

Respected market research by A. G. Neilson Ltd. shows that only about one in 20 households went grocery shopping last Sunday. That means that 19 out of 20 households did not. Is it right to stand idly by and allow a small group of directors of retail companies to dictate a fundamental change to our way of life for their benefit and that of fewer than 5 per cent. of the population? Immediate enforcement action and reform of the law is needed, and I trust that the Minister will respond to that request.

My interests in the matter include being the senior Member of Parliament sponsored by the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers. My views on this emotive subject, especially on the protection of workers' rights, conditions of employment and rates of pay and enhanced payments for overtime, have been put on record on numerous occasions. Perhaps those conditions should apply to Members of Parliament too, especially when we are up all night until 6.20 in the morning.

On Monday 25 November Durham university business school, one of the most prestigious in the country, presented in the Jubilee Room its report and findings of a six-month study of women and work. It examined the family attitudes and position of women employees, and the possible consequences of working unsocial hours, especially Sundays. I acted as host and the event was sponsored by the Keep Sunday Special campaign and organised by the operations director, Mr. David Blackmore. We discussed in detail the reform of the Shops Act 1950.

The study concluded that women employees in retailing do not want to work on Sundays. If they are compelled to, they would prefer to work on Saturdays, and to work non-standard hours on weekdays. The report claims that women are not in a strong position to negotiate with employers, most of them being part-time employees. The report also concluded that employee protection was not likely to be effective, whether or not women were members of a trade union.

The report further concluded:

"any reform of the Shops Act 1950 needs to take into consideration

—the needs of the consumer

—the needs of the shopworker and —the general trend towards the reduction in the hours of working which means more time for shopping will be available during the week".

The overall conclusion is that

"Sunday work should be kept to a minimum and the Shops Act should be reformed but should not permit any major extension of Sunday trading".

That report on women at work is well worth reading. I trust that the Minister has a copy. If not, I can provide her with one.

I have referred to the Keep Sunday Special campaign. Indeed, I presented, with the Father of the House, the right hon. Member for Castle Point (Sir B. Braine), an all-party early-day motion on Sunday trading. The motion has already been signed, without any undue canvassing, by 101 Members from both sides of the House. Had names been canvassed, in all probability more than 200 would have signed by now, and I have no doubt that before 22 January, when I present a ten-minute Bill on the reform of the Shops Act 1950, that number will have been exceeded.

Having referred to the REST proposals put forward by Keep Sunday Special, it might be helpful—especially as those proposals are mentioned in the early-day motion—if I put on the record what the proposals are. The principles behind the proposals are to ensure that consumers' reasonable needs are met; that friends and family spend quality time together; that the freedoms of shopworkers, owners and residents are safeguarded; and that Sunday is kept a special day, as in the rest of Europe.

The REST proposals claim that exemption from basic closing should be based on the type of shop, not on lists of goods, and that exempt shops should be able to sell all their goods, that "type of shop" approach being used in Germany, France, Belgium and the Netherlands. Special provisions should apply to small food and general stores, registration should be administered by local authorities, enforcement should be made simple and cost effective, and there should be full employment protection rights.

Under the REST proposals, shops similar in type to those already legally trading should be allowed to open. They would be sports centre outlets, historic house outlets, newsagents, garden centres, florists and video hire shops. They would come under recreation outlets. In emergencies, allowed shops would be chemists and small food shops. For social gatherings, restaurants, take-aways and off-licences would be included, as would petrol stations, motor spares shops and travel kiosks under the general travel heading.

I referred to the report on women. USDAW, with a membership of 400,000—mostly women shopworkers—would, I am sure, support the findings that I listed earlier from that report on women workers. Assurances about protection are requested whenever any attempt is made to change the Shops Act. My union is worried about any change in the law that might not include negotiated protection for its members. It points out that during 12 years of Conservative rule it has seen the systematic demolishing of employment and wages legislation, the end of wages councils and the introduction of numerous anti-trade union laws, all depriving its members of protection.

Whatever legislation amends or replaces the Shops Act 1950, shopworkers must be given protection for their rights, working conditions and contracts of employment, and if Sunday trading in a limited sense is introduced, employees must be free to refuse to work on Sunday. That right must be paramount in the consideration of, and clearly defined in, the legislation.

A recent ruling of a tribunal in Suffolk has substantiated USDAW's stance against unlimited Sunday trading, when shopworkers would be forced to turn up for work, whatever their wishes. Indeed, in the USDAW journal Today it is reported that "The tribunal ruled that the seed packer Robert George's dismissal for refusing to work Sundays was unreasonable. He had told his employers he wanted to attend church and spend Sundays with his family.

Mr. George had been told that during the harvest season he was required to work 12 hours a day, seven days a week. He requested Sundays off but the company, Plant Breeding International, said it would not allow less than a seven-day working week.

Mr. George said: 'To dismiss me after 16 years was atrocious. I had offered to work 14 hours a day, six days a week, instead.

[Mr. Ray Powell]

"What I did was for the sake of family life, and to get a rest."

Expert advice on the importance of Sundays to family life was given to the tribunal by Malcolm Wickes, director of the Family Policy Study Centre. And Paul Diamond of the Keep Sunday Special campaign described the decision as unique and historic.

'This is a major victory for the principle of Sunday rest,' he said."

I hope that by my remarks in the early hours of this morning I have convinced the Minister that there is need for a revision of the Shops Act 1950 or, indeed, for a new Act. Perhaps my proposal, to be presented to the House on 22 January, if it is supported by the Government, will be a move in the direction of overcoming the dilemma that the Government, retailers, consumers and everybody else are in at the present time, when people are blatantly flouting the law. I hope that every effort will be made to alter the situation as early as possible.

6.31 am

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) on his success in the ballot. I believe that it is a success because there has been an opportunity here to get the Sunday trading case debated in the House of Commons, although it is very early in the morning and we all have difficulty in stringing our sentences together. I am glad that my hon. Friend has given us that opportunity. He has been a consistent advocate of ensuring that the law of the land is adhered to. I know that he feels great distress at what is happening as a result of Government inaction on this matter.

My hon. Friend referred to the opportunity that he had of presenting the result of the vote on the 1986 Bill. I recall that occasion, too. I remember in particular the huge smile that he had on his face when the Government were defeated in a way which can be described in parliamentary terms as nothing short of absolutely remarkable. The Government were defeated despite their huge majority of 130 or 140 votes. The reason why the Bill failed was that the Government were, I think, contemptuous of the House. They had this very unhealthy large majority and they put before the House a Bill which offered total deregulation of shopping hours and to all intents and purposes stripped out nearly all the employment protection which has been a hallmark of Sunday trading legislation, certainly for the past century.

The essence of Sunday trading legislation has always been to protect shop workers, who traditionally have always been abused. The House might recall the Auld report, which referred to our 2·2 million shop workers as people who have been generally abused in terms of their long working hours and poor wages.

Surely the House acted wisely when hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber threw out the Shops Bill, which I considered to be a disgraceful piece of legislation. It deserved nothing short of the wastepaper basket.

In the meantime, the Government have attempted to pull together a solution to the dilemma that arises as a result of the different views that are held by various groups. Some organisations stand for total deregulation while others emphasise the consumer. There are others that wish to retain the feel, as it were, of Sunday, and there is the Christian element.

The Government's attempt to produce a solution has failed. I regret the approach of the Minister of State, Home Office. The right hon. Lady has seen the various groups to which I have referred, and I accept that the list is a long one, but she did not bring them together collectively to discuss a consensus. I am convinced, having talked to the groups, that a consensus could have been reached. A solution—[Interruption.] The Government Whip, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) is making comments from a sedentary position. Is he asking me what the solution is?

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Lords Commissioner of the Treasury): No, I am not.

Mr. Randall: It is unusual for a Whip to comment. Perhaps I should refrain from responding to the hon. Gentleman and continue with my speech.

I have had discussions with the various groups and I am convinced that a solution could have been arrived at if the Minister had arranged for collective discussions to take place. Now that we have moved into what is essentially a total deregulation mode, I think that the opportunity has been lost for ever.

I am sure that the House is distressed that the Minister has failed to make a proper statement. The right hon. Lady made an apology of a statement a week or so ago. I believe that she did so because a private notice question had already been accepted by Mr. Speaker. That statement told us nothing. It was made to save the Government some embarrassment.

What the Attorney-General—not so much the Minister of State—had to say in response to the private notice question was tragic. He decided to take no action. I think that most of us recall the way in which the Attorney-General seemed to expect that no comments would be thrown at him. It was disgraceful. I think—I measure my words carefully—that the Attorney-Generally behaved politically, in party-political terms, before he carried out his responsibility of ensuring that the law of the land is enforced. That is a disgraceful thing for an Attorney-General to have done. The House and the country will have noted——

Mr. Patnick: The hon. Gentleman should withdraw that.

Mr. Randall: The Government Whip is again making comments.

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): It is important that I should ask the hon. Gentleman carefully to consider what he has just said about my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, who set out the legal position as a Law Officer. As the Attorney-General—not as the Government—he took a stand and put his point to the House. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will make it clear that he has accepted that point.

Mr. Randall: I do not accept that point. I hope, Madam Deputy Speaker, that my comments were not out of order or tasteless, but I shall rephrase them. It is a matter of concern throughout the country that the Attorney-General has not used his powers to ensure that the law of the land—the Shops Act 1950—is enforced. He has the power to introduce an injunction on a company-by-company basis. As the number of companies leading the law-breaking campaign is small, he has a viable means of enforcing the law but he refused to do so—[Interruption.]

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. Does the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hallam (Mr. Patnick) seek to intervene so that his interjections may be properly recorded?

Mr. Randall: I am prepared to give way to the hon. Gentleman, but he continues to interrupt from a sedentary position, irrespective of your ruling, Madam Deputy Speaker.

Hull city council, which Ministers accept is a good, efficiently run council, wanted to enforce the law, but, in practice, it cannot be enforced. Two courses of action are open to a local authority. First, it can take a company through the magistrates courts in the normal way with the aim of securing a prosecution. These days, that cannot happen because the case is unlikely to be listed and, if it is listed, it will be adjourned, so a local authority has no means of carrying out its responsibilities. Secondly, it can apply for an injunction. My city council did that against B & Q and had to pay a cross-undertaking of £1·2 million. That was for just one company.

I am not sure how the law-breaking campaign is working or whether other companies would have joined B & Q, but the chief executive of my council felt that he was not in a position to commit the poll tax payers of Hull to what could have amounted to several million pounds, and a deal was finally struck that Hull city council would refrain from taking out an injunction and the cross-undertaking was therefore withdrawn.

That is what councils are confronted with in practice. My remarks about the Attorney-General were strong because he has not faced up to his responsibility to enforce the law. He has copped out of his responsibilities. How would the Minister advise Hull city council to go about enforcing the law, bearing in mind that it cannot go through the magistrates courts because of the cross-undertakings required? She is bound to answer that there is no possible action and that the Shops Act 1950 is an unenforceable law. That is what is causing so much distress on both sides of the House.

The Government do not support law and order. There is a record level of chronic law breaking throughout the country and they are prepared to allow companies to break the law for profit. That is nothing short of irresponsibility, and inflicts severe damage on our democracy.

The upshot is that——

Mr. Patnick: What is the hon. Gentleman's solution?

Mr. Randall: The Whip is interrupting and asking for my solution. If he will be quiet I shall tell him what the Labour party proposes to do.

The Government have allowed law-breaking to continue. They have not used their powers and there is now total deregulation in this country. Any company can do whatever it wishes—it is easy. The various lawyers acting for the pressure groups that advocate the law breaking are saying that the Shops Act 1950 is not extant and that the referral to the European Court of Justice implies that the 1950 Act is suspended. That is nothing short of stupidity. If that were to happen every time there were a referral to the European Court the laws, not just of this country but of all other members of the EC, would be in chaos. A number of test cases on Sunday trading and the possible conflict with the treaty of Rome have already come before the European Court and all have been referred back to the various countries involved.

The defences that have been used to justify the campaign of law breaking are disgraceful. At the general election we shall be justified in saying that the Conservative party cannot again claim to be the party of law and order. Its credibility has been severely damaged and its attempts to find a solution to the problem have resulted in abject failure.

The fact that there is now total deregulation will have a serious effect on small shops. The advice that I have received from those who understand the issue better than I is that it will drive many small convenience stores out of business. Those little shops are loved by the British people because they are conveniently located just around the corner. People can use them to buy their newspapers on Sunday morning and are often prepared to pay more to use those stores because they are convenient.

I know that the Minister likes small stores, because she referred to them in her speech on 14 October. I agreed with her and thought that her comments were eminently sensible. She said:

> "They provide help to those who are unable always to go shopping on weekdays and Saturdays. They are small corner shops. We all acknowledge that they provide an important service, especially for the elderly and those less able to get to the larger stores during the week."—[Official Report, 14 October 1991; Vol. 196, c. 129.]

We all agree that small stores are important, but they can remain viable only if they can carry out their trading on Sundays. One must recognise that Sunday business can account for about 25 per cent. of the turnover of those small shops. If one adds late-night opening, it can account for about 40 per cent. of total trade. The decision by Tesco and other groups campaigning to break the law to get their own way—which they have largely done as a result of the Government's co-operation and collaboration—has made a serious dent in the turnover and profit of the stores that are already struggling.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman acknowledges that the small corner shops which have been trading on Sundays—in many cases, outside the Shops Act 1950—provide a useful service to some people in our communities. However, I want to ask the hon. Gentleman a question. He has asserted that the Government have been unable to find a solution and has alluded to one anomaly, but will he state categorically what legislation the Opposition would introduce to resolve the difficulty?

Mr. Randall: I shall certainly answer the question, because we have a policy to which I alluded as a result of an interruption made by the Government Whip.

One of the reasons for the Government's failure has been the fact that they did not bring together all the groups involved. Until things collapsed, I had planned to hold a conference in either the last week in January or the first week in February because, as a result of discussions with the Shopping Hours Reform Council, SOS, the Union of Shop, Distributive and Allied Workers, the Keep Sunday Special campaign, the consumers and other groups, I am confident——

Mrs. Rumbold rose——

Mr. Randall: I shall finish the point and then I shall give way. From the discussions that I have had with those groups and from some statements that I have received—I do not want to go into detail because they were confidential—I am confident that a solution could have been found which would have formed a reasoned consensus for those groups, for the interests that they represent and for the House. The Government have blown it. They should have held a joint conference. There is no question but that it would have involved tough chairmanship and I am convinced that the Minister—whom I should have expected to chair the conference—would have had to hit a few heads together. However, the parties involved were prepared to have their heads hit together to arrive at a solution.

As the basis of its policy, the Labour party has advocated such a conference. When we form the Government—whether it is in April or May, we do not yet know—we shall hold the conference to reach the consensus, the potential for which already exists. However, the Government unfortunately failed to bring the people together. The Minister held a number of meetings and I know what went on, but the opportunity was lost.

Mrs. Rumbold: I am interested to learn that the hon. Gentleman believes that a conference will be the panacea to all the ills connected with Sunday trading. Would that it were so. The absolute naivety of his suggestion knocks me out. Whatever people say to him in confidence and whatever they may say in twos or threes, if he had been here when the issue was raised on the Floor of the House only a week or so ago he would have realised—indeed he was here so he should have realised this instantly—that the leaders of the groups might come to an——

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): He was at the Dispatch Box.

Mrs. Rumbold: Indeed he was. The hon. Member should have observed, at that debate, the variety of views held by hon. Members. The leaders of the groups that he mentions might well come to some sort of compromise—I might have achieved that—but I would not be able to command a majority of Members, who have other ideas. How would the hon. Gentleman solve that?

Mr. Randall: I am confident from the discussions that I have had that we could have found the basis for an agreement. In the Minister's position, I would have hit heads together, stated what I believed would be ultimately acceptable to the House of Commons, and had the courage to put the case to the House. Instead of doing that, the Minister kicked the ball into the long grass. She has been pressurised by the big companies that contribute to the Conservative party and been forced to deliver what they want.

That is why we are in this trouble, and why the Government have been grossly irresponsible. The Minister should have started with an agreement on terms and conditions relating to employment protection and dealt with the other aspects afterwards. That would have got her 80 per cent. of the way to her goal; but, as a Minister on the right of the Conservative party under political pressures, she could not do it. The next Labour Government will do it; we will have the guts to come to the House with a solution that we think will be in the interests of the consumers, those who want to retain the special nature of Sunday, those who work in the industry and all the other interested groups.

This Minister will go down in history as the Minister who killed off small shops in Britain. The trend already has been remarkable: we used to have 140,000 village shops in the 1960s. Only 39,000 remain. People representing those shops tell me that the latest move by Tesco and the others that are breaking the law could sound the death knell for some of the vulnerable stores.

The Opposition feel strongly about this. We are told that the people of Britain want to shop on Sundays. Well, let us put the case to the House and vote on it. The opinion polls do not reflect the true opinions of the British public. They do not want their small stores destroyed and put out of business. They have a great deal of love and affection for the small stores, and the Minister will go down in history as the woman who wrecked them.

As a result of the opening on 8 December, small shops' trade for the day in the south midlands fell by 15 per cent. In Bristol, a group of shops affected by trading on 8 December saw their incomes drop from about £4,000 to less than £3,000, a drop of about 25 per cent. That is serious. It means that those shops are no longer viable and we condemn the Government's inaction on the reform of the Shops Act 1950.

6.59 am

The Minister of State, Home Office (Mrs. Angela Rumbold): The hon. Member for Ogmore (Mr. Powell) made a good point at the beginning of the debate when he said that there have been considerable difficulties in redesigning the Shops Act 1950 to meet the requirements of the 1990s.

Like the hon. Gentleman, I well recall the Second Reading debate of the Shops Bill 1986 which followed upon the discussions and deliberations of the Auld committee which, since as long ago as 1985, had been engaged in a series of debates about Sunday trading. After considerable deliberations, a great deal of attention, many discussions with the various parties concerned—no doubt the kind of conference which the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) so naively believes will produce a solution—the committee came forward with the only viable solution, total deregulation of Sunday trading. As a result, the Government introduced the 1986 Bill.

As hon. Members may or may not recall, Conservative Members had a free vote, a conscience vote, because the Bill was regarded as being of sufficient importance to require people to make up their own minds. On that occasion, the Government's proposals were not accepted by the House. I freely admit that, following that, the Government have been unwilling to introduce other proposals because they feel that they would have to be enforceable, workable and acceptable to a majority of hon. Members.

It is a wonderful notion that we could have a conference of the main spokesmen for the different organisations——

Mr. Randall: They have agreed to that.

Mrs. Rumbold: Of course they have. Of course they will come together and discuss the matter. Of course it is believed that some will give way to others. I have had discussions with those people, collectively and individually, but even were the leaders prepared to make some concessions, the strongly held views of people at both ends of the spectrum are such that it would be exceedingly difficult to introduce a proposal to the House which hon. Members would accept could form the basis for coherent, workable and enforceable legislation.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: What is the evidence for that?

Mrs. Rumbold: I have been sufficiently foolhardy to raise the issue from time to time with small groups of individuals who put their point of view to me when it is easy to be civilised and who propose arrangements whereby Sunday trading could be limited to certain times, to shops of a particular size, to the selling of particular goods or to certain types of shop. If groups of, say, 50 to 100 people were to be asked how many of them would like to see some deregulation on Sunday, only about half would put up their hands; the other half would want to keep Sunday special. That is what would happen if the matter were put to the House, but the Opposition seem to think that the matter could be resolved overnight.

As I explained in my statement on 27 November, I have undertaken intensive discussions with a wide range of major and conflicting interest groups on possible ways of reforming the Sunday trading laws for England and Wales, and they will continue next year. I am willing to talk to anyone who comes to me with a proposed solution that they believe the House would accept—including the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West and other Labour Members. However, it is unclear to me at this time what recommendations one could put in the form of legislation to be put before the House that would command the majority needed to make sensible legislation, to allow the country to move forward in the 1990s.

Neither the Government nor Parliament can decide with confidence on the options for reform until questions about the compatibility of the Sunday trading provisions of the Shops Act 1950 with article 30 of the treaty of Rome, which deals with free trade, are answered. I remind Labour Members that that article, which was signed in 1972, was referred by another place to the European Court of Justice, and that question of compatibility must be resolved.

Many of the proposed options, particularly those advanced by the Keep Sunday Special campaign, would continue to restrict Sunday trading by a class or list of goods. Whether or not agreement could be reached, it would not be sensible to settle policy on the merits of any proposals until their compatibility with Community law could be determined. There is nothing new in that concept.

This week, Labour Members announced that they are total Europeans, believe 100 per cent. in Europe, and that theirs is the party of Europe. I am therefore surprised to hear the hon. Member for Ogmore express concern at our reluctance to reach a decision until the European Court of Justice makes its pronouncement. I thought that the hon. Member for Ogmore and other Labour Members would be anxious to await that judgment.

When we joined the European Community some 20 years ago, Parliament decided that our own courts should refer questions of international compatibility in law to the European Court. I made it clear on 27 November that we intend to bring forward proposals for Sunday trading once the legal position is clear.

Mr. Randall: The right hon. Lady is skating on thin ice.

Mrs. Rumbold: Not at all. The hon. Gentleman is absolutely wrong about that. I am convinced that if the hon. Gentleman were ever in a position of responsibility in the House—the likelihood of which is becoming increasingly remote—he would also find himself advised that it would be foolish to put before the House proposals which in a few weeks or months might fall outside the law.

I point out to the hon. Member for Ogmore that the Sunday trading laws could be suspended only by primary legislation. It would be neither right in principle nor practicable to introduce such a Bill. An order made by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department under section 43(1) of the Shops Act 1950 would only lift the requirement for shops to close ordinarily by 8 pm on Sundays. It would not affect the suspension of the Sunday trading provisions of the 1950 Act.

I was asked why we cannot suspend the law, and I have explained why that would not be possible. I have also been asked whether it would be possible to make partial exemption orders under section 48(1) of the Shops Act. That, too, would not meet the purpose: such orders require protracted and elaborate consultation on the part of local authorities with local traders. Except in emergencies, the orders allow only for the sale of additional grocery provisions such as bread, flour, fish and confectionery until 10 pm on Sundays.

The hon. Member for Ogmore said that the opinion polls demonstrated that only a limited number of people would be interested in total deregulation. Other polls have been published in the newspapers, however, and the issue has gained a good deal of attention over the past few weeks. I have experienced some of it personally. People from the newspapers foolishly park outside my home on Sundays, I suspect to see either whether I go shopping or whether I go to church. As they are parked outside in their cars, I do neither: I find it quite irritating to have my Sundays plotted. I dig the garden, or wrap my Christmas presents. That seems to me a better way of spending Sundays—among my family. Opinion polls always give different answers depending on the questions that have been asked, and I suggest that the hon. Gentleman should not place too much emphasis on the outcome.

The hon. Gentleman referred to another issue in which I take a good deal of interest—women and work. I am very concerned about women, their rights and how they are looked after and protected at work. I am keen for them to have a greater opportunity to develop both their working and their family lives. I place equal emphasis on both aspects. The majority of women—and, indeed, the majority of men—are feeling that they must start protecting family life.

The hon. Gentleman suggested that women might feel that they were under considerable pressure to work on Sundays. I understand his point, but many women have written to me asking us specifically not to prevent them from working on Sundays. Many said that they welcomed the opportunity to work, and were not able to do so during the week because there was no one look after their children. They therefore chose to look after their children during the week, and to allow their husbands to do so while they went to work on Sundays. That is a matter of choice, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would not wish to deny people the opportunity of employment.

One of the common threads that have emerged from my dicussions has been the necessity, when considering how the law might be reformed, of tackling the question of protecting employees from being obliged by their employers to work on Sundays, against their wishes, or incurring any penalty for not doing so. It is a matter of great concern that employees should receive proper rewards for working on Sundays. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) assumes that I have been sitting drinking cups of coffee and not talking to people about the issues. That is foolish of him, because we have discovered that there is agreement more or less across the spectrum.

The Government generally take the view that matters of pay and hours are better left to negotiation between employers and employees, or by their representatives, and that they should certainly not be dealt with in legislation or in codes of practice provided for in statute. Employees aggrieved by the actions of their employers may seek redress through the courts or at an industrial tribunal.

The Government recognise the importance of personal conscience in this context and included a measure of protection for existing shop workers against being made to work on Sundays in the Shops Bill which was debated by the House in 1986. I assure hon. Members that we readily acknowledge the strength of feeling about that aspect of Sunday trading and will take it fully into account when we draw up proposals for the reform of the law. I shall be more than happy to comply with that undertaking.

The Member for Ogmore also asked me to consider the question of enforcement. As he and the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West know, my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, in his personal capacity as Law Officer of the Crown and not as a Minister, came to the House to inform it how he intended to proceed. He made clear on 27 November what he felt was the best action for him to take in his capacity as a Law Officer. I deprecate the rather ungracious and ill-considered words of the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West in referring to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General. That was unnecessary and completely wrong. The Attorney-General has made clear to the House the position under the law and it is important that the House should recognise that.

The hon. Member for Ogmore also raised the question of the Robert George case. Contrary to press reports, Sunday working was not the central issue in that case. The crux of the matter was the overall length and organisation of working hours during a peak session and their impact on the employee and his particular family circumstances. The industrial tribunal that heard that case accepted that it was undesirable for employees to be prevented from taking time off with their families, although there were other issues involved. In that case, Sunday was the only day on which such time off with the family was possible. That would not necessarily apply to all cases.

The hon. Gentleman must remember that many people are willing to work overtime, including Sundays, at peak periods. The hon. Gentleman will recognise that many people work on Sundays to deliver our emergency services. Many do that by choice. The men and women in the national health service go into our hospitals and work exceedingly hard, not necessarily by choice, but because it is part of the work that they undertake to do. The same is true of the police and the law enforcement officers generally, and of many people who man the emergency services, such as the fire service.

Mr. Powell: I was not referring to a press report of the Robert George case. I listened to Robert George at a conference at which he gave chapter and verse of the detail of his case. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) was present at the conference when Robert George was on the platform. I was referring not to press reports, but to my conversation with the gentleman concerned. His statement to the conference and to me personally was that it was a Sunday issue. The fact was that he did not want to work on Sunday. He had worked for the same firm for 16 years without working on a Sunday because of his objection to working on a Sunday and his wish to stay at home and then to go to church.

Mrs. Rumbold: As I said, the industrial tribunal accepted that employees should be able to take time off with their families. He wanted to take Sunday off and spend it with his family. However, the principle of Sunday trading was not at the heart of the judgment.

I am sure that this will not be the last occasion on which we shall debate this issue. There are many difficulties involved, not least with regard to the application of the law, given that we must wait for the judgment of the European Court of Justice. No doubt we will hear the views of the hon. Member for Ogmore once that judgment is made. I understand that he is likely to bring forward proposals in a ten-minute Bill in the not-too-distant future and I will listen to that debate with great interest. I am here to listen to all my colleagues and to all hon. Members and anyone else who wishes to make representations to me. I am interested in possible solutions. If the solutions of the hon. Member for Ogmore command great support, we will consider them with great interest.

I am convinced that it would be foolish for the Government to formulate policy until we are clear, from the European Court, what that policy should avoid so as not to become entangled in the law. I can assure the hon. Member for Ogmore that once the legislative procedure is clarified, the Government will be more than anxious to end the anomalies and the present situation in which people are unclear and therefore feel free to take the law into their own hands. We are not anxious to see the situation evolve. We want to take control of the situation, but it is no use hon. Members like the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West telling me that we should have a conference and then table a Bill and that would be the end of the matter. Were it that easy, we would have done that three or four years ago. It is not that easy. People must understand that the issue is difficult and needs a great deal of give and take. They must also understand that the issue is very important for the people of this country.

At the end of the day, I hope that there will be a general recognition that Sunday is different and that we all, from time to time, need a breathing space during the working week. The legislation that we intend to introduce will have to have the support of the House and the different interests will have to be brought together before such legislation can be introduced.

Iraq

7.22 am

Miss Emma Nicholson (Torridge and Devon, West): I am extremely grateful to have the opportunity to raise this issue and I am glad that my hon. Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs is present, because I know that he will listen with his usual thoughtfulness, great knowledge and understanding of the problems that I will enunciate. I am glad that he is to reply, because I am confident about his knowledge of this large subject.

Although this place has heard tales of much horror and beastliness over the many generations that hon. Members have spoken about the plight of victims throughout the history of this place, I suggest that the plight of the people whose human rights we will discuss this morning transcends almost every other horror that we have heard here.

Genocide is a very heavy word. It is a word which is mostly only used when we discuss Hitler's treatment of the Jews or when we consider Cambodia. Some appalling things have happened to those poor people, but the plight of the Shias in the south of Iraq matches, and possibly even surpasses, the horrors that those poor people suffered. It is difficult to think of that. I visited Auschwitz last year. It is impossible to get it out of one's mind once one has been there. Indeed, having been brought up after the war and having heard of the plight of those poor people, one has never forgotten it in any case.

Of course, that left me with a large question—how could people ignore what happened to the Jews? How could people turn a blind eye or a deaf ear to the horrors that they suffered? Having seen the Shias in the refugee camps in south Iran and in south-east Iraq, I can understand at last how it is possible to ignore such appalling things. The reason is that when the reality is so truly appalling, it transcends everyone's imagination. One cannot absorb it and one just turns off.

Perhaps the way not to turn off is to think of individuals. Mr. Al Sultan is a primary school teacher of about 45, a civilian, not a man who joined the army—he is an educated man, a graduate. He taught in a primary school near Basra. Mr. Al Sultan is now a shrivelled, blackened person. His poor hands are black claws with burns from napalm bombing. He has no eyelids. He cannot sleep. His eyelids have been burnt off. He puts a scarf around his head to try to sleep. He has 90 per cent. burns all over his poor body. He is damaged beyond repair. He will never be able to write because he will not be able to use his hands. His pain is unending.

Perhaps the worst victim—if there can be a worst victim—is little Amar, the youngest and worst napalm victim to have survived. He is a boy of 10. Amar cannot sleep, either, but he cannot sleep because he cannot forget. His whole family, save a sister, were destroyed in March. His sister is still living, because she is in a hospital next door. The doctors fear that if they tell him that she is alive and she dies, the psychological trauma will be so enormous that he will give up completely.

Little Amar does not have a face any more. His face looks like a Halloween mask—fixed and rigid; a shiny mask all over his face. His neck cannot move; it is fused rigid. If he takes his clothes off, which he does not do very easily because it hurts so much, one sees open wounds from the top of his chest down to his toes. Amar cannot smile, he cannot cry, he cannot laugh—he cannot do anything because he has no muscles in his face, no nerves, no nothing. He has no ability to move anything at all. I am raising money for him at the moment. Kind surgeons have offered to operate on him, if only we can get him over here. But nothing will ever make up for Amar for the total loss of mother, father, entire family, house and everything.

One could say that Amar and Mr. Al Sultan are lucky. Despite their pain and suffering, they have got out—they have got away. They have been taken across the border—illegally. They have been smuggled out—out of Basra, out of their village, into the safe haven of Iran. Let us think for a moment about some of those who have been left behind.

There is an underground prison outside Basra. There, 700 men are said to have been imprisoned underground, without daylight, for 11 years. It is said that the stench is so appalling that no one can go near them now. They have long hair and long nails and, not unnaturally, a white pallor, and very little to eat. God knows how they are still alive.

Another one who got out is a doctor who translated for me. He went back into Iraq, in the marshes, at great personal danger to himself and translated for me when we met some Shias. He is a well-educated and articulate man. It is appalling to hear a doctor describe, with the detailed anatomical knowledge that only a doctor can have, exactly what happened to his poor body when he was tortured ceaselessly, unendingly, with just short gaps to let him regain consciousness, for weeks on end. That went on intermittently, sometimes for weeks at a time, for nine years. That poor man also finds it difficult to sleep.

Our short time for debate this morning should be given to those victims. A woman in a refugee camp outside the city of Ahwaz in the south of Iran said, "Take my voice to the world. Let the world hear my voice." That is what I want to do this morning. Those people have no voice themselves. That is the point about victims throughout the world—someone has to speak for them. But it is difficult to get there and to find people being tortured; it is such a horrible activity that it is done in secret. It is difficult to find people who have been tortured—so many of them are still in prison or have died.

The fate of those who are still living and of the hostages who are now being held by the regime in Iraq is not being decided by a beneficent Government. We have our wrangles in this place, but essentially we have a beneficent democracy. Most of us believe that we are here to do the greatest good for the greatest number of people. That is what drives us on. We differ on detail and sometimes on deep philosophical attitudes and questions, but none the less, our differences pale into nothing if we compare our beneficent democracy—which we have inherited, not created ourselves—with the wicked rule in Iraq and some other countries.

The fate of those people is being decided far away from where they are. It is being decided in Washington—perhaps by people in the Pentagon; perhaps by George Bush. If only we could persuade George Bush to look back at Iraq to see what has been left behind. Their fate is being decided in the United Nations, by the committees which endlessly discuss and debate and churn out pieces of paper that nobody seems to read. Even the United Nations Security Council, which has given thought and time to the plight of those troubled people, the Kurds, does not appear to have given any thought or time to the plight of the people in the south of Iraq, the Shia.

Their fate is being decided in the Hague, where a great man, a former Foreign Minister of the Netherlands Government, Mr. Van der Stoel, published his interim report as special rapporteur on Iraq and human rights on 17 November. His final report comes out in February.

Their fate is being decided in Geneva where, to my great sadness, Prince Sadruddin Aga Khan resigned last week from his post as special United Nations high commissioner for refugees in Iraq because he had spent the previous 10 days in Baghdad, trying to persuade Saddam Hussein to ease the plight of his people.

Their fate is also being decided here in London, where our Foreign and Commonwealth Office and our Minister for Overseas Development, with whom I have had many talks on this large subject are doing all that they can to help.

I pay a special tribute to my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development. During the summer and early autumn she helped me with Government aid and guided me in the direction of private aid. She helped me with advice, support and encouragement to bring humanitarian aid to the Shias who have escaped and are in the camps in south Iran. That has been monumental help, but it has not been just practical help.

With about £0·5 million that I have collected, a large sum of it from the Minister and other sums from other places, I went and bought, and watched the purchase, delivery, consumption and use of the simple bare necessities of people in the camps. Those necessities are sacks of flour and sacks of rice, although I am glad to say that the Iranian Government are now providing flour for every refugee within their borders, and certainly for the Shias. That is no mean undertaking, because Iran has 3·5 million refugees within its borders, the largest number of any member nation of the United Nations. The Red Crescent has the most work to do of any member of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

The aid, including children's shoes and cooking oil—the simple, basic things—has been of large benefit to many thousands of refugees in Iran. Their plight is indeed a miserable one, but, as they say, they do not want charity. They want to be back at home. They want to be in a free and democratic Iraq where they can vote for their leaders and have a democratically accountable Parliament.

I say a warm thanks on behalf of those refugees to the Minister for Overseas Development, whose help has been inestimable, whose competence is great and known to us all and whose officials work with such commitment, concern and effectiveness—I can vouch for that. I know that my right hon. Friend will continue to do everything that she can, and that is a great deal.

When one is in the refugee camps, Mr. Speaker, people crowd around. You and I have been to many refugee camps in many parts of the world. I am aware that you know some of the most difficult parts of the world, such as Pakistan, where you have seen things of great importance and many suffering people. You might have seen refugees out of Afghanistan there. It is impossible to compare one person's suffering with that of another. Why should one victim be any more important or any more identified here than another victim? Surely, human suffering is all of a piece.

I suggest that there is something particularly inhuman and unbearable about the deliberate wiping out of a section of the population. I always thought that apartheid was one of the worst possible sins because it identifies someone and goes for them on the basis of the colour of their skin. The extermination being carried out in Iraq is of that order and type. If one is a Shia, one will be killed.

It is not an easy death. The kind of deaths that Saddam Hussein and his people pursue include a method of execution which involves simply lining people up in rows and running tanks over them. It includes pushing people out of helicopters in full flight. It includes killing babies in front of mothers. I have seen the evidence. It includes horrific torture of defenceless human bodies. You can see the arms, the legs, the faces, the bodies. You can see the marks and the twisted limbs bent beyond repair for ever. You hear what the people tell you.

Of course, when we left Kuwait, we knew that we had done a good job of work. We had brought Kuwait back to have its own rulers. We believed it to be right and proper to honour the sovereign borders of Iraq, and we withdrew. Perhaps we did not foresee—although perhaps people in the Foreign Office did—that Saddam Hussein would turn against his own people and that the brave Kurds and Shias would rise up against him, but would fail.

Since then, we have witnessed the genocidal attack on the people in the north and south who opposed him. Those people are on our side. They want democracy and freedom of speech. Not only is there no freedom of speech in Iraq, there is no freedom of listening. If one is caught with a radio, it is assumed that one has been listening to the BBC World Service and one is killed, as an old lady of 85 was the other day, when I was there.

The position is even worse if one is caught even on suspicion of not wanting to hurt other people. One can be hounded to death for that. Such a story was told by a man in a refugee camp near the border who has just got out. His brother was a general in Hussein's army until last month. He could take no more of the killing and somehow he must have indicated that, by some sign or language or something he said or did not say. Or perhaps it was simply that he did not rush fast enough to kill people. Saddam ordered his brother officers to get petrol, to pour it down the man's throat and to puncture a hole in his stomach and set light to him. His brother watched him burn. He did not tell anyone that he was his brother. He decided to come out and tell the tale.

Then there is the women who watched her husband being executed. She was one of 700 women who were lined up to watch their husbands being run over by tanks. The stories are endless and the appalling fact is that they are true. It is not easy to get there, to speak to people and to gain their confidence so that they will talk.

I respect and admire the part that the Iranian Government and people have played in keeping their borders open and in offering hospitality to their many hundreds of thousands of unwanted guests. I have a large respect for the Iranians, who have been my hosts on visits, and I hope that they will be my hosts on future visits. We seem content to let Iran get on with it. Is that because it is far away or that they had a triumphant war? Is it because we feel that those people, after all, are not us and do not pass the language, cricket or some other test? Does our insularity make us say that we are part of Europe, but we go no further than that? Are we a people of such narrow imagination that we discard our past and understanding of those places?

Shall we respond to the people in the camps and marshes who say, "We trust the British. They have had several hundred years of knowledge of us and we know that they will not let us down. Thank God for the British"? I do not think we have that short a memory. But if we let those people suffer, we shall be as ashamed of ourselves as many people must have felt about deliberately not listening to the plight of the Jews in Europe in the second world war.

If we ignore those people, let us do so in the knowledge of the suffering on which we are deliberately turning our backs. I know that we in the United Kingdom do not take that point of view. We have a Foreign Office which is full of knowledge and understanding, as is our chargé-d'affaires in Tehran. As I said, our Minister dealing with aid matters extends herself beyond the capacity of everything that could be asked of her, as does my hon. Friend the Under-Secretary who is to reply to the debate.

Can we not somehow bring alive again the other major players in this most devilish of games, the sacrifice of human rights in Iraq? Can we not get them to do something and not respond and succumb to the continuing blandishments of Saddam Hussein?

7.45 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): Clearly there are other hon. Members who wish to get in, but I am afraid that the debate started later than was anticipated.

Saddam Hussein's blatant disregard of internationally accepted norms of behaviour is certainly beyond dispute. The human rights record of the Iraqi Government is appalling and has been graphically added to in the catalogue of further horrors that have been perpetrated, as described by my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson).

The abuses inflicted by the Iraqi dictatorship include also the use of chemical weapons against its own unarmed people in 1988, appalling atrocities committed during the occupation of Kuwait, the mistreatment of western hostages and prisoners and, most recently, as alluded to by my hon. Friend, the brutal suppression of uprisings and the denial of human rights and torture of the civilian population in Iraq. All this has been well documented and in the spine-chilling descriptions that my hon. Friend has produced in these early hours we have further information to alarm and depress us.

In addition to all these specific cruelties, the Iraqi regime continues to show complete disregard of the welfare of its own citizens. I will touch in rather more general terms than did my hon. Friend on the situation in Iraq in that regard.

The United Nations and the other international agencies have done what they can to protect the Iraqi people from the worst of these excesses and to provide basic shelter, food and medicine. We and our coalition partners have also made a considerable contribution. Thanks to the initiative of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, safe havens were established in northern Iraq and an enormous international relief effort was mounted to sustain the civil population there. The coalition deterrent force which we maintain in southern Turkey continues to provide valuable reassurance to all Iraqis and to deter further repression by the regime. Iraq must now take advantage of the mechanism provided by the United Naitons to sell oil to finance humanitarian supplies. The Iraqi authorities now have in their own hands the opportunity to alleviate the suffering of their own people.

Perhaps it would be helpful to the House if I gave a brief description of the situation in the north and in the south of the country. If the hon. Member for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) wishes to intervene I will accept an intervention from her. I am sorry that I could not enable her to speak.

We are concerned, of course, by reports of a blockade by the Iraqi authorities on the Kurdish north and by limited clashes in the area. We have made our concerns known to the Iraqis on many occasions and as recently as 9 December. The Iraqi authorities and the Kurds now seem to have agreed a series of measures which will allow the situation in the north to return to normal. We expect those measures to be implemented.

The United Nations Commissioner for Human Rights has reported that the winterisation programme in the north is now complete. We are also informed that he can cope with the recently reported increase in the number of displaces Kurds. We remain in close touch with him and have confirmed our willingness to provide further help if needed.

We have made it clear many times to the Iraqi authorities that we expect them to co-operate with the United Nations and the international relief agencies. We have also warned that further oppression and violations of Security Council resolution 688 will have serious consequences.

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): The Minister claims that there is an agreement between the Kurds and the Iraqi authorities. As the hon. Gentleman knows, I was in the area a short time ago, and my understanding of events is entirely different. There is an economic blockade; negotiations have taken place to try to lift it, but the blockade continues. There are people on hunger strike, as the hon. Gentleman knows, in Sulaymaniyah. They are protesting against the economic blockade, which is causing fuel and food shortages. The administrators of major cities are no longer being paid by the Iraqi authorities.

The Minister said that the winterisation programme is complete. I understand that the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees issued a press release three weeks ago that stated that tents were a rare sight in northern Iraq and the winterisation programme had gone on apace. The commissioner has revised that statement and now claims that up to 400,000 refugees will need additional cover and that the winterisation programme will be extended. He agrees with many observers that the plight of the Kurds, as the winter approaches, is extreme. The means are not available at present to provide protection against a severe winter, food shortages and medical supply shortages. I ask the Minister to reconsider these matters.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am grateful to the hon. Lady for what she has said. The winterisation programme is a moving target to some extent. We have been given the assurances that I reported to the House. The existing programme will meet the needs of about half a million people during the winter months. It will lead to the repairing and upgrading of hospitals and will provide shelter and water supplies. Thousands of kerosene stoves, blankets and tents are being distributed. The hon. Lady will know that the United Kingdom's contribution to the international relief effort since April amounts to about £44 million.

Perhaps it will be of help to the House if I commented on the situation in the south. I shall then have to move on fairly rapidly to conclude my remarks.

The United Nations has a humanitarian centre at Basra. It has been pressing the Iraqis to permit the establishment of a further humanitarian centre at Nasariya, which is close to the marshes. The Iraqis have refused so far. We strongly support an expansion of the United Nations presence in the south. We have raised our concern about the south directly with the Iraqis, with the United Nations and with Mr. Van der Stoel, to whom my hon. Friend the Member for Torridge and Devon, West referred, who is the United Nations rapporteur on human rights in Iraq. My hon. Friend the Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office has met representatives of the Shia community to hear from them about the situation at first hand.

Since September, we have given £1 million to UNICEF for medicines, water and sanitation in the south, £78,000 to the Save the Children Fund for water and sanitation in the south, and almost £700,000 to organisations that are working to help refugees from southern Iraq and south-west Iran.

I made some brief comments about the winterisation programme. I shall not proceed further in that direction.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): The Minister says that violations of resolution 688 will have serious consequences. That statement has been made repeatedly from the Government Dispatch Box over the past six months. Will the Minister tell us what the serious consequences will be?

The Minister talked about the Iraqi Government resisting the arrangements to which he referred in the south. Is it not true that under resolution 688 the Iraqi Government are required to comply with United Nations requirements on aid and humanitarian assistance. Why do we not enforce that resolution?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that I shall not spell out or make policies at the Dispatch Box in the early hours of the morning on precisely what measures may be being considered and might be implemented. He has heard the position and I cannot add to it.

There is a great deal of concern in the country—I receive a lot of correspondence—about the effect of the sanctions regime on the civilian population. Our quarrel is with the regime, not with the long-suffering Iraqi people, but it must be recognised that Saddam Hussein's misguided policies have brought Iraq to its present position. He continues to inflict suffering on his people by his stubborn refusal to implement Security Council resolutions in full. We want all the Iraqi people to be able to receive food, medicine and humanitarian supplies, which is why we have contributed more than £44 million to the international relief effort since April this year.

A mechanism exists to enable Iraq to import all the humanitarian supplies that it needs. It was set out in Security Council resolutions 706 and 712, which allow Iraq to export $1·6 billion worth—although the total is subject to review—of oil over six months, to finance the purchase of essential humanitarian supplies. Those resolutions are mandatory. We expect Iraq to co-operate in implementing them.

Iraq is now discussing the arrangements with the United Nations, but the Iraqi regime's failure to implement the scheme promptly is preventing the Iraqi people from receiving humanitarian assistance. There can be no doubt that Saddam Hussein bears full responsibility for that—[Interruption.] The hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) keeps interrupting from a sedentary position. If he will forgive me, I shall make my own speech in my own way.

In spite of all the efforts of the international community, many Iraqis are still living in desperate fear of the regime. The achievement of Prince Sadruddin, the UN Secretary General's executive delegate, in securing an extension of the agreement covering UN operations in Iraq, including the UN guards, will have given some reassurance to the civilian population, but continued international pressure is necessary to prevent further excesses occurring and to ensure that all the people of Iraq can live without fear of intimidation, repression or attack. We shall maintain sanctions until Iraq has implemented UN Security Council resolutions in full. Only when the Iraqi people have the freedom to choose their leadership openly and democratically will they be able to enjoy the human rights to which they are justly entitled.

7.58 am

Mrs. Ann Clwyd (Cynon Valley): That is a most unsatisfactory reply to a serious and deteriorating problem in Iraq. I congratulate the hon. Member for Torridge and Devon, West (Miss Nicholson) on her moving speech. She has taken a particular interest in the plight of the Shias, and I have taken a particular interest in the plight of the Kurds and in human rights in Iraq over a very long time.

I am deeply worried about the bad situation. Western television crews are now going to Iraq. They will again see Kurds dying on the mountainsides this winter, the Shias continuing to die in the marshes of southern Iraq, and people continuing to be rounded up by Saddam Hussein in Baghdad and elsewhere in Iraq. People were tortured in Iraq prisons for many years before the Government recognised the violation of human rights that was going on in Iraq, about which some of us have been concerned for many years.

Miss Emma Nicholson: Will the hon. Lady give way?

Mrs. Clwyd: No, I am not giving way.

The Government must deal with the plight of the Iraqis. They have promised so much to the Kurds. The safe haven was looked on as something which would continue to ensure that the Kurds would be safe. They have been let down, and feel that they have been let down. An old Kurdish man who had fled for the third time told me just the other week, "John Major promised us a hammer—where is the hammer?" That is what people are asking over and over again.

People are on hunger strike in Sulaymaniyah: one person has died and others undoubtedly will die soon. They are trying to draw the attention of the world, the allies, the Prime Minister of this country and the President of the United States to the promises that they and others made. All the United Nations resolutions are in place; they are supposed to protect——

Mr. Chris Mullin (Sunderland, South): The matter that I wish to raise has been described by the chairman of the Bar Council, Tony Scrivener QC, as a landmark case and it will be of particular interest to members of the royal commission who are considering under what circumstances confession evidence should be admitted.

The case demonstrates that, despite the safeguards provided by the Police and Criminal Evidence Act 1984, West Midlands police officers are still able to persuade people to confess to crimes that they did not commit and even to tape-record those false confessions. It demonstrates that all the bland assurances—we may hear more of them later—that everything has been fine since PACE are nonsense.

The case also shows that, even when West Midlands police officers have been caught fabricating confessions and attempting to pervert the course of justice, they can rely on their superiors, up to the chief constable himself, to make sure that the truth is covered up. They can rely on the Crown prosecution service to connive in the disappearance of inconvenient evidence. They can rely on the silence of the police authority to whom the chief constable is supposed to account. Finally, they can rely on the Home Office to block any inquiries from inquisitive Members of Parliament.

They can rely, too, on the silence of the local media. It is a feature of almost all the great scandals in the west midlands that new information rarely, if ever, emerges as a result of the efforts of the Birmingham-based media. In this case, once again the truth has emerged only due to the diligence of local solicitors and the Granada television programme, "World in Action." Once again, the local media come limping along behind and, once again, they can be relied upon to drop the subject within a few days as soon as the outsiders have departed.

We shall be told in a moment to relax, as the matter is being examined by the West Yorkshire police. Why should we have the slightest confidence in the ability of the West Yorkshire police to get at the truth? They have just completed, at enormous cost to the taxpayer, a lengthy inquiry into the activities of the West Midlands serious crime squad. I have read their report. In many respects it is a thorough document and makes sensible recommendations, but it has one central flaw. Nowhere can the West Yorkshire officers bring themselves to state what everyone knows to be the truth: that West Midlands detectives have, over a long period, been fabricating confessions. Instead, the report talks coyly about entries in pocket books that are "less than satisfactory" and "working practices that give cause for concern".
There have been the usual handful of retirements on grounds of ill health, but most of the officers involved are now back on duty. No one, as far as I am aware, has been properly held to account for anything and I will be amazed if anyone ever is. In the circumstances, I hope that the Minister will forgive me if I do not take too seriously any claim that the West Yorkshire police can be relied upon to get to the truth.

I shall now set out the facts surrounding the death of PC Tony Salt. On the evening of Saturday 16 April 1989, PC Salt and his colleague PC Mark Berry were assigned to keep watch on an illegal night club in the Small Heath district of Birmingham. They were to keep watch from a private flat in Whitehall road. They were in plain clothes and their job was to remain in hiding, logging people and cars as they arrived at the club.

Unfortunately, however, by 9 pm Messrs Salt and Berry had abandoned their observation post and commenced a drinking spree at a local pub, the Grapes in Green lane. At 11 pm, somewhat the worse for wear, they returned to duty, but at about 1 am they returned to the pub for a bout of after-hours drinking. PC Berry later admitted that by the time they left the pub for the second time they had each consumed seven or eight pints of beer, one short and half a can of super-strength lager. Witnesses say that they had difficulty in standing and one gives an account of a fierce argument between them when Berry suggested that they return to their post and Salt wanted to remain for another drink. Apparently, someone had to come between them to prevent a fight.

They left the pub again at about 2 am and Berry returned to the observation post. Salt, however, wandered down the alleyway that they were supposed to be observing, in the direction of the illegal party. About 20 minutes later, Berry saw Salt collapse at the mouth of the alley. He was dead on arrival at hospital.

The next day, Assistant Chief Constable Tom Meffen, held a press conference at which he gave a version of PC Salt's death which was loyally reported by the local media for many months. I am acquainted with Mr. Meffen, as he was the officer who in September 1986 was summoned to the Home Office—dragged by the scruff of the neck, as he put it—to interview me about my claim that the people convicted of the Birmingham pub bombings were innocent. In this case, as in that of the pub bombings, Mr. Meffen has a few questions to answer.

At the press conference, Mr. Meffen asserted that PC Salt had broken cover to check a suspect car and was set upon by a person or persons with martial arts skills, dragged into the alley and beaten to death. That was nonsense. In fact, there never was a suspect car and Salt never broke cover—he was on his way back from trying to get into the party. I understand that the West Midlands police now say that Mr. Meffen has no clear idea of where he got the information but that he thinks it was from a private conversation with PC Berry. That is odd, because, although Mr. Berry has given many different accounts of what happened that night, none corresponds with Mr. Meffen's.

Four statements given by PC Berry have so far been disclosed, the last apparently obtained after he had been interviewed under hypnosis. In addition, there is at least one other known interview, the notes of which have not been disclosed; nor has the record of the interview under hypnosis which was videoed and which would be of great interest as the statement based on that interview is still some distance from the whole truth.

According to a statement by a colleague who was called to the scene, PC Berry at first said that he thought that PC Salt had had a fit. He made no mention of an attack. In his first formal statement, Berry said that he saw a West Indian leave the alleyway three or four minutes before Salt staggered out. There was no one else in sight and he went to Salt's aid immediately.

Mr. Berry's statement says that Salt was followed out of the alley by a West Indian who "appeared to be involved in PC Salt's collapse" and stole from his body. Berry maintains in this version that he went immediately to Salt's aid.

Mr. Berry's third statement—it is not every day that there are four statements from the same police officer, all differing so substantially—contains two West Indians, one with dreadlocks, who appeared to push Salt from the alleyway. This time Berry says that he was too scared to get involved straight away.

By the fourth and final statement, Mr. Berry claims for the first time to have seen Salt stumbling into the alley in the direction of the illegal nightclub two or three minutes before stumbling out again and collapsing. He now remembers a detailed description of the West Indian said to have robbed Mr. Salt. It therefore became urgent—especially in the light of Mr. Meffen's statement—to find someone to take responsibility for Mr. Salt's death. In due course, three West Indians were arrested and what happened to them will be of interest to anyone who believes that tape or video recording is the answer to the problem of statements in police custody.

The three were at first told that they were being asked to assist with inquiries by identifying from photographs people who had attended the party. That was false. It is clear from questions put earlier to PC Berry that they were already suspects. The arrested men were Peter Gibbs, Mark Samuels and Tony Francis. None fitted the description given by PC Berry in his second statement of an assailant with dreadlocks. Indeed, no more was ever heard about the man with dreadlocks.

Gibbs was taken to Queen's road police station where several of the Birmingham Six were persuaded to sign confessions that later proved false. No custody record exists of Gibbs' visit. There he was interviewed by DC 9669 Gerald Harris and DC 7782 Gerald Doyle. This is Gibbs' version of what happened:

"They were saying you can either do it peacefully or we can do it rough. I've been beaten up before in police stations and its not very nice. I wasn't prepared to go through all that again."

Eventually, he agreed to admit to stealing PC Salt's wallet and a martial arts weapon called a cubiton that Salt was thought to be carrying.

Mr. Gibbs then describes how, once he had agreed to admit the thefts, he was carefully rehearsed in what he was to say once the recorder was switched on:

"They started going over the story with me, over and over again, so I could get it correct, so that it could fit in with everything else. They planned everything out before I went into the interview room."

He was then taken to Belgrave road where his statement was taped. The custody record commences only with his arrival at Belgrave road.

Mark Samuels and Tony Francis were taken to Sparkhill police station. Again, there is no custody record of the dress rehearsal. Samuels was interviewed by DS 7263 Alan Shakespeare and DS 7253 Richard Davies. This is Mr. Samuels' account of the interview:

"I was there in Sparkhill for nine and half hours, with nothing on half the time and they try telling me 'you're going to get done for murder if you don't own up to this theft'. I just took the easy way out."

Samuels was then taken to Belgrave road where the custody record commences, and in due course he confessed on tape to stealing PC Salt's wallet and cubiton.

Tony Francis was the doorman at the party which Salt and Berry were supposed to be observing. He was also taken to Sparkhill police station and questioned for most of the day, although there is no record of his presence there. He was interviewed by DS 2487 Richard Leary and DC 2344 Michael Howkins, both members of the now disbanded serious crimes squad. He describes what happened:

"I was intimidated, slapped around. Threats were made against my family."

Mr. Francis says that he agreed to make a statement because he was told that, if he did not, drugs would be found in his house which would have led to a gaol sentence for his girlfriend and the loss of his children. On tape he agreed that Tony Salt had tried to gain entrance to the party and that he had prevented him. All three were then charged with murder. Gibbs and Samuels, who had only been persuaded to confess to stealing, say that the police officers laughed as they revealed that they were being charged with murder and not theft.

Meanwhile, there was another witness to be squared. Seventeen-year-old Simone Armstrong had originally told police that Samuels and Gibbs had left the party well before PC Salt's death. She was persuaded to make a second statement saying that she had seen Francis hit Salt and had also seen Gibbs and Samuels rob him. She describes how this was achieved:

"There were more than five men and one woman in the room with me. They were all shouting and I was crying. They were saying, 'You did see it' and putting things into my head . . . I just couldn't take no more so I said to them, 'Just write down what you want to write down, okay?'"

The officer to whom Simone Armstrong's second statement was dictated was DS Michael Swinnerton. Students of the West Midlands serious crimes squad will recall that he was also the officer who achieved the remarkable feat of noting down, by torchlight, a lengthy confession from Hassan Khan in a police car travelling at high speed. His evidence was disbelieved by the Court of Appeal and Mr. Khan's conviction was quashed.

No sooner had the men been charged than things began to go wrong. A taxi driver was found who said that he had taken Gibbs and Samuels from the party some time before PC Salt died. Two pathologists said that, even if Francis had hit Salt at the entrance to the party, the blow could not have killed him. Nor did they believe that his injury—a blow to the neck which ruptured a blood vessel and caused a brain haemorrhage—had been inflicted at the entrance to the party, since he could not have staggered 120 ft back to the street. The pathologists believed that the most likely explanation for his death was that, in his drunken state, Mr. Salt had fallen and hit his head on the bucket of a JCB digger parked nearby. Most damaging of all, PC Salt's widow made a statement saying that she had found the missing cubiton—the one the two defendants had confessed for stealing—on the floor of the family car. That was very embarrassing. The defendants had also confessed to stealing £30 from PC Salt's wallet, but in her statement Mrs. Salt says that her husband had only £5 on him that evening.

The fate of Mrs. Salt's statement is of particular interest. It was not among the documents later disclosed to the defence by the Crown prosecution service. Its absence was noticed only because there were gaps in the numbered pages of the evidence that was disclosed.

There is a long history of inconvenient evidence being suppressed by the police and by the Crown. This is a classic case. I have written to the Attorney-General asking for an explanation. I understand that the official responsible for the case at the west midlands office of the CPS was a Mr. R. J. Millard.

Despite the evident collapse of the case, it took a year for the charges to be dropped. Many prominent people played a part in covering up the truth. The coroner closed the inquest without hearing the full evidence.

Remarkably, PC Berry was allowed to retire on health grounds, his pension intact. There have been a lot of retirements on health grounds in the West Midlands police lately. I assume that the decision not to press any criminal or disciplinary charges against Mr. Berry was taken at a high level.

A memorial service was held in September 1989, six months after PC Salt's death. By that time many people in high places knew or had a good idea of the truth, but no one let on. The chief constable, Mr. Geoffrey Dear, attended the memorial service and spoke warmly of the deceased.

This case is yet another scandal for which Mr. Dear, as the then chief constable, must take ultimate responsibility. Incredible though it may seem, he has since been promoted to Her Majesty's chief inspector of constabulary and is now responsible for enforcing standards throughout the region.

So far as I am aware—perhaps the Minister will tell us otherwise—none of the police officers responsible for extracting the fraudulent confessions or losing Mrs. Salt's statement has suffered the merest inconvenience. Most of the officers involved continue to maintain the rule of law in the west midlands in the manner to which we have become accustomed.

The Home Office, too, I am afraid to say, has behaved true to form. I asked the Minister last month whether he would call for a report on the case from the chief constable of the west midlands. He answered no. I cannot say that I am surprised. We had a similar experience with the Birmingham pub bombing case some years ago.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) wrote to the new chief constable, Mr. Hadfield, and received a reply confirming that an inquiry was under way, prompted, presumably, by the television programme rather than a burning desire to get at the truth. He also said that Mr. Berry had been diagnosed as suffering from high anxiety—I bet he was—and had been allowed to retire.

My hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Erdington (Mr. Corbett) wrote to the chairman of the West Midlands policy authority and received an identical reply, about a page long in both cases. It would appear that the chairman of the police authority allows the chief constable to draft his letters for him. So much for accountability. One of the most remarkable features in the long series of scandals that have engulfed what is surely the most corrupt police force in the country has been the lack of any initiative from the police authority.

Finally, the Police Federation has added PC Salt to its roll of honour of officers killed on active duty. He remains there to this day.

As I say, this is only the latest in a long series of scandals. It demonstrates that no lessons have been learnt from what has gone before. How can we hope to restore public confidence in our police and judicial system if those responsible for maintaining its integrity appear not to care?

8.18 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Peter Lloyd): As usual, I have listened to the hon. Member for Sunderland, South (Mr. Mullin) with interest. The hon. Gentleman courteously informed me yesterday that he wished to take most of the time in this debate to set out his characteristically full case on the sad death of PC Salt and the related circumstances and aftermath. As he and the House will know, it would be wrong for me to comment on those matters in any detail. However, I shall say something briefly on the more general points that he raises about the inquiries taking place.

The hon. Gentleman opened his speech with a swingeing and quite unjustified criticism of the bona fides of several police forces, the Crown prosecution service and the Home Office. I will not repeat here the numerous explanations that have been given to the House emphasising the thoroughness and independence of the investigation that has just been completed into the activities of the West Midlands serious crime squad, because, clearly, the hon. Gentleman is not prepared to acknowledge its truth.

I cannot comment on the behaviour of members of the former West Midlands serious crime squad while all those cases—I emphasise the word "all"—are under consideration by the Director of Public Prosecutions. Even so, I place on record that care has been exercised at all stages to ensure that nothing that might have gone amiss would be covered up or glossed over.

The chief constable of the West Midlands force promptly transferred a large number of his officers to non-operational duties, despite his awareness that that would cause many of them great distress and hardship. At the same time, he called in a distinguished officer from another force to lead a thorough investigation and arranged for that investigation to be supervised by the Police Complaints Authority.

That having been done, all the reports have now been passed for a second stage of independent assessment to the Crown prosecution service, whose business it is to bring any criminal charges that may be in the public interest and for which there is evidence. There is absolutely no cover-up here.

Mr. Mullin: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Lloyd: No.

The hon. Gentleman used most of his speech to recount a number of alleged instances of unacceptably low standards of police behaviour. The hon. Gentleman indicated that PC Salt was drunk at the time that he died, and said that various other police officers made false statements or harassed, or worse, Messrs. Samuels, Francis and Gibbs, and other witnesses. Such behaviour, if true, must be dealt with appropriately—but, again, that is not something on which the hon. Gentleman can expect me to comment.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department is the final appellate authority for the police disciplinary process. If any of the officers were to be disciplined, in time it might fall to my right hon. Friend to decide any appeal that they might make about any finding of guilt that might be made. My right hon. Friend could not properly do so were he to form an opinion before seeing the case papers, and therefore we exercise some care to avoid involvement in such matters at any earlier date. It would be improper for us to do so.

The chief constable is the disciplinary authority for his force. I can confirm that the chief constable of the West Midlands force wrote to the Director of Public Prosecutions on Tuesday 5 November—the day after the "World in Action" programme to which the hon. Gentleman referred—asking that the assistant chief constable of West Yorkshire, Mr. Donald Shaw, be asked to re-examine the issues raised and to report further on any matters not specifically or precisely covered in his earlier report. I understand that the Director of Public Prosecutions agreed, and that Mr. Shaw is currently undertaking the re-examination.

I need hardly say that police officers are not above the law, and if any are detected of any criminal offence the Director of Public Prosecutions has no hesitation in bringing charges.

I congratulate the hon. Member for Sunderland, South on securing this debate and on packing so much into it. I am sure that his remarks will be carefully read by those whom he wants to read them.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-three minutes past Eight o'clock.

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PETITION

Gipsy Site (Bristol, North-West)

9.34 am

Mr. Michael Stern (Bristol, North-West): I am delighted to have the opportunity to present a petition from nearly 1,200 residents of Little Stoke and Stoke Gifford in my constituency and from Stoke Lodge and Patchway in the constituency of my right hon. Friend the Member for Northavon (Mr. Cope), who is in his place for the presentation of the petition.

The petition relates to a proposal by Avon county council to place a permanent site for gipsies and other travellers at Clay lane, which is in the Bristol, North-West constituency, but is bounded by the constituency of Northavon. In the opinion of petitioners it would be a wholly inappropriate, unnecessary and damaging site. Among the claims in the petition are that no such site should be placed adjacent to residential or industrial premises, that it "should be a minimum distance of 2 kilometres away from houses", that the running costs should be borne by the users, and

"That! Provision be made for compensation to those residents whose property is devalued . . . by the imposition of such a site. That! Due consideration should be given to the views of the Electorate, in the same manner as consideration is given to the demands of travellers."

The petition concludes with the prayer that the petitioners will look to the House for relief.

To lie upon the Table.

Socialism

9.36 am

Mr. David Evans (Welwyn, Hatfield): I beg to move,

That this House notes the success of Government policies over the past 12 months; congratulates the Government for protecting the interests of this country abroad, reducing inflation and interest rates, strengthening the public services of the country, ultimately making them more responsive to the people who pay for them, having the foresight to initiate reforms which will improve the National Health Service and the education system and for improving social security payments; contrasts all of these Conservative achievements with the abject failure of the Labour Party, despite years in Opposition, to respond with any practical or credible alternative policies; further contends that this is not surprising given that socialism, whether it is espoused by extremist politicians or served up by advertising executives, is a hangover of history; believes that the electorate will reject the Labour Party at the next election because it will not swallow its charade of moderation and that, despite its failure to come clean about its true convictions, it is still abundantly clear that Labour clings to an outdated ideology that stifles individual initiative, blights economic growth and fails adequately to deliver even the most basic of public services; and therefore concludes that a party which is without direction itself has no place leading the country.

If Keir Hardie had not invented the Labour party, Jeremy Beadle would certainly have done so. Opposition Members surely represent the greatest practical joke ever played on the British people. It might even be funny, if the consequences for the country had not been so dire.

The role of conservativism since the 19th century has been to save Britain from the onslaught of socialism—an ideology which is fundamentally at odds with the free market and individual liberty.

The Tories have waged war in a battle of ideas. The mould-breaking policies that they enacted in the 1980s have resulted in the leader of the Labour party rewriting his party's history just to keep up with our agenda—a wonderful Tory achievement. He has had to eat his words. In 1983, he said that Labour "wanted out" of Europe, while pledging his undying allegiance to a non-nuclear defence policy. Funny how times change, is it not?

People change, especially when No. 10 is beckoning. At first glance it might appear that the red flag no longer flies over Walworth road. Do not be misled; that building in south London still represents the last refuge of bolshevism. That is where English Heritage should have spent its money, to ensure that that museum is still there so that my children and my children's children can see where the death of socialism and communism took place. It is a mausoleum to ideas which have long since lost their relevance in contemporary society. The purpose of this debate is to show that all the old socialist dogma can still be squeezed out of Labour's shiny new policy document.

In contrast, after 12 months in office, the Prime Minister has shown that the Conservative party retains its intellectual vigour and political drive. We can look forward to the 1990s, while Labour can look forward to another decade in opposition.

This has been a demanding year for our Prime Minister. While he was running the country, Labour has wilted in opposition. For every new policy initiative that he has launched it has served up only tired alternatives. For every percentage point that we knocked off interest rates, it has only jeered and asked for yet another cut and to hell with the consequences. For every patient we have treated on the NHS—we are treating 30,000 more patients a week than in 1979—it has tried only to frighten the old, the sick and the less well-off. Good news for Britain is bad news for the Labour party.

[Mr. David Evans]

It was once said that a state without the means of some change is a state without the means of conservation. That is the spirit in which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister continues to govern: sensible reforms, targeted on specific problems. The socialist prescription for change would destroy the fabric of our society, as it did in the late 1970s. Do we remember the then Labour Prime Minister saying, "Crisis? What crisis?" Who can forget the pictures on our television screens of the rats running round the rubbish in Leicester square, of the dead lying unburied in our cemeteries or of cancer patients being refused treatment and hospital supplies being refused entry because the National Union of Public Employees and the Confederation of Health Service Employees said so? Who will forget the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey) on his way to Heathrow being told, "Come back; the IMF has refused to lend us any more money"? Who will forget the embarrassment of having our name dragged through the gutters of Europe? Who will remember going on holiday and being ashamed to be British? My children do not believe that people could take only £50 on holiday because that lot had made such a mess of the economy.

The electorate put their trust in a Government to provide them with security. That can take different forms: a guarantee that citizens' interests will be protected abroad and that people will be able to prosper in an economic climate in which their quality of life improves; a society where individuals will have an opportunity to prosper and fulfil their potential; and a community where people will be cared for when they fall ill or face hard times. But, most important, the people must trust their leader, as this nation trusts our leader the Prime Minister.

Those are the parameters within which Government should operate. The Government have excelled in those key areas in the past year—not the past 12 years, but the past year since my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister took over the country.

Trust is crucial, but it is rather like a new 5p coin—it can easily be lost, as the Labour party discovered in the past three elections. It failed in all the areas that I have listed, especially running the economy and governing our affairs abroad. Labour fundamentally lost the confidence of the British people and it continues to lose it. I shall try to explain why.

The United Kingdom sits at the hub of three great international organisations—the United Nations, NATO and the European Community. In the past 12 months, the Government have played a constructive role in each organisation. As a permanent member of the Security Council, the United Kingdom was quick to condemn Iraq's invasion of Kuwait. More important, Britain committed substantial forces to the Gulf to uphold United Nations resolution 678. On taking office, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister immediately had to take up the reins of a vast military operation. We may remember that, during the conflict, the Labour party refused to go into the Lobby to support our troops serving in the Gulf; it abdicated that responsibility.

After the conflict was successfully concluded, the Prime Minister ensured that safe havens were set up to protect the fleeing Kurds from Saddam. Britain insisted that United Nations officials should attend to the basic needs of refugees and the Royal Marines ensured the security of those refugees camps.

The United Kingdom was instrumental in pushing for the adoption of Security Council resolution 687, which set up a special commission charged with overseeing the destruction of Iraq's weapons of mass destruction—a commitment which has been backed by substantial logistical support from Britain.

The Government have steered NATO on a course of realignment, as it copes with the changing security environment. It is no coincidence that the United Kingdom, led by my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister, has been invited to lead the new rapid reaction force—a token of trust from our partners.

The Prime Minister has successfully negotiated a treaty that marks a watershed in the history of the European Community—a deal which is in the interests of Britain, not the unelected Eurocrats in Brussels. Thanks to the Prime Minister's negotiating skills, Britain is able to choose whether or when to join a single currency. In addition, Britain has ensured that any future defence arrangements are compatible with NATO, while the social chapter, which would have placed unacceptable burdens on British industry, has been dropped. Britain's idea to strengthen the European Parliament's financial control over the Commission has been adopted.

The Prime Minister has ensured that issues such as immigration are dealt with on a national level, not in Brussels. We all know that 7 million Russians have applied for visas to the west. Britain has a proud tradition of allowing asylum seekers who have been persecuted in their own countries to find refuge here. We shall not support the 75 per cent. of asylum seekers who already live in this country. We must not become the dumping ground for the world's refugees. The Labour party would let them in just like that. It had an amnesty in the mid-1970s and I am sure that, given a chance, it would have another.

In contrast with what the Prime Minister achieved in Maastricht, the only question of the Leader of the Opposition—if he had gone to Maastricht—would have been, "Where do I sign?" Foresight and statesmanship are in short supply on the Labour Benches. Labour's leader is arrested when he goes abroad, although I believe that the corporal who arrested him was promoted afterwards.

Mr. Jacques Arnold (Gravesham): Has my hon. Friend noticed that Labour Back Benchers are in short supply? Does he draw any significance from the fact that not a single Labour Back Bencher is present, which no doubt arises from Labour's embarrassment about a debate on socialism?

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. The hon. Member for Gravesham (Mr. Arnold) said that not a single Labour Back Bencher is present. I admit to being married, but I am here and I am a Back Bencher, unlike the Parliamentary Private Secretaries.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): The hon. Gentleman has put the record straight.

Mr. Arnold: I concede that one of the few hundred Labour Members is here.

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend made a good point. Labour Members are embarrassed, but they might be even more embarrassed in the next half hour.

Successful diplomacy requires the respect of other nations. That is why the Prime Minister and the Foreign Secretary triumphed last week. Everybody knows that Major and Hurd are in a class above Kinnock and Kaufman.

Events in eastern Europe have been confusing and worrying, but they are nothing compared with the incomprehension that surrounds Labour's defence policy. For example, since 1988 Labour has churned out more than 20 documents on any subject that one cares to name except defence. It is therefore hardly surprising to find that its defence spokesman does not have a seat in the shadow Cabinet. One must ask what price freedom? It was Richard Crossman who said that the Labour party had adopted "their faith in pacifism but it does not face up to the consequences."

That was reflected in the Labour party's unwavering support for Campaign for Nuclear Disarmament and the loonies who camped at Greenham common. That stance has been shown to be, at best, irrelevant and, at worst, irresponsible.

I am still waiting to hear some Opposition Member admit that they were wrong to call for one-sided disarmament at the height of the cold war when Brezhnev was packing his empire with SS20s. If the Government had caved in then, as the socialists wanted, a wall would still divide Europe. The Labour party has been proved wrong again, but it still holds to its peacenik principles. A Labour Government would cut our armed forces by 27 per cent. and the Trident programme would be put in doubt—all that at a time when the Soviet Union is fragmenting and the situation calls for caution rather than gung-ho pacifism.

Four republics in the Soviet Union, now called the Soviet commonwealth, have a larger nuclear capability than the United Kingdom. However, the Labour party wants to cut our armed forces by 27 per cent. and put in doubt our nuclear deterrent. That is what the Labour party stands for.

The Leader of the Opposition has said that he would keep nuclear weapons as long as other countries still had theirs. However, he has never refuted the anti-nuclear core of the 1989 policy review document, "Meet the Challenge: Make the Change". That document committed the Labour party to negotiating away our entire nuclear deterrent in return for just a fraction of the Soviet nuclear arsenal.

Mr. Nicholas Soames (Crawley): Does my hon. Friend recall that the Leader of the Opposition has already said that he could envisage no circumstances in which he would authorise the firing of a nuclear weapon? Does my hon. Friend agree that, in that case, the right hon. Gentleman has already given away our nuclear deterrent without doing anything else?

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend makes that point as only he can. I have no more to say, except that he is absolutely right. We know that the Labour party has given that deterrent away in its heart, its mind and through its mouth.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): Is my hon. Friend aware whether the Leader of the Opposition has torn up his CND membership card?

Mr. Evans: I shall answer that question in a moment.

Mr. McKelvey I am sure that the hon. Gentleman is aware that, at Question Time, the Prime Minister also refused to give any response to the question whether he would ever press the nuclear button.

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman may say that, but, if he knew the Prime Minister as well as we do, he would know that, if it came to it, my right hon. Friend would press it.

Did the Leader of the Opposition give up his CND membership because he thought that there might be a Labour Government and that, as a result of his tax proposals, he would be unable to afford it? Or, although the right hon. Gentleman is still, at heart, a follower of CND, did the PR boys say, "We don't think that that would be a good thing to belong to"?

The Labour party has officially changed its mind no fewer than six times about whether Britain should be in or out of the Community. Day to day the Front-Bench spokesmen change the policy unilaterally, at will. I cannot believe that the Opposition have the cheek to lecture the Conservative party on this matter.

Let me put Labour's so-called credentials in perspective. If the socialists had won the 1983 election they would have pulled us out of the EC, because, as the Labour leader said:

"We want out of the Common Market."

One cannot make it clearer than that.

Every member of today's shadow Cabinet who was a Member of Parliament in 1972 voted against Britain's entry into the Community. In the light of that, can Opposition Members explain something about their leader, who fell over on Brighton beach the minute after he was elected and who has been falling over ever since? Did he bang his head that day? He must have done, or how could he possibly say:

"I have never seen hostility towards the European Community in the Labour party"?

That is an absolute joke. It is ironic that the Labour party now purports to be the EC's biggest fan. It has almost taken on the status of a groupie. However, all the positive things that have come out of Europe are anathema to socialist ideas. The single market, the dynamo of the Community, promotes competition, choice and opportunity—hardly the watchwords of socialism. It is not surprising that the Labour party voted against the Single European Act in 1986.

If the Labour party negotiated in Europe on behalf of this country it would be a disaster for the British taxpayer. It believes that the divergence between the economies of the member states is too great and its answer to that is the tired old socialist remedy—spend more money. It would increase dramatically the regional and structural funds. It would pour money into Greece, Spain, Portugal and Italy, but at whose expense? At the expense of Grantham, Sunderland, Peterborough and Inverness.

As Britain is one of only three net contributors to the Community budget, it is clear that the Labour party's policy would hit British taxpayers where it hurts—in their pockets. In short, the Labour party, in common with Jacques Delors, sees the Community as the secret agent of socialism. That is not an end in itself, but a method of imposing on the British people the policies that they have rejected in three successive domestic elections.

The social charter on which the Opposition are so keen would undermine the reforms that we have introduced in the past decade. Everyone remembers that in 1979 the number of days lost through strikes was 29 million; in 1990 we lost 2 million days. The social charter would be a step backwards for the country and a step forward for the Trades Union Congress. The charter would also result in the imposition of a minimum wage policy. It is a socialist racket which would cost up to 2 million jobs, cause higher inflation and reduce growth. It would be a continental disaster for the people of this country.

The British people know that our Prime Minister protected our sovereignty in the negotiations at Maastricht. The British people have not forgotten that loved ones were lost in two world wars in the name of freedom. They will not forget that the Labour and Liberal Democratic parties were prepared to sign that freedom away. By standing up for this country, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has saved the lion from the talons of the German eagle.

Our people do not want a single foreign policy, a single defence policy, a social charter or a single currency. The Prime Minister knew that, but the Leader of the Opposition did not.

Since the Prime Minister took office inflation has fallen from 9·3 to 3·7 per cent., which is well below the European average. The Government promised lower inflation and they delivered it, something which the Labour party can only dream about. When it was in power inflation averaged 15 per cent. and it reached a third-world level of 27 per cent. at one point. Interest rates have also fallen from 14 per cent. in December 1990 to 10·5 per cent. today. That is good news for the house owner and the business community, but bad news for Labour.

The record levels of inward investment to Britain are testimony to the underlying strength of our economy. That has been reinforced by record export levels in the third quarter of this year. It is not surprising that we receive more inward investment than any other EC country. Even Jacques Delors admitted the day before yesterday that the United Kingdom has become a paradise for inward investment. That will increase when the Government fulfil their pledge to reduce the standard rate of income tax to 20 per cent.—a goal which was unthinkable when Labour was in power. Who will ever forget the top tax rate of 98 per cent? Who will ever forget the entrepreneurs, doctors, surgeons and scientists who were all leaving because they could not afford to live here? Surely the Labour party has learnt something, but I wonder.

Labour claims to be economically responsible, but one swallow does not a summer make. Just because we no longer hear the Leader of the Opposition say, "We cannot remove the evils of capitalism without taking its source of power-ownership" does not mean that the old prejudices have disappeared. One just has to look at bit harder.

Take Labour's plans for a national economic assessment, a so-called partnership between the unions, employers and the Government. That will not mean beer and sandwiches at No. 10. The new model Labour party prefers west end restaurants and gatherings at five-star hotels at £500 a time. Labour Members can afford that now, after 12 years of Conservative Government. They could not do so before. But they still want to experiment with the foolish ideas that failed so comprehensively in the 1970s. Just because one starts calling union leaders socialist partners does not mean that those union leaders will suddenly start acting economically and responsibly. The TUC will look after its own and to hell with the rest.

Let us recall that 165 Labour Members are sponsored by unions and that all but one member of the shadow Cabinet are unionised. The people know who Labour's paymasters are—the unions. Labour promises a system of financial regulation and credit management. It would impose restraints on bank lending. Labour cannot wait to get its hands on the leaders of the economy.

The Labour party has collected sociologists and textbook entrepreneurs who apply the economics of the common room to matters best dealt with by industry and commerce alone. The labour trade and industry Front-Bench team wants to run industry, but not one of those people has ever run anything—except perhaps a commune. [Laughter.] That is a fair comment. I shall tell hon. Members what members of that team did before they entered Parliament. Labour's team consists of two university lecturers, one trade union official, a charity worker, a television producer, a social worker and a psychiatrist.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Labour needs a psychiatrist.

Mr. Evans: Labour needs a psychiatrist! [Laughter.] One has to laugh—even Labour Members are laughing.

Labour's strategy for industry is to revive the interventionist policies which failed in the 1970s. Labour still believes that Whitehall can run the economy. Labour proposes new rules on takeovers, with a statutory obligation on companies to declare research and development and training expenditure. Labour proposes a national investment bank—can one imagine that? Labour also proposes a national minimum wage, particular training levels for companies, renationalisation of British Telecom and regional development agencies—all that to rebuild the dead hand of socialism.

It is ironic that Labour, the party that would have rolled over naked, legs in the air, playing dead for the EC, is at odds with the Commission's industrial policy and strategy. The Commission has emphasised in its Green Paper that the role of government is to produce the conditions for low or zero inflation, to remove regulation and controls, to reduce taxes, to promote competition and to remove state aid to industry. Labour fails on all counts.

Is it that Labour wants in because it thinks that it can get out of its responsibility for governing the country? Is that why Labour is so keen for Britain to join the systems of the European Community? I think so. In 1979 under Labour, every week the nationalised industries were losing £50 million of taxpayers' money—not Government money. In 1979, it took British Steel 13·2 man hours to produce one tonne of liquid steel; it now takes only 4·8 man hours to do so. It is not surprising that in 1979 that company lost £1·7 billion of taxpayers' money. In that single example, we can all see what happens when one brings competitiveness into an industry.

The socialist policies which I outlined will have a long-term detrimental effect on the economy's competitiveness. Labour's taxation plans, however, will have an immediate effect. The Leader of the Opposition has declared, "We will not increase taxes for the huge majority of the British public. No person earning less than £20,000 a year will be worse off." The problem for Labour is simple: under the Conservative Government, many professionals, especially those in the public sector, have enjoyed substantial pay increases. Therefore, firemen, nurses, teachers and policemen will be penalised under Labour. Recently, the hon. Member for Derby, South (Mrs Beckett) had to admit that between 10 and 15 per cent. of teachers would pay more tax under Labour's proposals. It is as simple as that.

Putting Labour in charge of the economy would be like entrusting one's life savings and pension funds to one of the Leader of the Opposition's best friends—someone who, had Labour been in power, would have been guiding the Government on economic matters and looking after taxpayer's money, not to mention pensioners' savings and pension funds.

Only yesterday I was told that one particular gentlemen had supplied the Leader of the Opposition with a red Jaguar. I do not know whether the money for that came out of our pension funds or out of taxpayers' money. If the red Jaguar is still being driven by the Leader of the Opposition, he should perhaps return it so that the receiver can sell it and pay the money back into the pension funds. I was also told yesterday that that gentleman supplied the Leader of the Opposition with an aeroplane at the last election. I wonder whether the money for that came out of pension funds—we shall have to wait and see.

Mr. Chris Smith (Islington, South and Finsbury): Would the hon. Gentleman like to tell us the name of this mysterious person who gave him these totally incorrect items of information?

Mr. Evans: No. If the information is not true, no doubt the Leader of the Opposition will say so.

Over the lifetime of the next Parliament, the Conservative Government could have at their disposal £16·5 billion from privatisation proceeds, on top of the £21·9 billion which we had already collected in 1987—resources which a Labour Government would not have available to them and resources which could not be used for health care, education, social services and other public services. If Labour ever returned to power, that would surely give a boost to the shares in the channel tunnel, because the brain drain of the past would seem like a tea party compared with the number of people getting out of this country.

As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has shown with his anti-inflation strategy, he is not afraid to tackle the big problems head on. The citizens charter is another example—a catalyst for a wholesale shake-up of public services. Buses, trains and councils are constantly at the top of the list of the public's dislikes as expressed in opinion polls; privatisation, the extension of competition, contracting-out, compulsory competitive tendering and the establishment of the Audit Commission have all played an important role in improving our public services. The citizens charter, conceived, initiated and endorsed by the Prime Minister, is another important step forward. The charter embodies all that is good about conservatism. It is not a grandiose pie-in-the-sky idea, but a practical programme for action.

Mr. Arbuthnot: My hon. Friend spoke about compulsory contracting out. I understand that he has experience of that because the cleaning and dustbin collection in Southend, before my hon. Friend became involved, was under Labour control and dustbins were collected for 20,000 houses that did not exist. Compulsory tendering introduced by Southend council put a stop to that sort of shenanigan.

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend is right. However, the 20,000 houses were not in Southend but in Lambeth, which was under Red Ted Knight. Before we privatised the service in Southend it was run by the TGWU and there were said to be 237 employees in the refuse department. When I arrived the most that I could find was 190. I will say no more.

It is long overdue for those in the public service to see people as consumers rather than as a nuisance. Bureaucratic inertia and inefficiency must be wiped away. The Prime Minister's initiative will ensure that people have proper redress for grievances and guaranteed standards of service. That will apply to tenants, parents, passengers or customers of the newly privatised utilities. Only a Conservative Government could conceive and execute the citizens charter.

As we all know, Labour is in hock to the unions, which is why it has consistently opposed measures such as compulsory competitive tendering which improve services and the pay of people working for those private companies. If tendering were abolished in the health service it would cost £120 million a year. Without it, 15 new hospitals would not be built. Since we came to power more than 500 building schemes in the health service, each costing over £1 million, have been completed.

Labour has always opposed those measures. Competitive tendering has improved services. I have given the example of the health service and my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) gave the example of refuse collection and other local authority services. In that area alone, local authorities have made huge savings of about £250 million. We know that the savings in the health service would enable us to carry out many more hip operations and heart transplants.

We can gauge Labour's consumer credentials by examining its performance in local government. It is a record of absolute shame. The 12 education authorities with the worst GCSE results in English and maths are all Labour controlled. The 20 local authorities with the worst rent arrears are all Labour controlled. We need only look across the river to see how badly a Labour council runs its services, not for the benefit of the consumer but for the gratification of the unions and the perverse priorities of militant revolutionaries masquerading as councillors.

The situation is no better up north. Liverpool, a city bankrupted by Labour, has 5,733 empty council houses, almost 2,000 of which have been empty for more than a year. More than a quarter of the rest, £16 million, remains uncollected. Labour claims to be the party of the working class.

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): My hon. Friend speaks about rent arrears of £16 million. Is he aware that the borough of Southwark, which has been Labour controlled for all of living memory, has uncollected rent of £35·8 million? Does he agree that that is disgraceful?

Mr. Evans: My hon. Friend makes his own point. I was not aware of that, but it comes as no surprise.

Labour claims to be the party of the working class, but in Liverpool it cannot manage to put roofs over people's heads. That is the sort of financial mismanagement that results in capping. In April, 57 NHS trusts were established. That is a watershed in the development of the national health service. Although they have been operating for only nine months, patient services have already improved and waiting lists have been cut through greater efficiency and increased use of surgery. In the past six months the number of patients waiting for more that a year fell by 16 per cent. In addition, the patients charter will continue to put pressure on patient waiting times.

For the first time in the history of the NHS maximum waiting times will be set for people receiving in-patient or day care treatment. If the hospital cannot provide the treatment within the specified time it will be offered elsewhere. For all patients there will be specific, timed appointments. Also from April, 3·6 million people are registered with GPs who have become fund-holders. Practices are given an annual budget and for the first time doctors can back their decisions about which hospitals can provide the right care for their patients and can provide the money for the treatment. The system devolves power to those who have face-to-face contact with the patient.

Far from privatising the health service, the Conservative party is revitalising an institution which has been in existence for more than 40 years. NHS trusts and GP fund-holders are in the vanguard of a package of reforms that will improve the quality of health care, which remains free of charge at the point of delivery. Plainly, it would be silly to continue to pour huge sums into a service that has become a bureaucratic nightmare, a quagmire. Hospitals and doctors have opted out of the clutches of NUPE and COHSE. That is essential if we are to meet the rising demand for care which confronts the health service.

Under Labour, medical judgments and clinical priorities had to be made against a backdrop of industrial unrest. Doctors, nurses and managers were not running hospitals; they were being run by COHSE and NUPE and they would still be running it under a socialist Government. A brother from COHSE is a member of Labour's review group dealing with health policy and a comrade from NUPE chairs the committee that oversees it. That is why Labour continues to get its sums wrong. It promised to spend more than the Government, but it does not say where the money will come from.

In the days when Labour committed itself, it got it wrong. At the last election it said that it would spend 3 per cent. in real terms on the NHS. That is not good enough. We are already spending 3·5 per cent. While Labour huff and puff in opposition, the Government have increased spending by 50 per cent in real terms. That has given the country 69,000 extra nurses and 16,000 extra dentists and doctors who enjoy wage increases rather than the wage cuts that were experienced in the 1970s. While the Government battle with the reality of running the largest employer in western Europe, Labour sits back and hurls abuse. No Labour spokesman has yet shown how the Labour party would ration health care, how it would fix priorities or how it would stop unions and professional lobbyists defending their restrictive practices. Like true socialists, they pledge huge sums of taxpayers' money without saying where the money is to come from and how it is to be spent in the best interests of patients. The £35,000 million that the Opposition have promised to spend can come only from increased taxation or borrowing. I believe that it will come from high taxation. The new wave of reforms is despised by Labour. That is because the new wave of reforms encourages autonomy and initiative.

Mr. Don Dixon (Jarrow): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. May I ask who are the people in the civil servants' Box? Is it necessary for the Minister to have three civil servants here to advise him?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Who is in the officials Box has nothing to do with the Chair.

Mr. Dixon: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. This matter was raised when the present Home Secretary replied to the debate on a private Members' day. We found out then that the people in the Box were from Tory central office. Could I ask you again who the people are in the civil servants' Box behind Mr. Speaker's Chair?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: As I have already said, that has nothing to do with the Chair, but perhaps I can add that if they are to occupy that position they must, of course, be civil servants.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Further to that point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. Does that intervention suggest that the Opposition Front-Bench spokesman, the hon. Member for Islington, South and Finsbury (Mr. Smith), will be so devoid of facts and challenging arguments that the Minister will not need support in terms of information and the like?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I think that we had better get on with the debate.

Mr. Evans: Education will, rightly, be one of the key issues at the forthcoming general election. The Prime Minister has unequivocally stated his objective—to make our schools and colleges more responsive to parents and pupils. Under his leadership, the programme to establish grant-maintained schools has gathered momentum. By freeing schools from local authority control, the Government are succeeding in increasing parental choice, making schools more responsive to local needs and enabling resources to be used effectively for the benefit of pupils. That will result in higher educational standards. A total of £2 billion a year is being spent on further education and sixth form colleges in England and Wales. From April next year they will also be able to function in a new independent environment, where funds come direct from Government. They will be rewarded for each new student who is recruited, which is an incentive for expansion. Sixth form colleges will also be able to admit part-time and adult students and to charge fees or accept training credits for them.

The message from No. 10 Downing street is clear: education is not just for children. Under new legislation, parents will also receive written reports on the progress of their children. Performance tables will provide information on all schools. Mums and dads will soon be able to make informed choices about their children's education. If a school has a bad record of truancy, they will have the right to know.

As in other policy areas, Labour's attitude to education is coloured by a pathological desire to wreck any constructive initiatives put forward by the Government. A socialist Administration would sling grant-maintained status straight out of the window. Schools would be returned to local education authority control, which would be refined to meet the challenge of the 21st century. Yet these are the same institutions that consumed funds at the expense of local children. Once again, Labour has responded with a promise to return to the status quo—a return to the good old days when their friends in the town halls dictated policy over the heads of parents and governors. That is a system of which the new commonwealth in Russia would be proud.

Last month the Chancellor announced that spending on social security would rise to £70,000 million next year, an increase of over 50 per cent. in real terms since the Labour party was last in government. It is thanks to the growth in the economy that the Government are able to bring substantial help to those in need. Pensions and child benefit will be uprated in line with inflation. We all know that prosperity for our nation brings benefits to those who are less well off than ourselves. Half the social security budget is devoted to a full range of benefits available to pensioners. The Government have successfully targeted benefit on those most in need. Labour advocates an indiscriminate, scattergun approach which would spread benefits thinly across the board. In other words, Labour would end up doing least for those most in need.

Will any of us ever forget the three Christmases in the five years before the previous Labour Government lost office, when they were so mean that they could not pay the Christmas bonus? They took the Christmas pudding out of the mouths of pensioners three times. [Interruption.] I know that they could not pay it because the International Monetary Fund was running our affairs at the time. On the last occasion the receiver had arrived in this country. This House was no longer running the country; it was the receiver, in the guise of the IMF, who was doing that. What did the IMF do? It said to the Government, "You can't even give your pensioners their Christmas bonus." That is what it came down to and the whole world knew it. No wonder the Labour Government got kicked out later that year.

Apart from pensions and child benefit, Labour can only promise help to people—this is a joke—when resources allow. I have just explained what happened in 1979. There will be no resources. Essentially, the Labour party is engaged in a massive confidence trick. Labour cannot run a successful economy to foot the bill for our social services. It could not even support Arsenal, never mind increase pensions. I am sick and tired of the bleeding heart tendency on the Opposition Benches. They berate our achievements in social security when they can offer only a record of failure and neglect, of pensions ravaged by underfunding and inflation at 27 per cent. Under this Government, pensions have grown five times faster than they did when Labour was in power. Socialists promise the earth, but they only succeed in cheating the needy, the old and the sick.

Mr. Chris Smith: Can the hon. Gentleman tell us of how much pensioners have been deprived during the past 12 years because of the break in the link between pensions and earnings? This Government changed that to a link between pensions and the retail prices index almost as soon as they came into office.

Mr. Evans: The hon. Gentleman has completely missed the point. It is no good giving pensioners £5, £10, £15, £20 or £50 a week if inflation is running at 27 per cent.

The Conservative agenda for the 1990s is exciting. War has been declared on those who obstruct choice or provide shoddy services to the public. Under this Prime Minister, our schools and hospitals will prosper. Britain's interests abroad will be protected and our economy will thrive. What runs through Labour's policy documents is an unstinting attachment to socialism. The Labour party is ashamed to admit to the electorate that it is still red to the core. Its ideology is cloaked in the language of moderation —deceit of the most cynical kind. My purpose in introducing the debate was to highlight the Labour party's continuing commitment to the old dogma—ideas which failed when it was last in government, ideas which will consign it to the dustbin of history at the next election.

10.30 am

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): I extend my warm congratulations to my hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans) on his excellent introduction to the debate, and especially on the moderate and reasoned tone with which he introduced it. The House owes him a debt for his intellectual and rational exposition of the fundamental case against socialism, spiced, as ever, with his good humour and unique style. It was a great pleasure to listen to him. He has enlivened my day in a way that I had not anticipated when I entered the Chamber.

This is a serious debate. I want to commence by talking about my history. One thing that has impressed me most over the past eight years since I entered this House is that most hon. Members, of whatever party, believe in creating the greatest good for the greatest number. There is no credibility in the idea that the Opposition are simply devoted to the destruction of British society, as we know it, as an object in itself. They believe profoundly in the philosophy that they espouse. Why, then, has someone who was born in Liverpool just as the war ended, who went to a state school and then to a university funded by the state come to be so profoundly disillusioned with the policies of socialism?

I believe that that has happened because, in examining what socialism actually means, it became clear that the key thread was a most unattractive trait—the trait of arrogance. If I had to pick one word that, for me, summarised what socialism meant, it would be "arrogance". It is the most extraordinary arrogance to believe in the concept of high taxation. I do not have the slightest doubt about that. Taking my belief that many Labour Members are dedicated to the proposition that they are improving society, they nevertheless have the extraordinary notion that somehow society is better off if they say to the ordinary working man, "Give us your money; we will spend it all on you"—or, with one or two distinguished Labour supporters, perhaps not all—"and you will be better off." The House should note that they do not say, "You spend your money in the way that you think will make you better off"; instead they say, "Let me spend it for you."

That is the most extraordinary arrogance. It is incredibly patronising to working people to imagine that someone has a God-given right to determine for them the sort of lives that they would prefer to run for themselves. I reject the notion that I have any right to determine the lives of ordinary working people. I simply have a responsibility to debate and ultimately to discharge, on their behalf, the responsibilities that no individual can take unto himself. However, wherever there is the opportunity to take responsibility, it should be for the citizen to discharge the responnibility of running his own life.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland) rose——

Mr. Norris: I am delighted that there is such interest in my remarks.

Mr. Maclennan: Will the hon. Gentleman answer two questions? As his Government have increased the burden of taxation since 1979, how does he square that with his arguments? Secondly, as he has not advocated abolishing taxation, is not the argument simply about its level? Surely he is prepared to acknowledge that it is not an issue of principle.

Mr. Norris: I shall deal with both those points later in my speech. I hope that the hon. Gentleman, the ex-leader of the Social Democrat party——

Mr. Neil Hamilton (Tatton): The ex-leader of an ex-party.

Mr. Norris: Indeed. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will wait for that part of my speech.

As a number of my hon. Friends wish to speak, I shall not dwell on the point about high taxation. Suffice it to say that I believe that the fundamental misconception that is allied to the underlying arrogance of the socialist approach to taxation is the idea that a person is not likely to be prepared to work sufficiently hard to raise capital and build a business. My hon. Friend the Member for Welwyn Hatfield and I know that that is not so. I raised capital by going to the bank and asking for a loan on the strength of the value of my house. I put everything that I had earned until then at risk by investing in a business. I worked seven days a week. If anyone switched off the lights at the end of the day, it was me. If the burglar alarm went off at 3 am, I was the one the police telephoned. All that people do, only to be told by a grateful Government that if they have failed nobody will give a damn, and that if they succeeded the Government will take 98 per cent. of the proceeds.

What is so desperate about that is that it completely misses the point that if there is to be a successful economy that actually creates wealth, we must give entrepreneurs the ability to create that wealth. We have to create the conditions in which they are prepared to take risks, to invest and to be entrepreneurs. The fundamental mistake of socialism is that, from on high, it extinguishes every vestige of entrepreneurship, of initiative, and of the personal dedication to success that actually makes any economy—not just the British economy—great.

Mr. Gerald Bermingham (St. Helens, South) rose——

Mr. Norris: I give way to the hon. Gentleman. What a pleasure it is to see him here this morning.

Mr. Bermingham: The hon. Gentleman is so sweet in his compliments; it is a pity that his sanity does not follow his logic. Can he explain how there can be an entrepreneurial economy when the banks crucify almost every small trader?

Mr. Norris: There is not one Conservative Member who is in the slightest doubt that over the past couple of years business has had a desperately difficult time. However, I want to give a message to every small and every large business man: however bruised they may have been by the recession of the late 1980s, just remember what the Labour party stands for. It is intellectually opposed to entrepreneurship, success and reward. A business man who votes Labour at the next election is a turkey voting for an early Christmas. There is not the slightest doubt about that in my mind; it has ever been thus.

Mr. Chris Smith Which party has been in power while presiding over the two worst recessions that this country has experienced since the 1930s?

Mr. Norris: From time to time I meet, as no doubt the hon. Gentleman meets, people from abroad, whether from other legislatures or just friends. If they have not visited this country during the past 10 years, they always comment on the huge improvement in the fabric of London and of our other great cities. Despite the fact that business has had a tough time during the past couple of years—as I and other hon. Members who have been in business know—there is now an infinitely more vigorous business society and business economy than ever before. It is poised to take advantage of the marvellously low rates of inflation—lower even than those in Germany—that my right hon. Friends the Prime Minister and the Chancellor, together with their teams of Ministers, have delivered.

For all the posturing, and for all the clever debating of points that Labour Members may care to adduce, I do not believe that there is one business man who, when it comes to the crunch, will be the slightest bit confused. Despite the vagaries of individual performance, and despite the day-on-day vicissitudes of the market, there is an underlying philosophical difference. There is much in socialism that is about the politics of envy. Socialists believe, "If you've got, I should have it." They believe that one makes the poor richer by making the rich poorer—one of the most fundamental misconceptions that it is possible to have. As my hon. Friend and Member for Welwyn Hatfield said, despite all the fine words, we know that that misconception is still held by Labour Members.

The arrogance of socialism is not simply present in taxation. It exists in its approach to nationalisation. Since the war, we have seen various bouts of nationalisation under Labour Governments. Thank goodness, the great achievement of the Conservative Government over the past decade has been to return those great industries to the private sector where, without exception, they have performed brilliantly in comparison with the appalling losses that were accruing in the Labour years. As my hon. Friend rightly pointed out, these industries are now admired everywhere—for example, British Telecom is gaining contracts throughout the world—and are models of expertise and good management. They are a stark and frightening contrast with the days of the 1960s and 1970s, when they were in public ownership.

The irony of all this is that the Labour party has come to take the view that the arguments of Conservative Members are right, and claims that it never believed in privatisation in the first place. The House may recall the Leader of the Opposition saying in the Director magazine on 1 September 1991:

> "The vast majority of the Labour party never believed in wholesale nationalisation."

Labour Members may not have believed in it, but they made a pretty fair pass at bringing it about.

The Government have freed the British consumer from the shackles of living under nationalised industries, where that great feature of any socialist economy is present, another great halter round the neck of the Labour party—the belief that the producer of a service is more important than the consumer of it. It is an extraordinary proposition that one should pay more attention to the workers in the service who produce the goods—no matter what they produce or how acceptable it is to those who have to buy it, whether at home or abroad—and concentrate solely on the rights of the producer.

The arrogance of socialism is seen not simply in taxation or in nationalisation but in the fundamental denial of choice and opportunity that is implicit in the concept, "Nanny knows best". For example, in housing, only as a result of the Government's pressure do we now have, agreed across the board, the right to buy. This is the old story—we need not dwell on it this morning—of how a Conservative Government pressed the concept of the right to buy in the teeth of opposition from the Labour party. Having seen the massive success that this policy has been, not simply by giving people the opportunity to accumulate capital but in terms of management of local estates and the interest that tenants, now owners, have shown in their estates, the Labour party now claims that it was its idea in the first place. It reminds me of those Russian history books that claim that the Russians invented television, penicillin and many other modern developments. They are slightly less in evidence than they were, but are still a rare curio if one can acquire a copy.

The right to buy is a stepping stone on the road to prosperity for many working-class people who otherwise would never be able to own their own homes. That right was opposed by socialism but introduced and given to the people by the Conservative Government.

Mr. Gerald Bowden: Can my hon. Friend help me by analysing the way in which the socialist parties in local government have, with one voice, said that they applaud the idea of people buying their own homes, while obstructing such sales by every procedural and technical device?

Mr. Norris: My hon. Friend has raised a tremendously important point—the fundamentally schizophrenic nature of the Labour party. There is a split between those on the Front Bench, who are desperate to appeal to ordinary working people and to pretend that much of its history and ideology do not exist, and those inconvenient souls who litter the Back Benches and who so often remind those on the Front Bench that there is good, old-fashioned recidivist socialism, and that they have not, for one minute, accepted the concepts about which we have been talking. On the contrary, they are back to the old arrogance of socialism. For example, they believe in the paternalist philosophy and look to the day when we decided that we would not have the state as landlord for one third of tenants as being a dreadful day, when some great social damage was inflicted. In all seriousness they advocate the idea that every sale of a council property should automatically initiate the building of a replacement of that property. That extraordinary proposition is based on the belief that the state should be landlord to one third of the people. We oppose that proposition.

Another great initiative from the Government is the housing action trust, which is designed not to make profit for local authorities, the Government or anyone, but simply to give proper responsibility for their own lives to the tenants of dwellings. I am glad that it is being accepted nationally not only by Conservative Members but even by Labour Members. Tenants recognise that it is the key to the more efficient management of their dwellings.

Socialism is arrogant not only in housing but in education. Were Labour to come to power, its belief that nanny knows best would lead to the destruction of grant-maintained schools and the city technology colleges. I wonder how far a Labour Government would go in reversing the local management of schools, one of the most rewarding concepts to be introduced in education since the war. It was entirely the product of the reforms introduced by my right hon. Friend the present Home Secretary in the Education Reform Act 1988, which he so brilliantly piloted through Parliament and which has been such a marvellous success. The Labour party's opposition to the private sector in education and choice is so well known that it hardly bears repetition.

The one great saving grace for the Labour party has been the existence of that well-known columnist of a number of Maxwell newspapers, Peter Mandelson, and the air brush. He is there, scouring every Labour party document and, wherever he sees the word "socialist" or "socialism", the air brush comes out and the word disappears. We are seeing the sanitising of Labour's policies because the party feels that it must not frighten the horses. It must not use words such as "socialist" which are discredited throughout the world in the wake of events in central and eastern Europe in the past couple of years and by the experience of the last Labour Government.

We see the reality every day in the House. Often, when I am speaking outside the House, I tell audiences that Conservative Members have a unique opportunity. Every day, we see how unreconstructed the Labour party is. As its Front-Bench Treasury team desperately tries to persuade us of its fiscal rectitude and says that spending commitments will be fulfilled only "as resources allow"—one of the most extraordinarily mealy-mouthed phrases in contemporary political science—other shadow spokesmen go around making spending commitments every day. At the moment, they are worth in excess of £30,000 million a year, and that is for starters.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) asked which Government had had the higher overall level of taxation. I will tell him something that he should know. What the Conservative party has done, and what my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) was so right to do during her 10-year tenure of office, was to ensure that what the nation required to be spent was what the Government would have the guts to raise in taxes. Therefore, during her period of office we were, uniquely, in a position to make massive repayments of our international debt. We entered the recession with the best balance sheet of any of the economies of western Europe and will therefore have the strength to emerge from it.

I could give people lower taxation tomorrow, but it would be at the expense of borrowing and printing money. My example for that is the Labour Government. Those weasel words that imply that the only important factor is the actual level of taxation are the great lie that Opposition Members, and the party of which the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland was once a member, consistently sell. The burden on a taxpayer is not simply what he pays now in tax but the consequential burdens of printing money that devalues the currency and borrowing money that will impose a future debt on him, on his children and on his children's children.

The dichotomy in the Labour party remains. On the one hand, there is a manic enthusiasm for spending commitments, and on the other there is the Front-Bench Treasury team desperately trying to persuade us that nothing has changed.

Mr. Bermingham: Will the hon. Gentleman explain why national insurance contributions were 6 per cent. in 1979 but are now 9 per cent., and why capital gains tax was 30 per cent. then and is now 40 per cent? Why is VAT, which was then 8 per cent., now 17·5 per cent? Why has the average tax burden on the average citizen of this country risen from 32 to 34 per cent. over the past 12 years if the Conservative party is a party of low taxation? But, of course, that question is too inconvenient for the hon. Gentleman to answer.

Mr. Norris: It might be too much to expect—indeed, it might be slightly arrogant on my part to imagine—that the hon. Gentleman was listening to what I said. As I have been decrying the quality of arrogance, it would come ill from me not to recognise the potential for arrogance of every politician. What the hon. Gentleman has said was precisely the point that I was making. We can compare rates of tax. With notice, no doubt we could compare our lists. I could give him a long list of individual taxes that have been abolished by the Government or are now lower —what about income tax, for example? In all the hon. Gentleman's scouring around to find taxes which are now higher than they were under Labour, he has forgotten the one tax that affects 22 million people—income tax. Were he to put income tax into his equation he might give us a more realistic scenario.

Mr. Chris Smith rose——

Mr. Norris: Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to finish my speech, as I am about to do? I am explaining to the hon. Member for St. Helens, South (Mr. Bermingham) that the burden of taxation is not contained simply in one tax—nor, ironically, is it contained in the totality of direct and indirect taxes imposed upon a citizen on any one day. Realistically, we must take account of the future burden being imposed on any generation of taxpayers.

Any Government can give people a free ride in terms of taxation for a year or two—even, in view of the Labour Government's record, for six years—but eventually that free ride comes crashing against the buffers and somebody has to pick up the pieces. To everyone who may at some time in the future read the record of our deliberations, I say, "If you credit Labour taxation policy, you will see the train upon which they will embark crashing into the buffers, and only a Conservative Government will have the guts to restore the nation's health."

I conclude by quoting from a journalist whom I do not see as a particular friend of the Conservative party. Robert Harris said the other day in The Sunday Times:

"The truth is that Labour—in terms of intellectual activity, as measured by numbers of publications—is perilously close to brain dead in this country."

I am someone whose family voted Labour for many years, and I myself voted Labour in 1964. But, sadly, I have seen the fallacy of socialism for myself; I have seen it in the community of Liverpool in which I was brought up, and I have had to live through trying to build a business. I see all around me in my constituency and elsewhere the benefits that a Conservative Government have brought in terms of individual freedom and prosperity.

Robert Harris was right. Socialism is intellectually dead —brain dead—in Britain. That is the lesson, and I sincerely hope that at the next general election the people will be prepared to remember it.

10.56 am

Mr. William McKelvey (Kilmarnock and Loudoun): I see from the Order Paper that this debate was supposed to call attention to the failures of socialism. Despite all his attempts the hon. Member for Welwyn Hatfield (Mr. Evans), who moved the motion, missed one failure. Had he mentioned it, I would have agreed with him. There was one stark failure of the Labour Government——

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): Only one?

Mr. McKelvey: This is the one that I want to talk about. It is the failure to establish a Government in Scotland—a parliament for the Scottish people. I shall outline how such a Scottish assembly would ensure that the interests of the Scottish people are paramount.

When we have a Labour Government—which will happen as soon as the Prime Minister has the guts to call an election—one of the highest priorities on their agenda will be the establishment of a directly elected assembly for Scotland.

To discuss the matter we need to reflect on the current situation in Scotland—one in which we Scots have lived for too long. As hon. Members who take an interest in the subject will know, Scotland is a nation full of contradictions. It is the world's fifth largest producer of one of the most precious natural resources—oil. We are a world leader in offshore technology——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I realise that the hon. Gentleman tabled the second motion on the Order Paper, but he is now speaking to the first motion. I am sure that he can use his ingenuity to relate his remarks to that.
